T. J. HUDSON ON SPIRITUALISM.

A Critical Review, and Reply to the Assumptions of the Noted Author, by Leo Miller, of Chicago.

Thomas Jay Hudson, LL. D., in his famous work on Hypnotism, entitled, "The Law of Psychic Phenomena," asserts on the authority of the new science that the disembodied spirit of man is forever barred from communion in any possible manner with mortals of earth. The gates of Paradise swing inward only, and when once over the threshold they close against him for all eternity. Spirits, he claims, have no hypnotic powers as mortals have, and cannot impart knowledge to, or exercise guardianship over, dwellers in this vale of tears. The heavens are sealed against us forever. We are left to work out our own salvation unaided by any influence from above. With one fell stroke from the hand of a merciless new science he shatters the hopes of the world. The millions who believe in the communion of spirits, the millions more who believe in the ministry of angels, and the countless millions who religiously believe the Bible and so-called sacred books as containing revelations from the unseen world, are all victims of delusion and superstition! This is a dreadful blow to the faiths and religious hopes of mankind. I wonder if the learned Doctor feels happy with his iconoclastic work? If he be right and all the rest of the world wrong, why need he disturb our cherished beliefs with his pitiless science? Such beliefs are harmless at worst, and they certainly do credit to man's heart. It elevates the soul to even fancy that loved ones gone before watch over and bless us with emanations of love and sympathy from their purer life. It is ennobling to man to cherish the belief that the dear God employs legions of angel spirits to minister to his children dwelling in the darkness of a material world; and that these celestial beings ofttimes reveal the will of the Most High through the inspired lips and pens of prophets, saints and seers. O, Doctor, please allow us to cherish this pleasing faith, if it be only a fancy, a dream; time enough to wake when we find ourselves imprisoned behind the gates of your heavenly Zion.

But is it not quite possible that, with all his learning and science, Doctor Hudson himself may be mistaken, and that the universal faith of mankind is founded in a blessed truth after all? I think so, and I will endeavor to prove it.

Doctor Hudson says that a person may be hypnotized and thoughts transferred to his subjective mind while thousands of miles distant from the operator. Indeed, to the mind of the hypnotic subject space seems to be annihilated. What, then, should prevent our receiving telepathic messages from the world of spirits? To my simple way of thinking hypnotism not only does not disprove the fact of spirit intercourse with mortals, but explains rather the modus operandi of such communion and shows us also the agencies by which the revelations contained in our Bible were given to the world. There seems lacked but a single step between hypnotism and Spiritualism. If I, encumbered with a material body, may suggest to a hypnotic subject visions of things real or supposed, and transfer my thoughts to his mind across seas and continents, why may I not continue to influence across the borderland of the two worlds, if I remain myself, with faculties of mind and spirit unimpaired, after laying off the burden of flesh? Nothing seems more natural and probable in the light of hypnotic science.

But that "if." Doctor Hudson sees it, as does every student of hypnotism and telepathy; and in order to destroy an unpopular "ism" which he would not have taint his writings for the world, he proceeds to destroy more than half my mental attributes and personality in the death of my body—the objective mind. He says (page 325) that "the objective mind dies with the body." If so, that settles the contention. As the subjective entity can be influenced and controlled only by the objective mind, and as I am supposed to leave that part of my being behind, it follows, of course, that I am evermore disqualified from holding intercourse with mortals living in this mundane sphere. I am sorry to think so. When a boy I used to sing in Sunday-school the hymn beginning—

"I want to be an angel,
And with the angels stand."

I innocently thought that if I did develop wings and all that kind of thing, I would join a band of angels and fly back to my old home in Western New York, and try to comfort and enlighten the loved ones left behind in a dark and dismal world. But that, says the unfeeling scientist, is impossible, because we don't have objective minds there with which to comfort anybody in this world with thoughts and visions of glory and immortality. O, it is too bad!

But, seriously, how does Doctor Hudson know that the objective mind which, he says, includes all the reasoning faculties, dies with the body? The thought is so appalling and fraught with such momentous consequences to the inhabitants of earth who need light and guidance from above, that the most indubitable evidence ought to be furnished before entertaining the idea for a moment. Does Doctor Hudson give us any proof of the truth of his startling assertion? Not a particle. It is a daring assumption, unsupported by a single fact, or by any argument worthy the name. He begs the whole question. Attempting to reason on the subject, he says (page 324) that "there is not one power or attribute peculiar to the finite, objective mind that could be of any service to the soul in its eternal home." Another bald assumption.

Pray, what is our employment in this "eternal home?" Will it content the living soul to forever loaf around the courts of heaven, and lazily thrum golden harps and drawl out psalms of praise to the King of Glory? We can not directly serve God; he is infinitely above all need; but O, how much we might serve his creatures lower down than we in the scale of development if the learned Doctor would only consent to let us take with us our objective minds when we go to the spirit world.

Everybody believes in the ministry of angels; it is a part of our religious teaching. Poets, saints and apostles have taught the consoling doctrine. Milton says:

"Millions of spirits walk the earth unseen,
Both when we sleep and when we wake."

Watts sings:

* * * "Where'er we go, Angels attend our steps."

Longfellow says:

"When the hours of day are numbered,
* * * * * * * * * *
Then the forms of the departed
Enter at the open door;
The beloved, the true-hearted,
Come to visit me once more."

Why do they "walk the earth?" Why "attend our steps?" Why did the "Being Beauteous," the spirit wife of the white-souled poet, "enter the open door" where sat her grief-stricken mate, if one and all are powerless to influence and bless?

Doctor Hudson is certainly mistaken in his cruel assumption that "Godlike reason," and all our inductive faculties of mind perish with the death of the body; and it will be my pleasant task to prove that he is. I will confront him with his own witness, testimony which he will hardly dare impeach since he relies upon its authority so much in his writings—the Bible. No professed Christian quotes the Scriptures with more seeming confidence in their authenticity and truth than he. All his principal works are replete with literal extracts from the books of the Old and New Testaments. From these books I will show conclusively that spirits do have power to commune with mortals; and that some of the spirits that did so in Bible times were known to have once lived on earth. And more: I think it will be seen that the inspired utterances and revelations contained in the Bible were all made under providential laws of God, by disembodied spirits.

During the period of Bible history, covering thousands of years, we find that angels everywhere and at all times, took special interest in the affairs of this world, appearing personally to men, directing, counseling and warning them in one matter or another. The instances are so numerous and varied in character, that no one who has any confidence in the authenticity of the scriptures can doubt the fact.

Now what are these angels? They are simply creatures of God as we are, brought into existence by the operation of the same general laws of mind and matter. Science does not recognize the possibility of special, miraculous creation. Doctor Hudson himself asserts that all intelligent beings had their origin in the "moneron," a tiny protoplasmic atom, and by general laws of evolution, operating through countless ages, have been brought up to their present degree of perfection. If this be so, and no advanced scientist questions it, then it proves the existence of a universal law of creation; and that all creatures, whether they be called men, spirits, angels, archangels, cherubim or seraphim, had a common origin. One and all were such men and women as we are, possessing objective and subjective minds, and like us, they began their eternal career on our planet, or other worlds revolving in space.

The only difference between celestial creatures and ourselves is in the degree of development. Time and eternity will enable us to attain their present perfections, while they and we will continue ever to advance, step by step, towards the Absolute whom we call God. We have a divine parentage. In the inmost spirit we bear the image and attributes of our God and Father, and eternity will be all too short to evolve the infinite beauties and possibilities concealed in the embryo. O blessed hope! what a glorious destiny lies before the human soul in its never-ending career! "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hath entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for those who love him!"

It has commonly been supposed that angels, so often mentioned in the Bible, are a higher order of beings created outright by the fiat of God; but such belief is unsupported by evidence or authority. The word angel simply means messenger, and denotes merely the office of the spirit; but when the Bible speaks of these ministering angels as persons, it calls them men. The angel that came to Manoah's wife to announce the birth of Samson is mentioned as the "man that spake." The three angels that appeared to Abraham are called "men," yet they were spiritual "messengers of the Lord." The angels that spoke to Mary at the sepulture of Jesus are described as "two young men in shining apparel."

But Jesus settles this point. On three different occasions, speaking of our condition after death, he says, that we are "as the angels which are in heaven," "like unto the angels," and "equal unto the angels."

Now, if in the new resurrection state we become like the angels, and the angels are like us, we certainly may claim kinship. Creatures that are alike belong to the same genus. Angels are men, and men here are undeveloped angels awaiting the great change to be promoted to the "equal" rank of celestial beings. And further; as the angels of the Bible are known to have had "objective minds," at least hypnotic powers sufficient to reveal themselves and their thoughts to mortals, it follows that we, being like them, have like powers, and may commune with our friends and fellow-creatures in this world. If not, will Doctor Hudson tell us why not? He asserts that there is no faculty or power of the objective mind that could be of any possible service to us in the spirit world. But the angels of heaven seem to possess these powers and make wonderful use of them to the glory of God and the enlightenment of the world.

But that there may be no room for even a quibble I will call the Doctor's attention to several cases recorded in the Bible where spirits of men who once were known on earth returned and made notable communications and revelations to mortals. The first I will mention is the case of the departed Samuel. Briefly related, the circumstances were as follows: King Saul found himself on the eve of a great battle sorely perplexed in spirit. He disguised himself, and with two men, went by night to the woman (not witch) of Endor, reputed to have a "familiar spirit," and sought an interview through her powers with the departed Samuel. The woman evidently went into a sort of trance, for suddenly she seemed to see through the disguise of the king, and in alarm, cried out, "Why hast thou deceived me? for thou art King Saul!"

The king assured her that no harm should come to her for violating his edict prohibiting "dealing with the dead;" and asks, "What seest thou?" She answered, "An old man cometh up before me covered with a mantle." No doubt she gave a more detailed delineation of the spirit; for Saul seems readily to have recognized Samuel by the description given of his appearance, and replied, "I perceive that it is Samuel." He then received a lengthy communication through this ancient medium, which concludes with the prediction: "To-morrow thou and thy sons shall be with me."

The reader will find a detailed account of this ancient seance in the 28th chapter of First Samuel; and the sequel in the 31st chapter. I would add the remark that the story of Saul's interview with the spirit of Samuel is as straight-forward a narrative of an actual event as any recorded in Bible history. There is no intimation of deception or imposture. The historian expressly declares that Samuel came to Saul; that he upbraided the king for not obeying the voice of the Lord in the matter of Amalek; told him that the impending battle would go against him; that Israel would be delivered into the hands of the Philistines, and that he and his three sons would perish; all of which came true.

This one case refutes the assumption of Doctor Hudson that spirits cannot commune with mortals—because the objective mind and its hypnotic powers die with the body. I might rest my case against his theory here, but there are instances of the return of human spirits recorded in the New Testament that I will call his attention to before leaving the subject.

The first one I will cite relates to the experience of St. Paul at the time of his conversion while on his way to Damascus to persecute Christians. He relates the story himself in his defense before a Jewish tribunal which had caused his apprehension. He says:

"It came to pass, that, as I made my journey and was come nigh unto Damascus about noon, suddenly there shone from heaven a great light around me.

"And I fell unto the ground, and head a voice saying unto me, 'Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?'

"And I answered, 'Who art thou, Lord?' And he said unto me, 'I am Jesus of Nazareth, whom thou persecutest.'" (Acts, 22:6,7,8.)

On another occasion Paul speaks of having seen Jesus while thus prostrated to the ground, and blinded by the heavenly influence, "as one born out of due season." Paul remained in this sort of trance with eyes closed, for three days, till "one Ananias," who seemed to possess a good deal of hypnotic power, came to him and said, "Brother Saul, receive thy sight," and straightway his eyes came open.

What will the Doctor do with this case? It would be a palpable quibble for any person of advanced views to claim that Jesus' body was restored to life after the crucifixion, and that consequently his objective mind was quickened into activity with it. Whatever became of his earthly body we do not know; but certain it is, I think that Jesus did not bear it with him to the skies. "Flesh and blood," says St. Paul, "cannot inherit the kingdom of heaven." And it will be observed that Paul saw Jesus while his eyes were closed; yet the two men who were with him "stood speechless, hearing a voice, but seeing no man." (Acts 9:7.) If Christ had appeared in bodily form these men who were in a normal condition, with eyes wide open, would have seen him, while the blind Paul probably would not.

WHAT WE NEED.

Those who will not shrink nor falter,
Or to slanderous words give heed;
Those who seek the road and walk it,—
This is what we need!

Bound down by no chains of priestcraft—
No dark theories for creed,
Men of common sense and reason—
This is what we need!

Walking out from the old shadows,
In Progression's grassy mead,
Earnest searchers, hearty workers—
This is what we need!

O! departed, come and show us
As our hungry minds you feed,
How to grow in strength and goodness—
This is what we need!

From the way of truth oft straying,
Drawn by selfish greed,
Turn us back; oh, help and aid us—
This is what we need!

Make our circles pure and helpful,
True development in deed;
Help us daily in progressing—
This is what we need!

PSYCHIC CHEMISTRY.

Grand Unity of Plans in Nature.

Nature, as a universal whole, from matter to force, from force to spirit, is a system of chemistry. All law of action, cause and effect in phenomena, change in formation and disintegration, are from chemical relations. The harmonial philosophy of nature from the entirety of the sideral constellations to the minutia of the planetary atom is a changing panorama of chemical evolution.

Nature presents three distinct planes of chemistry in her full composition; that of the atomic inorganic, cellular organic, and aural psychic. She has three forms of matter answering to these grand divisions: the solids of the minerals, aqueous of the ligards, and gaseous of the aural forces. A beautiful unity of plan runs through each of these planes of chemistry, that of attraction and repulsion, affinity and inaffinity.

The laws of the mineral, organic, and psychic are distinct and each confined in sphere of action to its own division, but interlapped by chemical ties into a beautiful communicative unity. The world has given much study to the chemistry of the mineral and organic from its material tangibility, but has barely entered the domain of the aural and psychic from its veiled enrapportment to sense; yet, as one is the outgrowth of another, in the order of successive chemical products, the last cannot be less under chemical law than the first. In fact, the law of chemistry is more complex and intricate the higher we ascend in nature's finer products, as in the psychic entity and the aural worlds. It is here that wisdom stands in silence, and devotion stoops in wonderment.

The aural sphere of the mineral records its experiences, and surrounding environment, with as much precision and delicacy as the organic in structure and the psychic in faculty of memory. By chemistry evidences of this fact, wherein the aural impressions of one is transferred to another in principles of aural chemistry. The psychic Ego is a nucleus of the highest aural differentiations, and its development is from elective affinity in allied chemistry.

The taste, capacity and genius that directs to pursuits and fixes individual differences are from its aural quality. Here is the key to greatness and distinction in character, for if the aural germ is the compound of the many sides of nature, its selective affinity is broad, liberal and comprehensive. If, on the contrary, the germ is deficient in gemmules of this character, the individual becomes narrow, one-sided, and selfish. The parental transmittal and modification of this aural compound is where "blood tells" found its origin.

When the chemical compound of the child entity begins its race of unfoldment on the mundane sphere, its dual chemical relations of the organic and aural begin their respective assimilations, one allied to the physical in grade and the other to fine forces. Each builds from the objective world in selective affinity, knows all temperaments and dispositions. The character of the Ego nucleus diversifies society into artist, industrial and learned schools, for the psychic gemmules seek their affinity in exercise and decretive growth. Vice and virtue, humane and malignant qualities are only a question of occult chemistry. The rude aural entities that generate within, or enter the psychic domain from without, often disturb one's cerebral household, and are subjected to order, or eliminated, by developing experiences of life—(minus the atoning blood and holy water). They are the same to the psychic domain as the microbes to the physical body—a healthy or disturbing element.

A thought is an aural compound of idea-units, in chemical association and law of action; its transmission is electrical in momentum, and ethereal in quality. Thought and the ethereal body vibrate in similar rapid momentum, not subject to the slow motion of gross physical bodies. Thought transmission is spirit language, and its receptive state by spirit or mortal is from a principle of chemical association. This great stream of psychic force flows into the world continuously, and each mortal drinks consciously or unconsciously at its fountain, but the higher strata, as the violet hue, are enrapported by psychic chemistry. The purified elixir of the higher grades gives health and nobility. The mixed quality of the earth-stained red gives excitement to passions and melancholic discontent. As the blood courses through the organism a vitalizing stream, and each structure enrapporting and assimilating its chemical affinity, even so does this great aural stream from the unseen shore course through our psychic organism and each entity assimilates its own by the law of chemical affinity. As nature sends out her great aural emanations to form the aural world in beautiful adjustments of chemistry, even so does each individualized psychic send out its emanations to crystallize into aural mansions under an exact law of chemical justice, thus measuring our respective developments. See this mighty stream of aural light flooding the earth like a halo of glory. He that drinks deep is covered in love like a vail of music, and illuminated in sparkling scintillations of thought like an X-ray.

LETTING IN THE LIGHT.

A Theosophical Den as Pictured by the Los Angeles Times.

OUTRAGES AT POINT LOMA—STARTLING TALES TOLD IN THIS CITY—WOMEN AND CHILDREN STARVED AND TREATED LIKE CONVICTS—A THRILLING RESCUE.

Mrs. M. Leavitt, of No. 418 West Fourth street, a believer in what she terms "the true school of theosophy," who has recently removed to this city from San Diego, the capital city of theosophists, has some startling things to tell concerning the practices of Catherine Tingley and her associates, who conduct the Universal Brotherhood Homestead on Point Loma. Mrs. Leavitt seems to be thoroughly informed on two of the latest outrages perpetrated, the cases of Mrs. Neirsheimer and Mrs. Hollbrook, both well-to-do Eastern women. Mrs. Hollbrook, the wife of a railroad man and Freemason of the East, has been rescued from the roost on Point Loma by her husband with the aid of an officer and a gun, and now hovers at the point of death from the abuse she says she received while confined in the "Homestead." During the day time she was worked in the field like a convict, forced to plant trees, hoe corn and perform all sorts of hard labor; and at night she was shut up in a cell and guarded as if she were a raving maniac. When her husband found what a trap she had fallen into he hurried here and took her out by force.

The other case on which Mrs. Leavitt is posted is that of Mrs. Neirsheimer, who has been forcibly separated from her husband, who is also in the Tingleys clutches, and is not allowed to speak to him. She is forced to live alone in a little tent in the grounds that surround the institution. Armed men guard this place of horror, and, Mrs. Leavitt says, solitary confinement, hard labor and starvation are resorted to by the Tingley managers as punishments upon those who disobey their iron rules.

The woman who gives out this information is a personal friend of, and has talked with, Mrs. Hollbrook, the victim, whose health has been forever destroyed by the ordeals she passed through while imprisoned on Point Loma.

Mrs. Leavitt claims that through a strong hypnotic power, Catherine Tingley works her will on sensible people. The "Universal Brotherhood," or in other words, Catherine Tingley, is an off-shoot of the Theosophic Society, which became disjointed some four or five years ago. Mrs. Tingley was formerly—the Theosophists say—a spirit medium.

She couldn't agree with the Theosophists, so she branched off and set up her trap on Point Loma. She distributes literature throughout the East, and even in foreign countries, saying the Universal Brotherhood Homestead, located in the most beautiful spot on earth, offers to those who wish to retire into a quiet thoughtful life, a home in which they may live peacefully and an atmosphere of soul-study and pure thoughts.

Mrs. Leavitt says there is nothing taught at Point Loma but insane ceremonies; that the girls who are placed there to be educated are put to work at the most menial tasks, each one kept separate in a guarded cell and forbidden to speak to anybody else, and that the poor little children are quartered in a miserable building some distance from the main institution, and are continually on the verge of starvation—for Mrs. Tingley openly states that children are fed too much for their spiritual good, and must eat but little, so that they will be more ethereal. Mrs. Leavitt says she knows personally of a case where both parents and children are victims, and the children have been taken away to the child-pen and are never allowed to communicate in any way with mother or father. For, says Mrs. Tingley, they will grow up purer if away from the bodily and affectionate influence of the parents!

The children are never allowed to speak to anybody except when they are selling trinkets to the visitors who come to the gates. The young lady prisoners make fancy work, which they sell to strangers. Purple robes are worn by the women, and a sort of khaki uniform by the men.

On certain occasions a midnight pilgrimage is made by both men and women to a spot on the peninsula, which is termed sacred ground. They go in their night robes, each holding a torch.

Before she had gotten well into the scheme, Mrs. Hollbrook says she saw that it was a fake, but having no idea of the horror of it, she decided to go into the Homestead for a while that she might expose the character of the institution. Whether she will live to carry out the good work is doubtful. She can tell things, her friends say, more shocking than anything known yet.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

"Women Do Not Want to Vote."

It is no exaggeration to say that during the past two weeks I have read at least fifty editorials and articles by men who acknowledge the justice of woman suffrage, but at the same time delude themselves into believing that they are doing no injustice to women by withholding from them that which they consider for themselves one of the most sacred rights of citizenship, viz., the ballot. The Minneapolis Times says:

"The Times desires to state in behalf of the men of the nation, that the principal obstacle to the granting of women's suffrage is in the disinclination on the part of the large majority of women to accept such grant. This being true, it would seem to be fair to acknowledge that masculine skirts are free from stain in this regard."

This is only an excuse for deferring justice, and it would seem that those making this excuse would realize how thin it is. In the first place how are we to judge whether women want to vote or not until we have given them the opportunity? In the four enfranchised states the women vote as generally as the men and seem to enjoy it. If you don't believe it, just try to take the ballot from them and see what will happen. If the women do not wish to vote, and still do so from a sense of duty, they are the most conscientious beings on the face of the earth, and are certainly needed in governmental affairs.

There have been more petitions presented to our Legislative bodies asking that women be given the ballot than all the other petitions combined. But why demand that a majority of women petition for the ballot when no such test has ever been required of the various classes of men that have been enfranchised since this Republic was founded? Originally only free-holders voted. Did the poor men unanimously petition for the franchise? Did a majority of the negroes in the South ask for the ballot? Have the majority of the Alaskan men asked for it? Have the various tribes of Indian men been enfranchised because the majority requested it? Did the majority of the Hawaiian men express a desire for it? Did a majority of the Porto Rican men insist upon being made voters? Is universal male suffrage provided for in the new Cuban Constitution because a majority of the men have petitioned for it? Did a majority of the native born Chinamen ask for the ballot? Is there in the whole history of the government one—just one—instance where any class of men have had the franchise bestowed upon them because a majority demanded it? Not in one single case has this been done, and yet legislators, politicians, editors, ministers, lawyers, dismiss the plea of women for representation, with the illogical remark: "When the majority ask for it they can have it."

No one has ever asked that these women who do not wish to vote be made to do so; we only ask that those women who do take an interest in the affairs of their country be allowed to express that interest at the ballot box. This is simple justice, and it is always expedient to be just.

Women Should Reflect.

When the women of Greater New York read that right now at the opening of the school year, there are 70,000 children in Brooklyn and half that number in Manhattan and The Bronx who can attend school only part of the day because there is no room for them, and 2,000 in Manhattan alone who cannot go at all—one would suppose they would rise up en masse and demand a voice in the management of the school funds. If they had control of the $20,000,000 appropriation for the public schools of the city there is reason to believe that it would not be necessary for over 100,000 children to stay at home because there were no seats for them.

One would suppose also that when women read the statistics of the Commissioner of Immigration just made public they also would reflect a little. Twenty per cent more immigrants were received in 1901 than in 1900. Of these 388,931, by far the greatest increase was from southern Italy, in fact one-third of our total immigration now is from that section.

In a few years' time, the most of these being men, will be voters for all officials and all public measures. But the native born, college bred, tax-paying women of the United States will continue to remain disfranchised. Is it not a most remarkable condition of affairs that the Government should prefer the opinions of these densely ignorant and often vicious aliens to those of American women?—Ida Husted Harper in New York Sun.

A MOTHER'S LOVE.

Between the curtains of snowy lace
Over the way is a baby's face;
It peeps forth, smiling in merry glee,
And waves its little pink hand at me.

My heart responds with a lonely cry—
But in the wonderful Bye-and-Bye,
Out from the window of God's "To Be,"
That other baby shall beckon to me.

That ever-haunting and longed-for face,
That perfect vision of infant grace,
Shall shine on me in a splendor of light,
Never to fade from my eager sight.

All that was taken shall be made good;
All that puzzles me understood;
And the wee, white hand that I lost, one day,
Shall lead me into the Better Way.

A CURIOUS CASE.

An X-Ray Faculty Is Brought Into Requisition.

JOHN ARMSTRONG CHANLER, A MILLIONAIRE, WRITES SONNETS DURING TRANCE—ONLY A CASE OF MEDIUMSHIP.

John Armstrong Chanler, millionaire, and first husband of Amelia Rives, was on November 6, at Charlottesville, Va., declared of sound mind by the County Court in proceedings instituted to determine the question of his sanity and right to possession of his property.

The case came up on a petition filed by Carey Ruffin Randolph, who declared Mr. Chanler was not of sound mind, and that the court should appoint here a committee to take charge and control of his local property. Judge J. M. White heard the case.

Randolph's petition was dismissed, and the court decreed that John Armstrong Chanler was of sound mind and fully capable of managing his person and estate, and that there was no ground whatever for the appointment of a committee.

CHANLER TELLS OF TRAVELS.

All through the trial Mr. Chanler took notes and made many suggestions to the counsel. He recited his movements since he escaped from Bloomingdale, on last Thanksgiving eve, his trip to Philadelphia, where he represented himself to be a lawyer seeking expert aid in the interest of a client. From Dr. J. Madison Taylor, who is chief of S. Weir Mitchell's clinical staff, he secured, after telling his own story, a favorable opinion as to his sanity.

After Chanler's escape from Bloomingdale he voluntarily placed himself in charge of Dr. Taylor in the latter's Philadelphia sanitarium. Dr. Taylor, who is a neurologist for the Howard Hospital of Philadelphia, proved a valuable witness. He said that in his interview with Mr. Chanler he found him a peculiar man, but with sound common sense. Though highly strung, he was neither irritable, mentally restless, melancholy, nor brooding.

EXPERIMENTS IN PSYCHOLOGY.

Dr. Taylor said it was not surprising that people ignorant of psychology should consider many of Mr. Chanler's experiments strange and unaccountable and perhaps due to foolishness. These acts were experiments in vocal automatism and self-imposed trance states, during which Mr. Chanler said things which to the casual observer would be regarded as evidence of lack of mental balance.

Of an eighty-page paper written by Mr. Chanler, which he calls "The X Faculty"—that is, the unknown faculty—Dr. Taylor said that he would express no opinion further than that it was clearly analogous to and in advance of similar researches of other authorities in psychology. Dr. Taylor said that after discussions with Mr. Chanler and other psychologists he could assert that the grounds taken by Mr. Chanler were rational and reasonable.

In these theories Mr. Chanler, according to Dr. Taylor, holds that in all humanity there is a function of the subjective mind (Chanler's "X Faculty") by which a most important form and kind of unconscious cerebration can take place. In Mr. Chanler's case, however, as the specialists diagnosed it, there was a perfect balance between the subjective mind, which possessed Chanler when under the self-imposed hypnotic state, and the objective faculties which are common to everybody.

WRITES SONNETS IN TRANCES.

He said that Mr. Chanler's contention was that he had made a discovery that makes practical use of this subjective function and through graphic automatism caused it to perform literary work.

In these states of graphic automatism Chanler, without poetic instincts, wrote forty sonnets, which attracted much attention on account of their literary merit from the few who saw them.

Dr. Horace G. Darlington, of Concordville, Pa., in whose care Chanler was for a time, went on the stand and without qualification testified to the perfect sanity of the man, as did Proprietor Lynn, of the Arlington Hotel, in Lynchburg.

FINDS PREMONITION RIGHT.

Dr. Horatio C. Wood, of Philadelphia, of the Philadelphia Medical College, furnished a comprehensive written statement of Mr. Chanler's case. He said Chanler told him of premonition, meaning that after thinking over subjects over night he would wake up in the morning with a feeling of exhilaration, depression, or indifference, and always found when exhilarated that his plans were judicious and things went well. When depressed he found it wise to modify his plans of action. Indifference meant nothing of interest for that day.

Chanler told him that in December, 1896, he accidentally discovered that at certain times and conditions if he were to take a pencil in his hand it would write without his making conscious effort or giving directions. Sometimes the writing would refer to business. Once Chanler, to test the accuracy of this judgment, speculated in Wall street in a small way, a few hundred dollars, with a successful result.

Twenty others testified to Mr. Chanler's sanity.

John Moon, counsel for the New York committee, made no resistance to the proceedings here. It is evident that Mr. Chanler's family will reserve their fire until the case is heard hereafter in New York, when Mr. Chanler, on the record made here to-day, will ask the New York court to take his large properties from the hands of his New York committee.

By Spiritualists, Mr. Chanler will be regarded simply as a medium, and perfectly sane. REPORTER.

THE GREATEST DEBATE WITHIN A HALF CENTURY UPON MODERN SPIRITUALISM

DISPUTANTS:

REV. MOSES HULL,

President New York State Spiritualists' Association, Headquarters, Buffalo, N. Y.

—AND—

W. F. JAMIESON,

Secretary National Liberal League, Headquarters, Cincinnati, Ohio.

PROPOSITION:

Resolved, That the phenomena and philosophy of Modern Spiritualism prove that departed spirits can communicate with mankind.

FIRST SPEECH OF W. F. JAMIESON.

Gentlemen Moderators, Ladies and Gentlemen, and my Respected Opponent:—Like the Dutch preacher, I want to say a few words before I begin. You will hear talk about spirits for a week. Do you think you can stand it?

The noblest aim of the human mind is the discovery of truth, and I wish to concede at the outset that many Spiritualists are searching for the truth as earnestly as any class of people. I have nothing whatever against the Spiritualists personally, especially those who want the facts, and are, therefore, willing to hear both sides. I agree fully with Rev. Dr. Storrs, when he said in the Minneapolis Presbyterian Synod, "I was never afraid of discussion; we can better get at the roots of things," and Rev. Dr. Buck, author of "Buck's Theological Dictionary," said the "ministry of our Lord was a perpetual controversy, and the apostles came at the truth by much disputing." This is the grand object of debate tersely told. The early disciples were willing and anxious to debate, even with death staring them in the face. But there are some in these days who, after they have expressed their views upon any question, do not like to be contradicted. All such people are against debate. They are self-opinionated. After they have talked they say in action, if not word, "There, the question is settled; it is no longer debatable!" In other words, when they have barked they virtually say, "Let no other dog bark!" That is dogmatism. It is bigotry of the worst kind. It is an assumption of infallibility; for as that great thinker, John Stuart Mill, well said, "All silencing of discussion is an assumption of infallibility. Martin Luther, John Milton, and hosts of other Protestants, were on the side of free discussion. Said John Milton: 'Try the matter by dint of argument.' Let truth and falsehood grapple, whoever knew truth put to the worse in a free and open encounter? Give me the liberty to know, to utter and argue freely above all liberties." Good for glorious John Milton. I do not care what name a man wears, Baptist, Methodist, Disciple, Pagan, or Presbyterian, we cannot help esteeming him for his courage of conviction. The man who has so little faith in his Faith that he refuses to throw his convictions into the crucible of criticism is the worst enemy of his own Faith. I believe thoroughly with Paul, "Prove all things; hold fast that which is good." Said he, "We can do nothing against the truth." We need not be crabbed in our expressions of opinion. However earnest we may grow in this debate, and a debate is of but little account unless the speakers are in earnest, let us be polite, courteous, cordial. I am not afraid of any man's wit, ridicule, irony, sarcasm. They are the lightnings which play around the mountain-tops of the intellect. So I say, in the language of Shakespeare, "Lay on, MacDuff, and damn'd be he who first cries, Hold! Enough!"

I offer myself as a lamb for the slaughter—although, possibly, I am a goat! I believe in the gospel of good nature, like Edgar W. Nye, "He made me laugh, and laughter has no sting of hate. It gives man better friendships and generous impulse and kindlier heart." We want no mere tame debate. If my opponent should accidentally get off a joke, or some other sharp thing, at my expense, I will grin and bear it and comfort myself with the thought that he doesn't know any better.

To my Spiritualist friends, in particular, let me remark, I come to you not as an enemy, but to do you good, as a missionary unanimously elected—by myself—don't eat up the missionary the very first thing! I want to prevent you from being so completely wrapped up in your own opinion that there is no room in your minds to entertain the bare possibility that some one else may be right. If you have the eternal truth, nothing in the universe can make it anything else. Consequently, of all people, you should welcome debate. I believe you would rather have me speak right out what I honestly think; to practice the principle so often expressed by your William Denton, "Be Thyself," than, for the sake of currying favor, to "palter with you in a double sense." I say what I think, let it please, or displease whom it will. Like William Lloyd Garrison, "I will be as harsh as truth, as uncompromising as justice. I am in earnest; I will not equivocate; I will not excuse; I will not retreat a single inch; I will be heard."

I remember Samuel Phelps Leland, who had been a Spiritualist; but, like myself, reformed before it was too late. Grandly he said:

"Shame! coward! sell thy manhood for paltry sums of gold,
And for the sake of public smiles leave noble thoughts untold.

"To be respected by the great, or honored by the wise,
They say my thoughts I must suppress though bleeding manhood dies.

"Thou canst not chain a manly mind, nor still a manly tongue.
Why scorn upon thee, coward, slave; in freedom raise thy head,
The noblest thought is valueless while it remains unsaid."

The deck is now clear for action!

Mr. Hull lays down seven points: Do the phenomena occur? Are they tricks? If a trick, how is it done? Was it toe-joints—or knee-joints? Is it the work of machinery? Is it the devil? Is it sub-consciousness?

When it becomes my turn to explain in the next question I will take up the tricks, one after another. The hypothesis, says Mr. Hull, which will explain the most of those points "is most likely to be true." I will have use for that in the next question. But Mr. Hull is to prove, and the Spiritualists mean when they say prove just what Webster says, "to make certain; to show; to convince." It has come to this at last, has it, that Spiritualism is a mere "hypothesis?" That is what I supposed. But I did not expect it to come out so early in the debate. What a fall, from demonstration to hypothesis! More than forty years ago Professor Hare wrote a large book, "Spiritualism Scientifically Demonstrated." When a thing is "scientifically demonstrated" there is no room left for a doubt the size of a mustard seed. Moses Hull is now obliged to confess to me in debate that he is reduced to seven queries, hunting around for an hypothesis, and whichever hypothesis fits most of them "is most likely to be true." Spiritualists everywhere teach that Spiritualism proves, beyond the shadow of a doubt, the existence and communication of spirits, until they get into debate with a gentleman who knows Spiritualism from a to z as well as they do; then we witness this performance, the champion debater of the Spiritualists making a nice little cushion on which to gently fall. But Mr. Hull is here to prove that spirits exist and communicate with mankind. Now he draws it mild: "most likely" they do, he says. We do not want supposition, mere theory, hypothesis, but proof. Spiritualists have been saying to Christians for fifty years that theories and hypotheses are all the church had to offer in support of the immortality of the soul; and that they all failed, which is the main reason why Spiritualism was born into the world, to do what the church had failed to accomplish, to stem the rising flood of skepticism and materialism.

I do not care how you prove it, so you prove it. Let me say right here, that this debate ought to be twelve sessions long, not merely four, which is only a skirmish. Revivals are often twelve weeks long, and you go to the theater every night for months; but here is something that is a theater and a circus rolled into one, or will be. I know Moses Hull, his faculty of "making the worse appear the better cause." Probably this is why the "National Spiritual Association" has appointed him the champion debater of the United States.

I would like to have a chance to show the good people of Muncie just what Spiritualism is; to tell them about the mediums and the circles, dark and light; to inform them in regard to my investigations, and to put people on their guard in their investigations. In a word, I would like to expose the secrets of Spiritualism in the light of the noon-day sun; to show you how delusions and bubbles and superstitions have swept this earth and engulfed millions, before Spiritualism, the greatest of them all, was born fifty years ago.

We ought to have six sessions of his affirmative, and then six sessions of my affirmative, in which I explain about the fiedians and the manifestations and the seances I have seen, "rich, rare and racy." And, after these first four sessions are finished I would like to see those doors thrown wide open, and the public invited, expenses to be met by voluntary subscriptions. It can be done.

While I am at it, I may as well inform you that I have challenged all the Spiritual societies and Spiritual camp-meetings in the United States to meet me on these issues of life and death, and they actually stand back cowering and trembling at what one little man, not six feet tall, has to say about their Spiritualism. They challenge the clergy, who have but a slight knowledge of Spiritualism, to debate with them; but they back down from a man who has been in Spiritualism for years, and graduated. Moses Hull and his brother Daniel are the two shining exceptions, and that is why we have this debate.

I announce that I am in the fight against Spiritualism the remainder of my days, and if the Spiritual camp-meetings and societies have no longer the courage of conviction; have allowed their spiritual spunk to ooze out of their finger ends; dare not let the public hear what can be said against Spiritualism, with even their best debaters to advocate and defend, it shows they are conscious of their weakness, and that debate will injure Spiritualism. "Any system which shuns investigation," says one author, "openly manifests its own error." I offer to divide time with them wherever I deliver my series of lectures. Is this not fair? I do not intend to let the Spiritualists silence me, so I will go to every town, where arrangements can be made, and give a course of lectures in any church, opera house, or grove, on the "Absurdities, Contradictions and Inconsistencies of Modern Spiritualism." As the duelists say, "There's my card," my address, Glendale, Ohio.

Ever since I converted Moses Hull to Spiritualism, forty years ago, I have been interested in his welfare, for I felt he was a likely young man. He has always called himself my god-son. I expect he is.

A man in a beastly state of drunkenness said to a celebrated English bishop, "Your grace, you, hic, converted me." "I think I did," said the bishop, "the Lord never did."

I will probably have to own him! You know how a Methodist minister's son sometimes turns out. So it is with my god-son. I am naturally progressive; and as I have followed the great light of Truth, Moses Hull has persisted in getting stuck in the quicksands of Spiritualism—just where I left him forty years ago, sitting in dark circles, singing, "Spirits bright are hovering," and not a hover can you see. Some people never will learn! He has refused to follow in the footsteps of his god-father. Twenty-two years ago I left Spiritualism because it has not proved to be true. I tried to lead Moses out of the wilderness—but he wouldn't lead. He would balk and pull back! You, who have been brought up on a farm have seen them do that. You will see him cutting up these same capers in this debate. Sometimes I have got so discouraged trying to save his soul—he says he actually has one; I believe he believes he has. I will take his word for it, until I show you in this debate that he knows no more about it, where it is, what it is, what size, weight and color it is, than he knows that Spiritualism is true. If the existence of his own soul is an hypothesis, that which is nearest to him, what becomes of Spiritualism? I have been tempted to say, when I have found him so obstinate upon Spiritualism: Hull is "joined to his idols: let him alone." But I cannot. He is my god-son, and I will try to save his soul, if he will only have the goodness to tell me where to find it. I am like the man who put up at a hotel and told the landlord that if he would give him his supper, lodging and breakfast, he would agree to kill all the rats with which the place was infested. After breakfast he said to the landlord: "Bring me a heavy poker." It was brought. "Now, if you want your rats killed, bring them on!" That contract was worse than Hull's hypothesis.

Is there proof? Not one communication is so natural, prompt, with circumstances and details, minutely related by the professed spirit, as you would get from him were he living on the opposite side of the globe. If you want precise information, such as you would obtain through the mails, you are informed that the conditions are unfavorable, or that you are too skeptical, or too anxious, or too positive, or too negative, or your friends are not present, or they are not used to controlling the medium, or you must write more definitely as to what kind of a communication you want, with what friend you desire to communicate, male or female, old or young. You are often asked to write the names of several friends, dates and ages, to give leading symptoms! and send a lock of your hair. Then with that amount of data, furnished by yourself, you may get a communication—if the "conditions are favorable." This is the case with nine-tenths of the so-called spirit communications, and the other tenth is dubious. You fail to get a message that will bear rigid cross-questioning. That was my disappointing experience for years. Never did I receive a proof from mother, from father. Yet they were both interested in Spiritualism. Mother wrote the cursive angle hand, pretty as copper plate. How rejoiced I would have been to have received a letter once a week, as usual, from that mother who never failed to write. If I had not seen her for twenty years, I would have recognized her by one letter and one expression. No word from either of them. Ever since death claimed them, all has been silent as the grave where they were buried, side by side.

Some of the best mediums, with whom I have conversed, tell me they never heard from their own friends. This fact, in my own case, tended to make me doubt my own mediumship.

Mr. Hull hopes I will weigh the testimony that men have believed in all ages that the dead return. O, I have weighed it, and found it wanting. They believed in gnomes, fairies, witches, devils by the million. They believed in satyrs and mermaids. Certainly, as Dr. Johnson said, "apparitions of the dead" were "related and believed," but it was a wide-spread superstition. It was an age of superstition. Johnson, with all his greatness, was pictured by one of England's greatest historians as "weak in judgment," "simple as a child," as child-like and believing as my friend Hull.

But what is Modern Spiritualism here for, if it is not to give the world a this-year's-fact? Let us pass the hat for a present-day, living fact that departed spirits exist and communicate. Let me clutch one fact; grasp one ghost, not a mere shadow, a "Jack-o-Lantern," a "Will-o-the Wisp;" but a solid chunk of ghost, male or female, and I am with you!

Mr. Hull says I must take one position or the other, that the witnesses, cited by Dr. Johnson, "are all liars, or all fools." Neither. Wise men are often mistaken. Noah Webster says about this very Dr. Samuel Johnson, "He often fell into mistakes; and no errors are so dangerous as those of great men." Says Webster, their intellectual power "gives a sanction to their very mistakes, and represses that spirit of inquiry which would investigate the truth." But Brother Hull wants us to take the mistakes of this great man as proof. Can't do it. Says Mr. Hull, they are not mistakes, for how should they "all agree in telling the same false stories," honest men, wise men, fools and knaves. I answer him: Fictions, legends, superstitions have been built up in just that way. It was commonly accepted that the sun "rises and sets." All could see it rise and see it set plainer than they ever saw the best-behaved ghost. Science had to fight its way against those who "all agreed in telling the same false stories." Martin Luther honestly believed in a personal Satan, hock, hoofs, horns and all. How easily Mr. Hull, by such argument, could establish the existence of his Satanic majesty; for all agree, since Luther threw his inkstand at his head, that he is as black as the devil ever since. On no subject have so many people agreed as that there is a devil—more millions have accepted the genuineness of that story than that the spirits of the dead communicate.

Friend Hull remarks, "In Spiritualism a certain phenomenon is said to have occurred; now the first thing to do is to make sure," he says, "that the phenomenon really occurs."

However crazy some Spiritualists have been, I really believe my Brother Hull has lucid intervals. He had one when he said that: "Make sure that the phenomenon really occurs." "Sure," mark you.

Ladies and gentlemen, there is the weakest spot in Spiritualism. I probed it years ago. It was what wrecked my Spiritualism, "making sure," and I found that, however many apparitions people saw ages ago, I could not lay hold of a real, live ghost to-day. I cannot see one, feel one, taste, nor smell one—not even a "nigger" ghost—but I can prove that a human being exists, through the sense of seeing, or hearing, or feeling. What is a phenomenon? Mr. Webster says, "It sometimes denotes a remarkable or unusual appearance, or an appearance whose cause is not immediately obvious." Webster defines it as "Anything visible; whatever is presented to the eye by observation or experiment, or whatever is discovered to exist."

That is a phenomenon. If my opponent will stand by his gun, make sure that the phenomenon really occurs, then he will be sure that a spirit exists and communicates.

I see that my time is nearly expired. I will answer Mr. Hull's questions about my mediumship in my next speech; for he begs me to prove Spiritualism true or myself a knave. I shall do neither. To ask a man if he is honest is like asking a woman if she is virtuous. If her life does not prove her virtuous, her answer cannot prove it, so the question is unnecessary. If her life does prove her virtuous the question is an insult. Why does not Mr. Hull get his "spirits" to tell him? "Have I been so long time with you, and yet hast thou not known me, Philip?"

THE.. DIVINE PLAN.. EIGHT REMARKABLE BOOKS.

Every Subscriber to the Progressive Thinker Reaps the Benefit of the Divine Plan.

"A Wanderer in the Spirit Lands," a most remarkable book, will be our leading feature until June 1, 1902, and will be the only one of the eight Divine Plan books sent out for 25 cents.

If you order only one book, and that one not the "Wanderer in the Spirit Lands," the price is 50 cents. If you order two books, and neither of them the "Wanderer in the Spirit Lands," the price of each one is 45 cents.

Any three of the eight Books you may order, Price $1.10.

Any four of the eight Books you may order, Price $1.50.

Any five of the eight Books you may order, Price $1.80.

Any six of the eight Books you may order, Price $2.10.

Any seven of the eight Books you may order, Price $2.35.

Lastly all of the eight Valuable Books here announced are sent out, all postage prepaid, for $2.50—a price never offered before by any other publisher.

Read This Carefully Before Remitting.

When you send in your subscription to The Progressive Thinker, carefully look over the books which you desire in this list, and their price, and send for them. They are very valuable. They are intensely interesting. They are elevating in tone and will do you good. In remitting do not fail to enclose a dollar for The Progressive Thinker.

These eight books, substantially and elegantly bound, and printed in the neatest style of the printer's art, will be furnished to our subscribers for $2.50, a price which modern machinery and enterprise has rendered possible. Sending out these books, however, at the prices we do, does not reduce the price of the subscription of the paper, apparently or otherwise, a single cent, for that cannot be afforded for less than one dollar per year, inview of the fact that we publish such a vast amount of reading matter.

REMARKABLE OFFER.

EIGHT REMARKABLE BOOKS FOR $2.50.

The Progressive Thinker one year and the eight Divine Plan books, $3.50.

In order to assist in forming a Spiritual and Occult Library in every Spiritualist's home, these eight valuable books, substantially and elegantly bound in cloth, are furnished to our subscribers for $2.50. We are able to do this, from the fact that the authors make no charge for the vast amount of labor bestowed on these works, and which extended over many years. That is why you are getting these intensely interesting books for the price you do. We are only carrying out the Divine Plan, inaugurated only by The Progressive Thinker. There are thousands of our subscribers who have no Spiritualist or Occult library, and this inducement is offered in order that they may commence forming one at once, and thus keep in line with the advancing procession. The postage on the above books and expense of mailing is about 95 cents, hence you are receiving them at an exceedingly low price—simply the result of modern enterprise combined with a desire to do good.

IMPORTANT MATTER FROM OUR FOREIGN EXCHANGES

LIGHT, LONDON, ENGLAND.

A SEANCE WITH MADAM MONTAGUE.

Madame Katherine St. Clair has kindly sent us the following translation of an article which has appeared in "Spiritualism Moderne" (Paris), from the pen of Madame de Komar, the editor of that journal:

Madame Montague and her wonderful psychometrical powers were well spoken of to us at the editorial office of "Light," nor can we say that we were disappointed in witnessing them.

Public reunions offer the best opportunity of judging the efficiency of the medium. The magnetic currents drawn from the audience are a great help, as indeed they are with all mediums, and the more complete the harmony, the less skepticism present, the more satisfactory the results.

The seances are held in Madame Montague's own drawing-room at Hyde Park mansions, where the harmonious surroundings form the best frame for her great personal charm.

A brilliant audience of about fifty people had assembled, and a young lady, Madame Montague's secretary, went round to collect the fees, and also distributed papers and pencils for the written questions. The papers, when written upon, were thrown indiscriminately into a basket.

The medium then entered, dressed in a gown of light color, made Empire fashion, so as not to impede the full play of respiration. A yoke of deep red velvet showed up to advantage her dark hair, somewhat pale complexion, and the large silver cross which shone on her breast. In her hand she carried a superb white rose. While the first chords of a hymn were played, she seated herself facing the audience, to all appearance absorbed in prayer meditation, and occasionally breathed the fragrance of the rose. This reminded us that the perfume of flowers is said to have great effect in spiritual or psychological phenomena, as was demonstrated by the experiments of Monsieur Bouvier, of Lyons. We do not know if Madame Montague does this unconsciously, or if she has reason to recognize the beneficial power of flower fragrance. During the singing of the hymn she remained with closed eyes and joined hands, then as the hymn finished she arose, formulated a prayer to the Creator, calling down a benediction on herself and on us. During the first part of the seance her eyes appeared fixed on vacancy and she seemed to perceive things visible to her alone.

Mr. Montague read the questions aloud, taking them up at random from the basket. The medium, standing before the audience, listened, her hand held out somewhat impatiently towards the reader, from whom she seized the paper, generally before he had finished, giving the answer with an extraordinary volubility, which frequently developed into a truly philosophical thesis of the highest purport and great elevation of thought.

The questions varied much in character; we were able to note a few as she went on, amongst others:—

Question—"What must we think of reincarnation?"

Answer—"It is impossible to give you all the theories on the subject. But is it of great importance to know by what means the spirit goes on to attain perfection? A body of some sort is always necessary as a vehicle for the evolution of the spirit."

Question—"How are we to attain evolution?"

Answer—"Every man is composed of two bodies, the spiritual and the material, the master and the servant; the servant must obey the will of the master who guides it on towards perfection."

Our question was as follows: "How should we think of our guide?"

The answer was: "He has come to perform a great work and will remain with you, renewing your strength. He belongs to a higher sphere and we call him an Adept. He will help you greatly and smooth away all difficulties."

Here we must observe that it was impossible for the medium to know who had asked the question, and in giving the answer she had nothing to indicate to her that we alluded to the guide of a Spiritual association working indeed with us to accomplish "a great work" and seeking to "smooth away all difficulties."

The questions were so numerous that Madame Montague occupied more than an hour in replying to them.

When they were finished she returned to her seat for a few minutes, while another hymn was sung, continuing from time to time to smell the rose. We omitted to say that before the entry of the medium, a tray, covered with red velvet, was carried round, and all were asked to place some object upon it, such as a ring, a watch, pin, etc., as far as possible of metal. Mr. Montague now announced that his wife would proceed to psychometrize as many of these as she could; generally she was only able to read about ten, for by that time her strength began to fail. She selected these by chance; or rather took those whose strong magnetism attracted her.

About fifty articles were on the tray, and the first chosen was a small penknife.

Holding this to her forehead, the medium without hesitation indicated the sex of the owner, his capabilities, state of health, certain details of his past life, with advice for his future.

All this was found to be absolutely correct.

Monsieur Beaudelot had placed on the tray the crystal egg which we have mentioned several times in these columns. This was the second object which the medium selected, exclaiming as she did so:—

"O! what a splendid thing."

Then carrying it to her forehead, passing it several times over her temples, she added:—

"What a delightful feeling of satisfaction I have in holding this strange crystal." Then, examining it, "I see represented here all the world of space; the light that illumines it is the radiant actinic light of other spheres. It has healing properties and is the symbol of life."

Once more we must explain that no one in the company besides ourselves knew from whence came the crystal thus put forward for examination. We would also draw attention to the fact that this was the only article in which the medium recognized a spiritual influence and not the aural fluid of the owner. All the spectators appeared much impressed by what was said of the crystal, and at the end of the seance we were eagerly asked for information as to its history.

The psychometry seemed to give satisfaction to all. Only once was there an apparent mistake. A ring placed on the tray by a young man was described as belonging to a woman. When the owner rose to claim it the medium said to him: "That ring must have belonged to a woman, for I distinctly recognized a feminine influence." In effect the ring either belonged, or had belonged, to a young lady. Another hymn having been sung, whilst the medium rested a few moments, she proceeded to the phenomena of thought-transmission. Here there was no possibility of trickery, for no restriction was placed on the audience. You asked what you pleased, and the medium replied with remarkable precision, adding usually some advice when the question related to the future.

This is how Madame Montague proceeds. She simply begs the querist to rise, look straight at her, mentally formulating the question. With each answer the medium describes a symbol, generally having some relation to the question. Thus a young lady, having mentally asked if she would soon be happy, received the reply: "Yes; but after a time of effort and waiting. The symbol is a wedding ring."

To another was said: "No; you will not remain longer in Europe; a long journey is before you, and the symbol is a ship. It will take you, if I mistake not, to India. Do not delay your departure if you would have a favorable voyage."

For myself, I had asked a question the answer to which was only to be Yes or No, and which concerned our association. The medium, after looking at me for a moment, replied in the following words: "Yes, yes, yes; and the symbol is a beautiful star shining above your head." She stopped, almost surprised at the brevity of her answer and the character of the symbol. But this reply, for all its brevity, was more conclusive than all that had gone before, and I expressed my satisfaction, being alone in a position to grasp the peculiar significance of what was thus confirmed to me by a medium entirely in ignorance of our association or of its symbol.

The questions were continued until all in the room had been answered, and to each the medium asked: "Do you understand the reply?" and an affirmative was the invariable result.

We cannot sufficiently emphasize the excellent impression we took away with us from this seance, of which we can only give a wholly inadequate idea; to do justice to the remarkable gifts possessed by the medium, a full and exact report would alone suffice. Certainly, in the event of our being able to carry out our numerous plans, Madame Montague will be one of the first mediums whom we shall rejoice to welcome amongst us, the more so that her perfect command of the French language will enable her to meet her audiences in complete accord. In the hope, therefore, of meeting her again, we publicly offer her our tribute of admiration for her high mediumistic gifts, and our thanks for the pleasant time we spent with her.

EMANCIPATION OF GOD.

In our consideration of the phrase "The Emancipation of God," we all along had in mind the one thing needful to-day—a more actual and intimate belief in God, as ours now, and ours in connection with every circumstance of life—the God of Nature and of Human Nature, the God of History and of all voyages of discovery in search of Religion, the God of Home and Business and Science. Turning over the pages of "The Christian Register," we found this thought by another route:—

"It may be that in trying to find God we go too far away in search for him, or that we try to find him in the grand and marvelous only. He may speak to us in the simple and the near, and have revelations for our hearts that cannot be understood by any higher method. If we have so felt at any time, in our despair of the ways of a strenuous intellectual method, it may be that a quiet hour of communion with nature has restored the balance of our thoughts, and given us the faith again which we had lost. There is a way in which we may look at nature which makes it the dwelling-place of the living God, and the means of bringing us into closest communion with him. Coming thus into his presence, the lover of nature may say;—

"'I feel that his embrace
Slides down by thrills through all things made,
Through sight and sound of every place.'"

Death of Prof. Edwin Johnson.

The "Christian World," of London, October 10, 1901, has a sketch of the life of Professor Edwin Johnson, who passed away October 5, after a lingering and painful illness, aged fifty-eight years. He was the son of Rev. A. Johnson, of Robert Street Chapel. He entered New College where he distinguished himself by brilliant classical attainments. He won three scholarships, and obtained his M. A. at the London University of Classics. In 1865 he entered on the pastoral office at Forest Hill, where he stayed until 1870. From 1871 to 1879 he was pastor at Boston, in Lincolnshire, where the Pilgrim Fathers were first imprisoned.

The council of New College then appointed him Professor of Classics. By a kind of Socratic method he made the young men think about the deepest questions, and often doubtless startled them with his own views. These latter became so changed that his position became painful and he relinquished his chair. This was a turning point in his history. His deep religiousness remained; he had changed his convictions but not his God. He lived in a large measure in intellectual loneliness, giving himself more untiringly to literary work, mostly in an unpopular line. In 1887 he published anonymously "Astiqua Mater." In 1890 his chief work, "The Rise of Christendom," appeared, 494 pages, dedicated to Sir John Lubbock. "The Pauline Epistles," 152 pages, appeared in 1893. There are several other publications by the author, the latest of which is entitled "The Quest of Mr. East," a novel, by John Soane," embodying some of the advanced views of the author on historical religion.

The sketch of his life concludes as follows:

"The pain and difficulty associated with his course brought out more clearly his innate refinement, while even amid disabling suffering he exercised a strange attractiveness which led friends of all ways of thinking into fellowship with him. He will live enshrined not only in the tender love of those who so patiently ministered to his dying wants, but in the hearts of a large number who gained stimulus, not merely from what he said, but what he was. His body was cremated and the ashes were placed in Hampstead Cemetery. His old friends, Revs. Alford Holborn, M. A., and Samuel Pearson, M. A., conducted the funeral services."

Prof. Johnson leaves a widow, six daughters and a son. No two books have I read more thoroughly and often than "The Rise of Christendom" and "The Pauline Epistles."

WM. HENRY BURR, A. M.

"Rending the Vail." This volume is a compilation by J. W. Nixon, of psychic literature, most given by spirits through and by means of full form visible materializations, at seances of a certain Psychic Research Society, known as the Aber Intellectual Circle, the medium being William W. Aber, 507 pp. octavo. For sale at the office of The Progressive Thinker. Price $2.

"Human Culture and Cure, Part First. The Philosophy of Cure. (Including Methods and Instruments." By E. D. Babbitt, M. D., LL. D. A very instructive and valuable work. It should have a wide circulation, as it well fulfills the promise of its title. For sale at this office. Price 75 cents.

"Nature Cure." By Drs. M. E. and Rosa C. Conger. Excellent for every family. Cloth, $1.50 and $2. For sale at this office.

"After Her Death. The Story of a Summer." By Lilian Whiting. No mind that loves spiritual thought can fail to be fed and delighted with this book. Beautiful spiritual thought, combining advanced ideas on the finer and ethereal phases of Spiritualism, leading the mind onward into the purer atmosphere of exalted spiritual truth. A book for the higher life. For sale at this office. Price, cloth $1.

"Right Living." By Susan H. Wixon. The author shows a wise practicality in her method of teaching the principle of ethics. She illustrates her subject with many brief narratives and anecdotes, which render the book more interesting and more easily comprehended. It is especially adapted for use in Children's Lyceum. In the hands of mothers and teachers it may be made very useful. Young and old will be benefited by it. Cloth $1 For sale at this office.

"Poems of Progress." By Lizzie Doten. In this volume, this peerless poet of Spiritualism may be read in her varied moods, "from grave to gay, from lively to severe." It is a book to be treasured and richly enjoyed by all who love genuine poetry, and especially by Spiritualists. The volume is tastily printed and bound. Price $1.

QUEER ANTICS OF A GHOST THAT ANNOYS LEMONT PEOPLE

Lemont has a ghost. Not since the stormy days of the the drainage canal construction and the reign of Mayor McCarthy has the little city had such a genuine sensation as it is experiencing at the present time. The antics of the ghost at Willmans' place are told and retold at the grocery store and the meat market by the women who happen to meet there, while wherever men do congregate, be it in a bar-room, barber shop or on the street corners, or even at church, the latest bulletin of the ghost's doings is sure to have their interested attention.

That there is a ghost at Willman's is accepted as a fact beyond dispute. That this should be so is the more remarkable because no one has ever seen the uneasy spirit that is causing all this talk in Lemont. The only point on which the people of Lemont differ is as to the nature of this ghost and its remarkable manifestations. Some think the goings on at the Willmans' house are the direct work of Satan himself. Others talk of witchcraft and the annals of certain occurrences at Salem, Mass., a couple of centuries or so ago are being studied as having within them a possible clew to the present disturbances. The believers in the practice of witchcraft have one strong point in favor of their theory which they never fail to spring on the incredulous. It is a black cat.

In the art magical and diabolical as practiced by witches there has always been two inseparable adjuncts—the broomstick and the black cat. In the tales that cluster around the ghost at Willmans there is one of the most remarkable black cats that was ever known in reality or in legend. When the advocates of the witchcraft theory call on this sable animal as proof positive, the believers in the ghost theory observe:

"That black cat! Why, that's the devil himself! Everyone knows that when the devil appears on earth he always takes the appearance of a black cat!"

This argument is generally a poser and one that the witchcraft advocates are unable to get over. But if they cannot answer it, they are not shaken in their belief, and this very uncertainty lends a certain delicious thrill to the doings at Willmans.

HOW WILLMANS ARE ANNOYED.

The Willmans family consists of Seraphino Willmans, his wife, three daughters and one son. Mr. Willmans and his wife are of German descent, but were both born and reared in Will county, the farm on which they live having been the home of Mr. Willmans' parents. Anna, the oldest child, is the daughter of Mr. Willmans by his first wife and is 16. Of the three children of the present Mrs. Willmans a boy of 12 is the eldest. The family lives in a comfortable, old-fashioned farmhouse four miles from Lemont, and up to six weeks or two months ago their life was as calm and uneventful as the life of the farmer is in any community.

Then the placid calm of the farmhouse life was invaded by some unknown and unseen visitor, the account of whose doings appear incredible in this twentieth century, but the accuracy of which is vouched for by so many veracious and reputable people as to leave the skeptic not a place to stand upon. The ghost that frequents the Willamns place, as has been said before, has never been seen. Its antics, however, stamp it as one with a most malignant and mischievous mind. Most ghosts, according to the annals pertaining to them, are satisfied to prowl around noiselessly and scare mortals out of their wits by appearing before them in a more or less transparent condition. They are also held to be the spirits of those who have been murdered or who have committed suicide, or victims of some other crime that prevents them resting peaceably in their graves.

As there has never been any crime attached to the Willmans place or family, this condition cannot be held to account for the ghostly manifestations at the farmhouse. And the pranks of this evil spirit are altogether unlike any that the annals of ghost lore tell of. The Willmans' ghost has a decided penchant for writing letters. In the last two months the ghost has written over a hundred messages to the family. All of them have a menacing tone and many of them are so vulgar and obscene in expression as to be unprintable. Besides writing letters, the ghost delights in playing pranks on the Willmans and chance visitors to the house, and has got the family in such a state of mind that it has ceased to wonder at anything it may do.

NOTES MYSTERIOUSLY DROPPED.

One of the most singular things about this ghost is the manner in which it manages to convey the letters it writes to the Willmans. The family may be sitting in one of the rooms of the house, or it may be at the table eating, when a letter will flutter down apparently from the ceiling and lodge on the table. The doors and windows are protected by screens, so the theory that some one might have thrown the note in, is an untenable one. Day or night makes no difference to the ghost, which appears to be always on duty. Half a dozen staid, sober, and intelligent witnesses, including the priest of the Catholic church to which the Willmans belong, have at various times been present at the Willmans' house and have seen the notes suddenly appearing in the air and dropping down on the table or the floor under circumstances which they assert preclude the idea that mortal agency is responsible for the production.

Sometimes the Willmans get up in the morning and find a note or two stuck in the crack of the door or lying on the porch of the house. The notes reveal a most intimate knowledge of everything that goes on in the house. The secret counsels of the priest to the father and mother, which were delivered under circumstances that made it positive no one else heard them, were a source of much amusement and delight to the ghost, and in a letter which fluttered down at Mrs. Willmans' feet an hour or so after the priest's departure, the ghost repeated practically verbatim the advice that the priest had given to the couple It did this, it said, to assure them that it was present all the time, and further asserted that the plans of the priest to exorcise it would come to naught.

GHOST DEFIES A PRIEST.

As a last resort, the Willmans, who are devout Catholics, called on their priest, the Rev. Father Westarp, pastor of St. Alphonsus' church in Lemont, to use his spiritual powers and allay the evil influence that was haunting their house. A week ago last Thursday Father Westarp went over to the Willmans' home and solemnly exorcised the place. For thirty-six hours the ghost took a rest, and then it began its pranks again, and has been at it since with redoubted vigor.

When a reporter for the Sunday Inter Ocean called on Father Westarp and asked him as to the truth of the tales current about the supernatural visitant of the Willmans he displayed the utmost reluctance to talk of the matter. He finally did so, however, and confessed himself most wofully puzzled by the entire affair.

"In this age of the world," said the father, "it appears absurd to talk of ghosts or evil spirits, and so I would have said before investigating what is going on at the Willmans' place. But what I have witnessed there with my own eyes and what has been told me by persons whom I know to be absolutely reliable leaves me no option but to believe that an agency that is not mortal is responsible for them.

"It is quite true that I have exorcised the place according to the rites prescribed by the church. I obtained authority from Archbishop Feehan to do so, and Thursday week, accompanied by a Franciscan priest, went over there for that purpose. After I had performed the ceremony the Franciscan did the same.

SURPRISE FOR FATHER WESTARP

"In cases of this nature, after the ceremony of exorcism has been performed, the priest has to leave a pencil and paper on a table in the house before he withdraws. On this paper the evil spirit has to write his name and the causes that have induced it to haunt the home before it departs to its proper abode. It must do so, and this is a sign that it has ceased to torment mortals. We left the paper and pencil on the table and after an interval went back into the house to see if the exorcism had been effective. The paper was as blank as when we placed it there. I was then satisfied that the evil spirit had not been dislodged from the place and when it again began its pranks I was not astonished. But there have been cases known where several exorcisms have been necessary before the supernatural agency was overcome, and this is evidently one of them. I shall try again, probably.

"In all my life I have never known of anything like the occurrences at the Willmans place. It is a hard thing for me to do so, but when you see these things there is no other course open for one except to believe, wild and improbable as the story appears. The first letter that the Willmans got was about two months ago and was to the effect that the writer gave them ten days to leave the place or else some dire calamity would befall them. This letter appeared to them suddenly one day when they were at dinner and under circumstances that made it impossible that any person could have thrown it into the house. After that they received letters every day, sometimes two or three a day. When I have been at the house myself talking with them, suddenly a letter would appear on the floor at my feet, where a second before there was nothing.

"When the Willmans did not quit the place at the expiration of the ten days the ghost appeared by the tone of his letters to be very angry. Then he began to write letters threatening to kidnap the younger children. He also made threats about Anna, the eldest girl. Here is one of the letters."

THREATENING LETTER FROM GHOST.

Father Westarp went to his desk and took out a package containing several letters written by the ghost, and which had dropped down in the Willmans home at various times. The letter pertaining to Anna ran about as follows:

"You will not live any longer than your mother did. You don't know what killed your mother. I did it."

The letter was written in a hand that looked very much like that of a schoolboy, or of an adult who had never had much occasion to use the pen, and the ordinary rules of spelling and capitalization were totally ignored. There were also certain idioms and twists of construction that betrayed that the ghost when on earth was of German birth or descent, but as that section if the country is peopled almost exclusively by Germans and their descendants there is nothing surprising in this fact.

"Anna's mother died when she was 25 years old," continued Father Westarp, "so you see the ghost, or whatever agency it is that writes these letters, is thoroughly posted on the family's affairs. Here are some other letters that treat of certain events in the family of relatives some miles away, of all of which the ghost appears to be fully informed."

Father Westarp produced three letters for inspection, and which belonged to the vulgar and obscene class mentioned. "What a mess of nastiness!" exclaimed the father, as the Inter Ocean reporter ran his eyes over them.

EVIL SPIRIT IN BLACK CAT.

"Here is another incident," said the father, "which shows the malevolent nature of the ghost, and the delight it has in any misfortune that befalls the family. For some time the cows of Mr. Willmans had been falling off in their milk. One night when Mr. Willmans had gone down to the pasture after the cows, and was driving them up to the barn, he noticed a large black cat among them. Now, there is no such an animal about his place or that of any of his neighbors. Mr. Willmans had his shotgun along with him, for ever since these strange occurrences he has never gone far without it. When he saw this black cat among his cows his suspicions were aroused, and he raised his gun to his shoulder intending to kill the cat.

"He had no sooner done this than the cat gave a terrific leap and vanished. Mr. Willmans did not even get a chance to take aim. The next day this letter fell in the house

"Do you want to know why your cows have stopped giving milk? I'll tell you. I did it. Ha! Ha! You thought you'd put a charge of shot in my hinder last night, didn't you? But I fooled you."

"Now see," continued Father Westarp, "what an intimate knowledge the ghost has of everything that goes on about the place. Evil spirits are said to sometimes take the form of a black cat, and it is quite possible that this animal was the bodily manifestation of the ghost. It seems nonsensical and incredible, doesn't it, to talk in such a manner, but the occurrences at the Willmans' are enough to weaken the doubts of the most confirmed skeptics.

"For instance, if anyone told you such a story as I am going to tell now, you would say that they were mentally weak, and if anybody had told it to me before these occurrences I would have told them the same thing. But I know this to be a fact. Mr. Willmans and his son, the boy of twelve, were in the barn milking the cows one evening about a month ago. Of a sudden the boy calls to his father:

"'Oh, father, look here! My cow is giving cheese, not milk!'

"Mr. Willmans stopped milking the cow he was engaged with at the time, and, going over to his son, found that the boy had only told him what was the truth. As fast as the lad drew the milk from the cow, and as soon as it struck the milk pail, it turned to cheese. Did ever anyone hear of such a thing? Mr. Willmans told the boy to get up and he would try the cow. As soon as he began to milk her she gave milk just like the others. As soon as he stopped and the lad again milked her she gave cheese. How is it possible to explain such happenings?" asked the father, rubbing his head until every hair stood on end, in his perplexity.

GHOST TEARS UP PAPER.

"These letters," continued the father, "as you can see, are written on all kinds of paper—regular note paper, common wrapping paper, and some even on cardboard. Some are writen with ink, some with bluing, and others with pencil. Mrs. Willmans had a package of box note paper which she kept in the cupboard in the kitchen, and in the same place was a bottle of ink and a pen. The ghost used to take this paper and write his letters on it, and use the ink also. Finally I told Mrs. Willmans to get rid of all the writing paper in the house, and she did so, as she thought. That day she had a visitor, one whom I know and whose word is thoroughly reliable. While he was sitting talking to her in the kitchen she had occasion to go to the cupboard for something, and there found a pad of paper which she had overlooked. She took it out of the cupboard and laid it on the kitchen table, in plain view of herself and the visitor, at the same time saying:

"'Father Westarp told me to get rid of all the writing paper, and I find this pad that I had overlooked.'

"She had no sooner made this remark than the pad of paper was lifted off the table before their eyes, and some power, holding it suspended there in mid air, tore it into two pieces as if it had been a single sheet and let it drop on the table. Did ever anybody hear or see the like? Can you suggest any explanation for it except magic?" asked the father.

"Another day Mrs. Willmans was doing her washing out on the porch and had a bottle of blueing which she set down alongside her. When she got through and went into the house she found a letter which had been written with this bluing instead of ink. Frequently she would go to the cupboard after her pen only to find that the pen was missing. She would shut the cupboard up and without leaving the room wait a little while and then go to the cupboard and find the pen in its accustomed place. No one in the meantime had been near the cupboard, and as it is built against a solid wall it was impossible for any one to have obtained access to it without Mrs. Willmans seeing them.

WILLMANS' DOG IS TERRIFIED.

"As mysterious in its nature as the tearing of the pad of paper of which I have told was an occurrence which happened one day when Nicholas Welter, highway commissioner of the town and a relative of the Willmans, was visiting the family. Mr. Welter is about as skeptical a man about things supernatural as you can find, but he has had his doubts resolved into certainty by what he has seen at the Willmans'. The day I speak of Mr. Welter was sitting in the kitchen talking to Mrs. Willmans when the latter had occasion to go to the cupboard for something. When she had opened the cupboard door she saw that the pen had been taken away from its accustomed place, and, of course, she knew where it had gone to. Leaving the cupboard door open, so that she and Mr. Welter could see into it, she went back to her seat and said:

"'The ghost has taken the pen away. We'll watch and see it brought back.'

"The two sat there a few minutes when, sure enough, the pen was restored to its usual place before their eyes. Certainly mortal agencies are not capable of performing such acts, are they?

"The Willmans have a very fine pure-bred shepherd dog, and they are, I am told, the very best kind of watch dogs. At the times when these letters drop about the place this dog exhibits the greatest terror. It would seem as if there was something that is hidden from human eyes that is plainly perceptible to the dog. Sometimes the dog will be outside the house and suddenly will seem possessed by a frenzy to get inside, and will almost tear the door down in its efforts. On such occasions the Willmans will be sure to find a letter from their ghostly correspondent. If the animal is inside the house it will of a sudden be possessed to get outside, and will exhibit signs of the greatest terror, and that is the sure precursor of another letter, which may drop at once on the floor. 'How is it,' asked Father Westarp, 'can an animal see things that are hidden from man? The story of Balaam and his ass would seem to indicate that they can.'

DAUBS A COAT WITH GREASE.

"The malignant and mischievous disposition of this ghost is also displayed by the mean tricks it plays on people who visit the house. Only last week Mrs. Willmans' father, who is 80 years old, called to spend the day with his daughter. He hung his hat and coat up in the parlor, and he and those of the family who were home sat in the kitchen adjoining To get into the parlor anybody would have to pass through the kitchen, and all the parlor widows were tightly locked.

"When it came time for the old gentleman to go his hat could not be found. It was later discovered out in the yard, about 100 feet from the house, filled with dirt and decayed apples. His coat was still hanging where he had placed it, but it had been smeared down the front with butter, and almost ruined. The only butter that Mrs. Willmans had in the house was kept in a closet in the kitchen, where all the family had been sitting, and it was impossible for any one to have gone to this closet and taken out the butter without being seen. Yet, when Mrs. Willmans went to this cupboard to look after the butter there was the print of five fingers which had scooped through the dish and grabbed out a handful to smear over the coat. The old gentleman has two pairs of spectacles, which he had laid on a table when he went after his coat. When he looked for them they could not be found. They were at last recovered, one pair being in a cuspidor and the other in the coal scuttle.

"The letters which the Willmans received, besides displaying the most intimate acquaintance with the doings of the family and their relations, also showed a miraculous knowledge of what was to happen. As sure as there is going to be any visitors to the house the ghost knows all about it. The family will receive a letter via the air line, telling them that so and so is to call that day, and the information is always verified by the appearance of the persons designated in the letter.

GHOST DESTROYS THE LETTERS.

"After I had exorcised the house," continued Father Westarp, "I left the family a cross which contained certain holy relics, and this Mrs. Willmans placed in a drawer in a closet. Along with this she placed a gold ring which was in a box, and then she locked the drawer. Within five or ten minutes afterward this ring was dashed onto the floor and the drawer was still locked. When Mrs. Willmans unlocked the drawer and looked inside, the box that had contained the ring was apparently untouched.

"In the cupboard which contained the ink bottle and pens the ghost appeared to be of a meddlesome disposition. If Mrs. Willmans left the cork in the bottle, she would find it lying alongside it when she again went there. If she left it out of the ink bottle, it would be placed in it when she next went to the cupboard. I gave Mrs. Willmans a piece of blessed palm when I exorcised the house, and this Mrs. Willmans burned and blew the smoke from it into the open ink bottle. After doing so she said:

"'There, I'll bet that ghost doesn't put that cork back in that bottle again!'

"And, sure enough, it never did," continued Father Westarp, "nor would it ever use the ink after that time. It then took the lead pencil. As I had told Mrs. Willmans to get rid of all the writing paper in the house, it was frequently at a loss for material on which to write. It would then get scraps of any kind of paper and inscribe its messages on them. Since I exorcised the place several letters have been received, and I told Mrs. Willmans that she should save all these for me, she having burned all the others she had received except the few in my possession. She had four or five of these letters put away and was going to bring them to me last Sunday. They were in a closet under lock and key, and she alone had the key. When she went to get them out they had disappeared, and she is certain that no one in the house could have obtained access to them.

"One of these letters showed the sacreligious nature of the ghost and was received after I had performed the exorcism. In it the ghost said that it had been present at the ceremony, and ridiculed it. 'Oh, oh, oh!' it said 'how I did laugh at seeing you all on your knees and praying!' What do you think of such a letter? It must be a demon."

STORY WELL VOUCHED FOR.

If the Willmans were ignorant people, the weird tales that are told of the occurrences at their place might lack in credibility. But as a matter of fact, they are bright and inteiligent people, and apparently the last ones in the world to be led away by superstitious fears. They do not like to talk of the occurrences at their home, and will only do so to a limited extent. Mrs. Willmans corroborated all that Father Westarp had said about their peculiar visitor, but was inclined to think that the unusual occurrences were due to witchcraft rather than to a ghost. As an instance of the manner in which this malignant being found something on which to write after she had cut off its supply of writing paper by Father Westarp's direction, she said that the ghost had gone to a closet in which she kept a bonnet in a bandbox, and had torn the bottom of the bandbox off in order to write a note on the piece.

Some days ago Mr. Willmans was engaged in putting in a pane of glass in one of the windows of the parlor. He had no putty, and to hold the glass in place until he could procure some, was fastening it in with tacks. These he had in a tin dish, which he placed on the window sill. Reaching down for a tack after having driven one into place, he was surprised to find that there were none in the dish, although it had been nearly full a moment before. The mystery of their disappearance was explained when he looked around the parlor floor. It was strewn with tacks, evidently by the ghost, as there had been no one else in the room.

Mrs. Jungles, a relative of the Willmans, tells a story of what she saw of the ghost's mischievousness one day when she was visiting the house. In the room where she was sitting was a pitcher of water standing on the floor. Without any one being near the pitcher, and while Mrs. Jungles was looking directly at it, this pitcher tipped slowly over and all the water in it was spilled on the floor. When emptied the pitcher slowly resumed its normal position.

Mr. Welter, who is a prosperous and intelligent farmer, and who was present in the house at the time of the replacing of the pen in its place by some invisible agency, also assured the Sunday Inter Ocean reporter that the occurrence as related by Father Westarp was accurate in every respect. As to the cause of the queer happenings he had no explanation to offer. "I never believed in such things before," he said, "but there is something there that will convince any one who investigates it that it is not the doings of mortals."

As a matter of fact, the good priest is at a loss for an explanation of the mystery. He is deeply exercised over the matter, because it affects the peace of good members of his flock, and he would like to relieve them. The relations between a German Catholic priest and his people are, as a rule, much closer than they are between priest and people of other nationalities, and it sincerely grieves Father Westarp that his efforts have so far been unavailing. He is inclined to think that some enemy of the Willmans may be responsible for the letters, and that, by the exercise of hypnotic power, this enemy may compel some one else to write the letters and yet remain in complete ignorance of the act. But, after having evolved a theory to that point, the priest is at a loss to explain the method in which the letters are transmitted to their destination or any of the other phenomena which have occurred at the Willmans' place.

"There is only one way to explain it," he says in his perplexity, "and that is in the words of your English writer, Shakspeare:

"'There are more things in heaven and earth, Horatio, than are dreamt of in your philosophy.'"

The obvious and most natural explanation of the mysterious performances is that they are the work of some member of the family, but this theory is an untenable one when its makeup is taken into consideration, together with the annoyances they have had to endure. Of the six members of the family, there are only four on whom such a suspicion could possibly rest. They are the father and mother, the oldest daughter, and the boy. The other two children are too young to have even a suspicion directed against them.

It would be the sheerest folly, in the first place, to even suspect the parents of perpetrating such tricks, even if they possessed the dexterity to perform feats of legerdemain. The fact they appealed to their priest to rid them of the evil spirit is in itself, to those who know the German Catholic character, a complete bar to suspicion. To people brought up in the faith, as they have been, such an act would have been sacrilege and the last thing ever to be done, no matter what the motives or desires that might have induced them to deceive others. Therefore the parents must be eliminated from any such hypothesis.

There remains, then only the daughter and the 12-year-old son. The daughter is an innocent, unsophisticated country girl, and even if a breath of suspicion could point to her the vile language used in some of the letters received would completely absolve her from suspicion, as it would be a simple impossibility for a modest girl to pen the obscene words that some of these letters fairly revel in. Besides, her hand-writing is too well known to her parents and friends, and in the space of two months in which these things have been happening, detection would have been sure to come. The daughter must therefore be dismissed from the case.

There remains, threfore, only the boy of 12. The fact that many of these weird happenings take place while he is out with his father on the farm, seem to let him out of consideration, even if his youth did not act as a bar to suspicion. It is not conceivable that a boy of 12 would have the ability to conceive or to carry out to a successful conclusion such a series of villainous pranks as have taken place at the Willman's home, even if he were a depraved little wretch, instead of the bright and hearty little fellow that he is.

Last of all, as exonerating the family from the suspicion of complicity in the matter, is the testimony of creditable eye-witnesses of the ghost's pranks. One man might have been deceived with ease, possibly, but when a dozen or more people testify in unison as to what has occurred in their presence, their words must be given consideration and belief.

Mrs. Willmans has a theory as to the motive back of these uncanny occurrences at her home. It appears that the place is to be sold next spring to wind up the estate. "I think," says Mrs. Willmans, "that some one who wants to get the property is doing all this, in the hope that it will give the place a bad name, and so diminish its value when the time for the sale comes."

But as to how these interested parties are able to accomplish the magical things that they do, Mrs. Willmans has no explanation to offer other than "witchcraft."—Chicago Inter Ocean.

SPIRIT COMMUNION.

If when I die I do return
To hold communion with my friends,
Will they my kindly message spurn,
Declaring death my being ends?
Will they refuse to lift the veil
That shields my presence from their eyes,
And make my every effort fail,
No matter how my spirit tries?

Will they allow their bonds of clay
To so mislead the soul within,
That they may coldly turn away,
And shout that fraud is working sin?
Or, may they urge, in Christ's behalf,
That 'tis the devil's snare for souls,
And turn aside with mocking laugh,
When my quick thought some mind controls?

Or will they be so cold and dull,
So chained by ancient form and cant,
And let some priest their reason lull
By his hypnotic look and rant,
That love's dear mission they ignore,
And place their trust in Jewish God,
Whom innocents despoiled of yore,
And tinged with blood fair Canaan's sod?

If I may live beyond the throe
That sends this clay from off life's track,
'Tis common reason bids me know
My loved ones here would call me back;
No heaven so fair, no bliss so sweet,
That could my presence long detain
From her whose love I know would greet
My oft repeated calls again.

No God whom I have never seen,
No saint whom I have never known,
Could my affections wholly wean
From those whose life has been my own.
Or, if I am so wholly changed
That love and friendship is forgot—
From all sweet memories estranged—
'Twere quite the same if I were not.

And as I hope to be received,
When I turn back across the line,
In ways my soul will not have grieved,
I welcome spirit friends of mine;
I reach my hands to bid them come,
My heart and bosom open wide,
And fain would keep our love-lit home
A fit place where they may abide.

Our Fall and Winter Campaign.

The Fall and Winter Campaign of The Progressive Thinker will be especially brilliant. It will be unusually attractive and instructive. It will lead you on to a higher plane. It will make you happier, wiser and better. It will blossom into something brighter, fresher, and more startling, and will be a surprise to you in a variety of ways. Among the many attractions will be the debate between the brilliant Materialist, W. F. Jamieson, and the profound and eloquent Moses Hull. It will make most excellent reading for fall and winter evenings, and we are not sure but what it will so scintillate with the friction of happy hits on both sides that lights can be dispensed with while reading it on a cloudy evening. We are sure that every Spiritualist, Freethinker and Materialist will want to read this debate, and thus become wiser and better. Tell your Spiritualist friends of this debate and request them to send to this office at least 25 cents for a three months' subscription to The Progressive Thinker. No Spiritualist can afford to be without this remarkable debate.

OLD AND NEW PSYCHOLOGY.

BY W. J. COLVILLE.

Reports of twenty-four distinct lectures, recently delivered in New York, Brooklyn, Boston, Philadelphia and other prominent cities of the United States, have contributed the basis of this volume.

The chief aim throughout the volume has been to arouse increased interest in the workable possibilities of a theory of human nature, thoroughly optimistic and at the same time, profoundly ethical. As several chapters are devoted to improved methods of education, the writer confidently expects that many parents, teachers and others who have charge of the young, or who are called upon to exercise supervision over the morally weak and mentally afflicted, will derive some help from the doctrines herewith promulgated.

THE GOSPEL OF NATURE.

IT IS A MOST EXCELLENT WORK.

This work is by DR. M. L. SHERMAN, assisted by PROF. W. F. LYON. Heretofore it has been sold for $2, but the price now has been reduced to $1. It is a book that will interest and instruct. It contains 480 pages, and is full of suggestive thoughts. Dr. Sherman was a medium of rare qualities, and his work is a reflection from the celestial spheres. It treats of the Soul of Things; Intelligence in Substance; Animal Intellects; Purity; Salvation; Discords; Good and Evil; Unnatural Ideas; Church History; Progression; Inherent in Substance; The Nebulous Theory; Particles are Entities; Justice; Impregnation of the Virgin; The Science of Death; Spiritual Death; Immortality; Mourning; The Confounding of Language; The Spirit Abodes; Matter and Spirit; Size and Distance; Spiritual Organisms; Born Again; The Key; Spirit Biography; Goes to Heaven; A Slave Master; etc., etc.

The author says: "Each individual partakes of both physical and mental or spiritual ailment for himself. Each one must digest their various kinds of food for themselves, and that is all they can possibly do whether they be priest or layman, teacher or pupil. My physical expands by virtue of that food and nourishment of which I individually partake and digest. My soul must expand by virtue of the soul essence which I individually gather and comprehend or digest." For sale at this office.

The To-Morrow of Death,

---OR THE---

Future Life According to Science.

BY LOUIS FIGUIER.

TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH BY S. R. CROCKER.

A VERY FASCINATING WORK.

This fine volume might well have been entitled Spiritualism Demonstrated by Science. It is written in that peculiar interesting style in which French writers excel when they would popularize scientific subjects in adaptation to the needs of the general reader. The author is not a Spiritualist—he even mentions Spiritualists as "devotees of a new superstition," etc., in which he manifests the usual animus of the "scientific class," yet he says again: "There is a true and respectable idea in Spiritualism," and regards as proved "the fact of communication between superhumans and the inhabitants of Earth;" and he goes on to relate instances of fact in evidence. There is, to a Spiritualist, a manifest discrepancy in the author's ideas, but the well-read mind will readily select and arrange the pros and cons, and out of the whole will find not only good mental culture, but much valuable information. The author holds the theory of reincarnation. Price $1.25. For sale at this office.

A. Schopenhauer Essays.

Translated by T. B. Saunders. Cloth, 75c.

CONTENTS.—The Wisdom of Life; Counsels and Maxims;; Religion and other Essays; The Art of Literature; Studies in Pessimism.

"Schopenhauer is one of the few philosophers who can be generally understood without a commentary. All his theories claim to be drawn direct from facts, to be suggested by observation, and to interpret the world as it is; and whatever view he takes, he is constant in his appeal to the experience of common life. This characteristic endows his style with a freshness and vigor which would be difficult to match in the philosophical writing of any country, and impossible in that of Germany."—Translator.

"NO BEGINNING."

An Excellent Work for Thinkers.

This book, "No Beginning," is by William H. Maple. The Arena says of it: "The argument is unanswerable. The book will at once appeal to the reason of every reader, and leave him more amazed than ever at the prevalence of the theory of Creation." The Two has always been a fateful num- Free Thought Ideal says: "We found it full of glittering thoughts for thinkers, and the very death warrant of Christian superstition shines upon its pages." Price 75 cents.

REINCARNATION.

A Leading Work On That Subject.

This is a newly edited and revised production of Mr. Walker's great work by News E. Wood, A. M., M. D. It is brought down to date by the addition of new matter. It has the following fourteen chapters: "Reincarnation Defined and Explained," "Evidences of Reincarnation," "Astral Pictures of Successive Incarnations," "Objections to Reincarnation," "Reincarnation Among the Ancients," "Reincarnation in the Bible," "Reincarnation in Early Christendom," "Reincarnation in the East To-day," "Esoteric Oriental Reincarnation," "Transmigration through Animals," "Death, Heaven and Hell," "Karma, the Companion Truth of Reincarnation," "Western Writers on Reincarnation," "Mr. Walker's Conclusions." As the book stands, it is the most complete, logical, clear and convincing work on the subject extant. Price, postpaid, in handsome leatherette, 50 cents. For sale at this office.

Do Not Let This Pass Unnoticed by You · THE TWO CHAMPIONS--REV. MOSES HULL AND W. F. JAMIESON · Their Debate Is Now Under Way.

READ THIS CAREFULLY The Great Debate of the Twentieth Century, between Rev. Moses Hull, Spiritualist, and W. F. Jamieson, Materialist, is now under way. In offering this wonderful attraction to our readers, we are presenting them something prepared with painstaking care, and which will become a staple article in the Literature of Spiritualism. Is it asking our readers too much to hustle a little for The Progressive Thinker, the largest Spiritual paper on earth to-day, and which combines CHEAPNESS and EXCELLENCE. While we are doing so much, why can't you do a little hustling and send in an additional subscriber; send in a trial subscription for three months, at a cost of TWENTY-FIVE CENTS? Twenty-five cents is a very small sum, yet that amount will prove acceptable as a starter. In some localities a dozen or more trial subscriptions can be obtained. Please hustle, then, at once, and aid us in the great work. If you want to send the paper to your friends for three months, we will allow you to send in a club of 7 trial subscriptions for $1.00, a little less than cost.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 16, 1901.

Reply to a Correspondent.

A correspondent inquires: "Was the papyrus found by Greenfelt & Hunt, of the Egyptian Exploring Fund, of any value?"

The answer depends upon the value placed on "finds" of that character, with no knowledge of the time, place, under what circumstances, or by whom the papyrus rolls were written. The simple act of finding manuscripts where so many of them are known to be forgeries of modern date, given the appearance of antiquity, carries with it no evidence of genuineness.

The papyrus, whatever the facts in regard to its genuineness, contained a large part of the first chapter of Matthew, and corroborates the present accepted version. It tells of the Lord appearing in a dream and saying:

"Joseph, thou son of David, fear not to take unto thee Mary, thy wife, for that which is conceived in her is of the Holy Ghost."

Now if any alleged dream of near two thousand years ago, telling of such an improbability has any value, the find is valuable, otherwise not.

The same correspondent inquires: "What are the ruins of Oxyrhynchus, where the papyrus was found?"

They are situated 140 miles south of Cairo, near where the pretended Logia, otherwise "Sayings of Jesus," were claimed to have been found some years ago. Gibbon represents a monastic institution was anciently located there, in which it was computed there were 10,000 females and 20,000 males. Egypt was overrun by monasteries both before and after our era. Establish the claim that these finds are genuine, and of an early date, then it is possible we would have a key telling where all the Gospels were written. We apprehend, however, that Gibbon, the historian, was misled, not as to there being monasteries in Egypt at the early date given, but as to the character of those monks. We have good evidence that monasteries were established by the Buddhists in Egypt, more than two centuries before our era, by the missionaries of that religion sent out from India under the reign of Asoka.

A Striking Similarity.

That well-known English author, Wm. Cobbett, seems to have been greatly prejudiced against the clergy. He put himself on record as follows, and was not prosecuted for libel:

"I have sometimes been half tempted to believe the Magpie first suggested to tyrants the idea of having a tithe-eating Clergy. The Magpie devours the corn and grain; so does the Parson. The Magpie takes the wool from the sheep's back; so does the Parson. The Magpie devours alike the young animals and the eggs; so does the Parson. The Magpie's clack is everlastingly going; so is the Parson's. The Magpie repeats by rote words that are taught it; so does the Parson. The Magpie is always skipping and hopping and peeping into other's nests; so is the Parson. The Magpie's color is partly black and partly white; so is the Parson's. The Magpie's greediness, impudence, and cruelty are proverbial; so are those of the Parson."

Afraid of His Shadow.

The tyrant who sees in every shadow an avenging Nemesis cannot be more sensitive to danger than is the average cleric, ever on the watch for the protection of his cult.

Hall Caine, the novelist, lately published "The Eternal City." It seems, to illustrate a point in his book, he drew somewhat on Pius IX and Leo XIII, thus rounding out his character of a Pope. This incensed his Catholic readers. As he clothed his fictitious hero with some sterling virtues, this annoyed Protestants, and arrayed them against his book. The novelist appears a zealous Christian, but even the slightest hint from his pen, that churchmen are not all they claim, endangers his literary reputation.

The Progressive Thinker long ago reached the conclusion, that the only safety in the conduct of a paper, or in ideas promulgated in books, is to be honest, conscientious and truthful, and allow others to entertain, and even to express hostile opinions. Truth loses nothing in a combat with error.

An Effective Soporific.

Said a preacher at a ministerial conference: "I am terribly troubled with insomnia. I lie awake at night hour after hour, thinking about my sermons." To which a brother: "Why don't you get up and read portions of those sermons?"

The good brother could see no reason why a sermon acting as a soporific on the listener should not have a similar effect on the author.

The Talmud Is Not Reliable.

Many people seem to suppose the Talmud is a Jewish production, whose origin is unquestioned. Citations are made from it to prove Christian claims, as if everything therein stated is incontrovertable truth, particularly if it makes concessions in favor of Christian claims.

It is well known to those best acquainted with the Talmud, and the language in which it professes to have been originally written, that the production is a fraud, and its statements are in no sense trustworthy.

Than Rev. Dr. Farrar, of the Church of England, author of "Life of Christ," there is no more scholarly, or better qualified to express an opinion on the subject. Be so kind, good reader, as to open the 2d volume of the above work, page 485, and read:

"Anything more utterly unhistorical than the Talmud cannot be conceived. It is probable no human writings confounded names, dates, and facts with a more absolute indifference. The genius of the Jews is the reverse of what in these days we should call historical. * * Some excellent maxims—even some close parallels to the utterances of Christ—may be quoted, of course, from the Talmud, where they lie embedded like pearls in 'a sea' of obscurity and mud. It seems to me indispensable—and a matter which every one can now verify for himself—that these are amazingly few, considering the vast bulk of national literature from which they are drawn. And, after all, who shall prove to us that these sayings were always uttered by the rabbis to whom they were attributed? Who will supply us with the faintest approach to proof that (when not founded on the Old Testament) they were not directly or indirectly DUE TO CHRISTIAN INFLUENCE OR CHRISTIAN THOUGHT?"

This statement of Rev. Dr. Farrar is corroborated by a writer in the Edinburgh Review of July, 1873, p. 18, who said:

"The Talmud may compete with the Constitutions of Loyola for the right to be considered the most irresistible organ ever FORGED for the subjugation of the human will."

It must mean something when so distinguished a prelate as Rev. Dr. Farrar suggests, as he certainly does, that "Christian influence and Christian thought," is responsible for at least portions of the Talmud.

It may be proper to state in this connection, that we hold in our hand as we write, a handsome volume, from the pen of Rev. Bernhard Pick, Ph. D., entitled "The Talmud, What It Is, and What It Knows About Jesus and His Followers." The book was evidently written from a Christian standpoint.

After making a quotation from the Amsterdam edition of the Talmud of 1645, and showing later editions had been doctored by the omission of certain words, which are therein inclosed in brackets, the author goes on to say, the occurrence of the flight of Jesus into Egypt "is an anachronism, for JOSHUA [the Hebrew name by which it is claimed Jesus was known,] LIVED A CENTURY BEFORE CHRIST."

What kind of authority is that which makes a discrepancy of one hundred years in dates?

Joshua, generally rendered Jesus in our English translations, was a common Hebrew name, frequently occurring in everything professedly Hebrew. Is it not possible the gospel account of the flight of Joshua, otherwise Jesus, into Egypt was borrowed from the Talmud, regardless of the date of the occurrence? Remember always: "Great is the mystery of godliness."

Much to Learn.

The orthodox mother of a bright five-year-old boy of our acquaintance, writes from France, where the family is temporarily sojourning:

"In looking at his 'Story of the Bible' the other day, I explained some pictures to Henry, and told him Christ was taken prisoner by the soldiers and killed. He asked why God allowed them to do that, and burst out crying. A moment later he said: 'God wasn't kind to Christ to let them take him prisoner and kill him.' It was some time before I could comfort him. Poor little fellow, how very much there is for him to learn!"

It is hoped he will never become convinced that the Supreme Ruler of the universe ever sired a son by mortal maiden, and then allowed that son to be sacrificed to appease his great anger because of man's disobedience. It is the mother who ought to revise her teaching.

Halloween Nuisance.

Halloween is a Christian festival inherited from our Pagan ancestors. November first being All Saint's day, the spirits of the departed were credited with returning to earth the evening before, and engaging in all manner of wild pranks, making merry over the approach of the day made sacred to them. In its original no intrusion was made on the property-rights of others; but, cultured by Catholics, and of late years adopted in many localities by Protestants, the festival has become a nuisance which in the smaller cities requires the strong arm of civil authority to restrain. The name is derived from the old English halowe, signifying saint. It seems closely related to the eve of May day, when the fairies made mirth. The latter day has mostly gone out of use in America.

Correction.

"Two boys bound together with withes" in an article of last week headed "Death, an Incident of all Life," is good, and many boys need binding in some manner, but we wrote "logs" where "boys" appear; and it must be confessed they made better rafts than would the boys, however good at swimming.

And over there on the last column of the 4th page, in the closing paragraph of "Very Opportune," where we wrote "mechanical prayers," referring to the kind impelled by wind or wave, the typo substituted "progress." The latter word generally would be an improvement, but it did not fit in this case.

M'KINLEY AND CZOLGOSZ.

Poetic Vision of Their Meeting at the Traditional Golden Gate of Heaven.

I seem to see at Heaven's gate two men on entrance bent;
One was an assassin, the other a president.

The assassin in a stupor, or a dark and gloomy state,
Slow approaches old St. Peter for admission through the gate,
But before that aged watchman would permit him to pass through
He must pass upon his record for at least a year or two.
So he telephoned to central, but old Satan had the 'phone,
And replied that he must interview the victim all alone.
It just seemed that a description had been telepathed ahead
That upon a certain morning the assassin would be dead,
And as Satan "knows his victims," he was there ahead of time,
And had duly been apprised of the assassin's awful crime.

Then came Satan to St. Peter and thus spake with glad salute,
For his victim who was standing at the entrance, sad and mute:
"I am pleased, and at your service, and the fire is all aglow
In the special builded furnace where I cooked Booth and Guiteau."
Then St. Peter turned to Czolgosz to inform him of his fate,
And his eyes fell on McKinley standing just within the gate,
And his voice and smiling presence, unexpected at the time, Filled old Satan's burning bosom with emotions all sublime.
"I must beg your pardon, Peter, for my presence at your gate,
But I want to plead in heaven for this soul a better fate.
'Please do not let them hurt him,' for he surely is insane
On a subject he had pondered while upon the earthly plane;
He mistook me for a tyrant as a ruler of the poor,
And went crazy on the topic that to kill me was the cure."
In an instant Satan vanished and a light came from the skies,
And McKinley, calmly smiling, stood before Czolgosz's eyes;
Then a chorus of sweet voices sang the good old melody,
With McKinley—eyes uplifted—"Nearer, My God, to Thee."
The assassin's conscience smote him, and McKinley knew full well
That the poor, distracted spirit would not need a hotter hell.

Poor St. Peter sat in silence when this tragic scene had passed,
For a cloud of gloom and sorrow o'er his aged soul was cast; Knowing sinners in repentance would at once be made to see That old Satan is the conscience and from terror be set free;
This would rob the dear old watchman of a soft eternal place,
And no wonder gloom and sorrow came upon St. Peter's face.
He had learned that Earth's religion had been changed in recent years,
And that love had well supplanted all the old-time hates and fears.
Thus in silence sat St. Peter, for he hated to complain,
And he knew his own dethronement meant a universal gain.

* * * * * * *

Now I see McKinley lead his poor murderer to a spot
Where no sound could ever reach him; in a place that seemed forgot.
Here he, smiling, bows and leaves him to the gloom that is his own,
To the thoughts of his desertion in a desert, all alone.
There to think out his existence in the darkness of his soul;
There to ponder on his evil; there to drink from his own bowl.
There he left him with his conscience that had battled all in vain
To direct a high vibration through his poor deluded brain.
For an age it seemed to Czolgosz while in darkness he remained
Only conscious of his error and the punishment obtained.
But at last, his soul so heavy that he thought he should expire,
A great light loomed up before him like the flashing of a fire.
It was then his early teachings of the preachers o'er him fell,
Of the sinners and the Savior, and the everlasting hell.

* * * * * * *

Now I see the noble spirit of the martyred one descend
From his home of light and beauty to his now repentant friend.
He seemed filled with deep emotion as he took the fellow's hand
And he lifted him up higher toward a bright and better land;
And again I hear the voices of the angels from their height,
They were singing with such sweetness
"Lead, Kindly Light."

* * * * * * *

Each may have on earth his station
whether high or whether low,
Hell or heaven, his own creation, love and justice make it so.
Each one has his life to live, and each his real worth,
And each must take what life would give, e'en out beyond the earth.

DR. T. WILKINS.

Have the Courage of Your Convictions.

If all who have had personal experience with the phenomena of Spiritualism and become convinced of the truth thereof would make the fact known to the public, what a vast number of surprises would develop. Brother would surprise sister; sister would surprise brother; children would surprise parents; and parents would surprise children; husband would surprise wife, and wife would surprise husband; pastor would surprise parishioner and parishioner would surprise pastor until it would finally be apparent that Spiritualism is more universally believed and known than the public at present even dreams as being true.

Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond refers in one of her most interesting lectures to two prominent men who had been partners in business for many years without either one knowing that the other was a Spiritualist. Both for many years had personal knowledge of the truth of Spiritualism, but each one tried to keep from the other a knowledge of the fact.

We do not have sufficient decision of character. We are deficient in moral stamina. We are too gregarious intellectually. We are too much inclined to adopt the thoughts and opinions of the majority rather than to reason and think for ourselves. We are too anxious to be considered "in and up with the procession," rather than being regarded as "not in it," to use a slang phrase. And so we are very careful not to say or do anything that is not sure to meet with general, conventional acceptation. Our individual opinions and convictions, like our individual businesses, are swallowed up in trusts, syndicates, corporations and sects who seek to control them. The citizens of the United States of America are losing their individuality.

"One of the worst features of the concentrated life of modern times," says Orison Sweet Marden, "is the loss of individuality and personal characteristics.

"We do not find in our national life, at present day, the striking, strong individuality of early history. The hewing, polishing processes of modern civilization seem to grind away all of the sharp corners of individuality, and everything tends to assume a conventional form. People seem to be run in the same mold.

"A strong, striking character is a rare thing in these days. The individual is lost in the shuffle of the masses. Cities grind away and erase independence. Unfortunately there is many a man who seems to be content to be one of the crowd, and not a leader of the crowd.

"With some notable exceptions newspapers lack individuality. Their opinions are impersonal, and the editors are lost. Few people know who writes the editorials or the leading articles. The days of Dana, Greeley and Bowles seem to have gone forever. Nobody in particular is responsible for any opinion or policy. Everything is referred to the stockholders, directors, or trustees. Not only do the editors lose their individuality, but so also does everyone who is connected with each paper.

"Concentration in large centers is largely responsible for this. The dissemination of knowledge through newspapers and the multiplication of books, magazines, and libraries has added very materially to this unfortunate loss. The strength of a nation lies in the stalwart individuality of its citizens. When this is lost, civilization becomes insipid and powerless."

If in a gathering of neighbors, friends or strangers in the store, club, or on the street corner, there should chance to be a Spiritualist present listening to expressions bearing upon the truth or falsity of his belief or knowledge, why should he keep quiet—even if he be the only Spiritualist in the crowd? Why should he not assert his own individuality, his own opinions, his own knowledge even tho' he be a member of the faculty of a university of learning? If there is or is not any truth whatever in Modern Spiritualism the sooner the world knows it the better. Spiritualists are as anxious to know the truth concerning Modern Spiritualism as any other class of people and if they are in error it is the duty of the church and our colleges to enlighten them instead of ridiculing and ignoring Spiritualism.

The Bishops on Marriage.

The Episcopal Bishops in high court assembled, voted that henceforth not one of them would or should marry a man or woman who had been divorced. They did this, or would not do it, in the interests of morality. They would have their church set an example to all others. Now the laymen and "lesser clergy," "the house of deputies," of that church, in a convention at San Francisco, emphatically gave their leaders "a black eye," in repudiating their holy resolve. It seems that these great lights of the church knew a great deal less of law than of theology. The law of this country makes marriage a civil contract and not a religious sacrament. Hence the right to solemnize marriage is conferred by the State and may be taken away by the State. As it is, if a man and woman desire to be married, they may go to a Justice of the Peace, Judge of a Court, or a clergyman. The latter, in performing the ceremony, acts as a civil officer, and not as a priest. The State says who shall and who shall not marry, and when a couple present themselves to a clergyman requesting their union to be legally acknowledged, he has no right to go beyond the State and exact conditions. If he does thus set himself up superior to the State then the State can take away this conferred power altogether. That would be a deplorable loss to the clergy, especially the Episcopal, for the members of that church are usually wealthy—it is the church of the aristocracy, the church of forms and make-believe, rather than strenuous religion, and fat marriage fees are proverbial.

Renounce the Myths.

Mrs. Elizabeth E. Evans, author of "The Christ Myth," writing from Germany to the Truth Seeker, after recounting the inroads Catholicism has made and is making in the United States, says:

"The only successful weapon of defence against the charms of Catholicism, the only possible means of compassing her destruction, consists in entire renunciation of her myths, and complete devotion to the truths of science."

The Progressive Thinker heartily indorses Mrs. Evans' proposition.

The Two Evangelines.

I.

The world is full of pathetic scenes. Some of them arise from crime; others from sickness; others from vice, old age and poverty. The very atmosphere is tear-stained, and if all the sighs and moans of earth could be united into one volume a deafening sound greater than that of thunder or the belching of a volcano could be heard reverberating throughout the world. Not a particle of air exists that has not impressed thereon some plaintive sorrow, some deep-drawn sigh, some terrible suffering, some tear-stain. Not a minute passes that does not record excruciating pain that, like a vile demon, harasses some poor fragile creature. The germs of disease are everywhere spreading devastation and ruin. The typhoid germ may nestle in water, in milk, in food, in the air we breathe, watching for an unsuspecting victim. Pain, Sorrow, Trouble and Poverty are the companions of Joy, Mirthfulness, Wealth and Happiness. There is danger everywhere; absolute security from molestation nowhere.

God seems to be as much a God of Frowns, as a God of Peace and Happiness.

Everywhere is contention.

War on earth never for a single moment ceases.

There are contrasts—the good and the bad—everywhere on this earth.

If you can find a heaven on earth, you can find not far distant a hell.

While one builds the Temple of Goodness, another erects the Temple of Discord and Evil.

The world vibrates between the two extremes, the good and the bad, and in vain does one look for perfection. The sorrows of earth to the extreme sufferer seem tenfold greater than its joys. There is no perennial fountain of happiness from which the weary, despairing soul can drink a refreshing draught. Life to such a person is one long agonizing sigh as dismal as the winter's cheerless blast, and as mournful as the expiring notes of an Alpine horn that sounds its danger signals.

II.

Who has not attended a funeral where every expression of countenance and every word is draped in mourning, and where sorrow like a dark cloud nestles in the eyes and features to drive away the sunshine and beat back kindly cheerful thoughts. At this funeral of which I speak, one in the prime of life reposed in the coffin, on which flowers radiant with rare colors, rich in aroma, and beaming with beauty, nestled like so many tokens of light and love. They conveyed a silent sermon, vibrant with affection and overflowing with a kindly feeling of tender resignation. The last abiding place of the mortal remains of a cherished soul was there, soon to become the food of voracious worms. Alas! such is the end of earthly life.

An elderly man was among the mourners, his features betokening the great sorrow he experienced on the death of his companion. He listened to the sermon, as if in dreamland, his thoughts like so many pearls of love going out to the dear one who had passed to the higher realms, almost wholly oblivions of the fact that a sermon was coming from the lips of the divine.

Finally the time arrived for him to survey the mortal remains of his devoted wife, in whose bodily form was concentrated all the sweetness and joys of domestic bliss and happiness. His soul sent forth its vibrations as tenderly as the morning sun ushers in its genial rays to give sweetening touches to all of nature. He sighed with emotions of angelic tenderness as he intently gazed on the vacated tenement; the immortal soul had ascended higher, to live forever in climes elysian. The links of domestic bliss, welded with love, harmony and peace had been broken at last, and the husband realized the awful calamity that had befallen him. What can one do, then, but mourn, every breath a funeral dirge, and every thought a dismal echo from the chambers of undying love. Bending over he touched the white cheeks with his lips, and in prayerful whispers said: "Beautiful wife, gone, gone, but cherished in the memory, a treasure of the tender affections of my soul," and then he fainted, with a heart-rending shriek on his lips, at the loss of his Evangeline.

III.

Many years have passed. Time marches on regardless of prayers or wishes to the contrary. To some it brings care-worn wrinkles, a bent form, an expression of sadness, and feelings of extreme sorrow. Now nearly 80, Judge Hite was a little off. He was talking almost constantly of his Evangeline, and one day, as the daily press said, he stood with his devoted daughter on the corner of the street, and pointed at a middle-aged lady as his Evangeline. Beautiful, richly dressed, with an air of refinement, she came towards him, when he beckoned her to approach, calling her tenderly his Evangeline. The daughter then shut off the view, and calling a carriage, hastened home. Tenderly guarding her bereaved father, she encircled him with her arms, and in tender pathos pleaded with him to be calm, telling him, "Mamma is in heaven, and the lady only bore a striking impressive resemblance to her." But her father, his mind clouded with deep sorrow, saw in that woman his Evangeline, and he seemed to forget that she had passed on to a higher life, and he refused to be comforted. Age sometimes weaves fancies which seem to be divine realities, and he could not be made to believe that Evangeline did not live, and was ready to fall into his arms, if permitted.

IV.

It was a beautiful day in Denver, Colo. An old man whose once stately form was bent with age, stood with his daughter surveying the never-ending stream of human life as it surged along. By them, a lady stopped to gaze in a store window, when the old man suddenly clasped her in his arms and cried, "My Evangeline, my own dear Evangeline!" The lady, badly shocked, pushed him from her, his feet slipped, his head struck the pavement, and he became unconscious.

V.

In a palatial residence an old man, Judge Hite, was lying in bed suffering untold agonies, and seeming to realize that he had seen his Evangeline, the dear wife of his early years of bliss. It was like a fairy dream where angels weave a delightful scene to enchant the soul, to fascinate the mind, and impart perennial joy. Insane, was he? He might have been, but when he saw such a perfect likeness of his Evangeline, impulsively he threw his tender arms around her, as void of any intentional harm as the angels of heaven! Recovered from his unconsciousness he cried like a child for his Evangeline, a cry so tremulous, so tender, so pathetic, so vibrant with pure love, that all who witnessed the scene shed tears of sorrow. Seemingly a helpless child now, yet there was surging through his soul the wailings for something lost in some sweet by-gone time when every aspiration was realized in something that was sweet and lovable. Alas! what a scene, so full of pathos!—an old man living in the dreamland and poesy of fancy, grasping at something untangible, yet to him a divine reality.

VI.

It was in the dusk of a summer evening, the daily paper said, when a carriage might have been seen approaching the residence of Judge Hite. It contained his own daughter, and a lady divinely fair and beautiful. She had been weeping as he heard the story of the old man, and his constant yearning for his Evangeline. To comfort him, to assuage the agony of his last moments, and to let some sunshine into his despondent soul, the daughter, after a diligent search, had found the lady in whom the father saw his Evangeline, and she consented to visit him. Ushered in the room, she walked calmly to the bedside, and sitting down placed her hand on his head, and then bent over and kissed him. Awakening, he glanced at the figure bending over him like a sweet Angel of Love, and cried, "Evangeline, have you come for me?" Pillowing his head in her arms, she caressed him as she would a child.

"I knew you would come for me, my dear Evangeline, my darling, my own precious love," he said with feeble voice and with his classical features illuminated with the grandeur of hopeful thoughts, and with a light that seemingly radiated from some archangel. Then he turned from her, and with his eyes directed towards the ceiling, he saw his angel Evangeline, who with outstretched arms, was beckoning to him.

"Oh! you, my dear lady, are not my Evangeline. The cloud has been removed—the dark, dismal cloud on my brain has been dissipated, and the morning dawn has come. My angel Evangeline has come for me," and then he closed his eyes in the calm sleep of death, while his head was pillowed in the arms of an earthly angel.

VII.

Thus ended the life of Judge Hite.

Life is made up of giving and receiving; giving to some and receiving from others, and the lady who witnessed this dying scene can have the satisfaction of knowing that her presence rendered the last moments of one poor mortal happy and serene, and she now fully realizes that the way to the higher spiritual attainments leads through the Highlands of Goodness and the Avenues of Knowledge, and that there is no other route thereto.

The Crushing of a Priest.

The world will look on with great interest, and wait the arbitrament of Time for the solution of the controversy having its seat at Oregon, Ogle county, Ill., between the Catholic Church and Father Crowley, late pastor of St. Mary's parish, located there.

It seems a controversy arose between the Father and his Archbishop Feehan. The latter issued orders which Crowley deemed a usurpation of authority, and refused obedience. A bitter correspondence passed between the parties which has culminated in unfrocking and excommunicating the recalcitrant priest.

It is reported the latter has petitioned the apostolic delegate at Washington—cardinal Martinelli—to interfere in his behalf, and review the entire case. Unless the action of the Archbishop is reversed Father Crowley will remain a derelict, with no rights in the church. He is banned, and made an outcast, while his past, present and future are wholly obliterated, and he is declared accursed by God and man. In another age Priest Crowley would be arrested during the darkness of night by the minions of the church, and secretly transported to some church dungeon, where he would be tortured until he would recant; then, probably, to secure his silence, would be burned at the stake. Imagination cannot conceive the wretchedness which the Holy Office would inflict on a disobedient priest who defies the power of his superior, as has the late Father Crowley.

This action of the higher officials of Catholicism shows, in a mild way, its sterner action in the Middle Ages, when its power was supreme. Could it have secured possession of the person of Luther at the beginning of his revolt, as was attempted, Protestantism would have been crushed in its inception, and the horrors of the Inquisition, with all its terrible crimes, would still menace governments and tyrannize over prince and people in the name of a crucified God.

If Priest Crowley possessed the right material he would rise in his strength and strike a blow at the anaconda whose lengthening folds, with its tail clinging to the dome of the Capitol, at Washington, is threatening the liberties of Republican America, which would be felt for all time. It is regretable he has not the stamina of the Reformers of the 16th century.

Since writing the above we notice by press reports that "Rev. Jeremiah J. Crowley has just entered suit in the Superior Court for $50,000, against Rev. Francis J. Barry, Chancellor of the Catholic Arch Diocese of Chicago, that being deemed the exact amount requisite to soothe his wounded feelings, and reimburse him for the loss of his living.

Pouring Is Not Ducking.

Rev. Ira Estepp, for 15 years pastor of the Baptist Church at Inez, Ky., had his ordination revoked recently, for having poured water on his dying daughter in baptism, rather than immersing her, as the articles of faith required. Mrs. Fannie was near death, too feeble to leave her bed, and as she wanted to make her title clear to mansions in the skies, she asked her father to resort to that method to perfect her claim. If St. Peter is kind he will probably overlook the little informality, and give the daughter a back seat in heaven; but the father merits only damnation. He knew pouring was not ducking.

Science and Spirit Teachings. By Sar'gis.

To the Editor:—It is strange, and then it is not, how the human mind is affected and influenced by early impressions. The Catholic church is wise in its policy of control of infancy.

This reflection comes with growing emphasis the more we note the trend of modern thinking. Science laughs at dogma, Spiritualists and liberal thinkers deride it, but unconsciously, as a rule, all are more or less swayed and their thought colored by it. This is noticeable in recent re-discussions of the evolutionary hypothesis, and the old, old story of "the soul of man." While both discard so-called revelations, yet the concept that this planet of ours is a creation—a thing made—is the ruling premise in the problem. Even Darwin waived the matter by saying the immortal was outside the domain of the naturalist and left it there. The Bible—that bogie book—though it is "God's word," is as contradictory as is geocentric and heliocentric astrology.

For after the manufacturing story of Genesis, the Preacher in Ecclesiastes tells us that what befalleth us also befalleth the beasts—"as one dieth so dieth the other, yea they have all one breath, and man hath no pre-eminence over the beast. * * All go unto one place; all are one dust again." Genesis tells us that the Lord God breathed into man's nostrils the breath of life, and Ecclesiastes assures us that the breath of man and the beast are the same.

Now, how long are we to be going round on this treadmill? How long are we to listen to the changes rung on this story—that man's body was first finished and then his lungs inflated with a soul—"his" soul? Yet this childish tale is no more reasonable than that told the two-year-old, that the little brother just arrived was found by a fairy in a hollow stump. But it is this fable told to the millions of young minds that casts its shadow even on a Darwin.

Tomes and tomes of scholarship, debate and controversy, aided by persecution, martyrdom and centuries of discussion and bloodshed have failed to settle the question, and is it not time the modern mind was lifted out of this swamp of stagnant theology?

The beginning of this emancipation is to be found in Modern Spiritualism. "Modern" is the word—for all this mountain of vitiation and perversion came from childish ignorance and the deceptions of priestcraft in regard to the phenomena of ancient times. The modern investigator has discovered that these phenomena, revelations or messages, are from human beings, once living among us, our friends, neighbors, or historic people—and only from such. With the ancient priest or devotee it was a god or gods, or angels, or from devils. And it was only the king and the priest through whom they could be invoked or placated. It was this class of interpreters of a common phenomena that made our bibles, concocted our legends and fettered the human mind for the centuries. And to such a degree that it has become a mental heredity, overshadowing with its mists the minds of many of our ablest thinkers.

To-day we are discussing atoms, molecules, protoplasm, germs—and because a frog has microscopic beginnings indistinguishable from those of man, we have "descent" of man theories, or the "ascent" of unfolding impulse, and a common ancestry for all organic life. In other words, the shadow of the "maker" concept. This microscopic germ life is a fact—because seen and observed in demonstration. But here the "made" idea advocate comes back at us with his creative concept, only the more wonderful by these facts of science, and tells us we are a part of this power, the very image of this creator. And he is shocked if some cold questioner asks—what are we the image of—the frog, or what? The protoplasm, the germ or what not, embodies or contains the creative power—frog or non-frog. And so it is, the irreverent inquirer outrages the pious descanter by voicing the simplest logical question from a common fact. Until they settle this protoplasmic frog problem they should leave the "living soul" question in abeyance until the primary fact is established or explained. As golf players say, science has so far got dogma "in a hole."

But what is it, if not as we have it from one or the other side of the controversy? The answer ought to be: Take things as you find them, and from that premise and with its many aids, formulate your facts, deduce your laws and evolve your ethics. Dogma assumes a creator and a creation. No argument has had such universal approval as that of Paley's watch. It is often a question whether the credit belongs to the author or inventor. If the watch hadn't been invented, what a fix "design" would have been in.

Another term that often confuses clear thinking is "law." There are so many lawyers among us, that as soon as you say law they run to Blackstone for a definition and find it to be a "rule of action" and "prescribed by authority"—and there you are again as in the watch. And so it is, as long as you have the "who made you" at the portals of knowledge, so long will the impediments to clear thinking remain. It is a curious fact that the average mind is ever inclined to consider questions beyond the reach of thinking. It is, as a rule, a harmless pastime, but when it affects practical living, it may as in this matter be a calamity. If, for all the centuries that Christianity and Mohammedanism, by the power of the sword, have dominated civilization and barbarism, the simple natural truth enunciated by Modern Spiritualism had held the minds of men, what a different world we would have had. The mention of such a condition is all the argument needed.

Now, Spiritualism doesn't assume to decide the question—for creation and against evolution, or vice versa. All it assumes to do is to disclose a fact—that man is extra-mortal, or that life is continuous. And it does so from human testimony, the only evidence that is admissible in any department of knowledge. The fact that dead men tell us of things that were before death is evidence, proof, that they live.

You can talk Genesis, Ecclesiastes, Darwin or Haeckel, to your heart's content and your brain exhaustion; that is your high privilege, only it doesn't set aside the other fact. And there you are.

What the great intellect of a Franklin, the wisest man that has attracted the attention of our civilization, may deduce from his fact is one thing, and what Talmage, the scaramouch of the ecclesiastical sawdust, may imagine, is quite another thing. And after all this illustration practically covers the case, as it is and as it will be. Spiritualists may chafe as they may under the state of affairs, they can never supplant the Talmage condition by trying to imitate it.

The church is at bottom simply an organized industry, as much so as trusts and labor unions. Destroy it to-day and millions of people would be hungry to-morrow. The big steel strike would be but a fraction to it. People wonder why men whose whole burden of gospel is that man is immortal, are so frantic in discrediting the proof of what they teach? They don't stop to think that when it is so admitted, the evidence abolishes hells and saviors from hells—and the industry with them. Or to use a homely old adage, the tail goes with the hide. Such is the solution of that mystery.

But the Spiritualist is not denied any of the comforts of philosophic deduction or metaphysical recreation, for his facts open a new and boundless field for the very highest exercise of reason and judgment, and for what is denied him by other systems—common sense.

In a former article it was stated that spirits, long before science took the position, had held to the fact that matter was alive, that nothing was dead or could be dead and be at all. Death, in the lexicon of spirit means annihilation—to be is to live. Science says there are some sixty-odd elements in matter. Be that as it may, the planet contains all of them, is an aggregation of all elements. As we know from observation and experience that all life organized on the planet subsists from its storehouse, how was it possible for science for so many ages to hold it was dead slag, or that matter was dead, save from this stygian nightmare of dogmatic theology and priestly imposture? And even now the modern scientific gospel of evolution has not or cannot get from under its shadow.

We are beginning to see light ahead. Chemistry is the evangel of the modern scientific age. It has taken matter apart, like the skilled workman did Paley's watch, and shown us how and why it was, and fills its office in the economy of the whole. And that it can be dissipated, invisible, be restored again in its integrity, often improved in the change, for a continuity of function. Why go to sleep over this hint and ask a fellow who never saw a laboratory to explain it? That is what the Spiritualist does who goes to a priest, or a society for psychic research.

Everything that is or ever was on the earth is its offspring, born of these elements and formed by the inherent chemistry of substance. You may stick a god or a school of gods into the process, but the eternal function of chemical action will determine the result. It doesn't need a teacher of any kind to tell us that the free, untrammeled action of nature is all that is needed for best results. It is a fact that physical defects or monstrosities are rare, almost to tradition only, among what we call savage or primitive people. A fact that ought to teach its lesson.

Another thing that seems to stick with the tenacity of almost unconsciousness is "the soul of man." And this idea too comes from the Genesis story of the "breathing into his nostrils" after he had been formed of the dust. This distinction between the man and soul has colored thinking for all our Christian civilization, despite the fact that dead bodies have been in evidence all along. We have come to regard the soul as "his"—the his being the body. And so indelible had this idea become that in order to punish the lost soul or reward the saved one, the body had to be resurrected so that the brimstone could do its work, or the harp be twanged for the delectation of the redeemed senses. How else could it be "for deeds done in the body." A material fire must have material fuel, and an evangelical longing regaled with golden bricks in an eternal city. So the soul to do the one or suffer the other must get its body back in which to do it, yet men who prate of law, of the conservation of force, of evolution, of cosmic conditions and the infinity of the universe, will gravely talk about this "soul of man," as if it were a personal pocket possession. There can be no body and soul in such sense. It is not your soul or my soul—it is you or me—the one, the all.

"Deeds done in the body?" How can there be any other deeds? Whoever heard of a deed outside a body? A deed is an act, something done. Eve ate an apple—that was a deed. Cain and Abel never were in the orchard, so couldn't perform that deed. This may sound irreverent or trivial, yet it is only by trivial illustrations that trivialities can be shown up. One great obstacle to mental progress has been that these childish allegories and juvenile explanations have been seriously treated by serious people.

Pardon a little digression: Did you ever stop to think that all our gods are royalists—kings and rulers? There never has been a religion on earth that had a president at the head of it—no democratic god. No heaven has ever been located on a farm, nor the saints engaged in agriculture. In the very beginning that was an accursed vocation; no god ever was a farmer. Then their residences have been in cities, in palaces and with thrones surrounded by courtiers and servitors. Even our boasted Christianity—the gospel religion pre-eminent—has got no farther than a King of Kings, on a great white throne with right and left wings of judged subjects. The fact tells of its origins with more emphasis than all its libraries, creeds and dogmas. Mankind will never be free until it elects a god, and holds him obedient to a constitution of humanity that recognizes no authority, no set of men with prescriptive cut of clothes or hair, to come between him and the individual man. That he like we shall be regulated by nature and its administration.

It is time the ideals of a primitive and childish age of man should be discarded and ethical civilization instituted based upon the evidences of science. And right here we should plant ourselves squarely and emphatically upon the position, that the phenomena disclosed by Modern Spiritualism, and its facts, are as truly science as those of astronomy geology, chemistry, therapeutics, protoplasmic or germ researches and hypotheses. It is time that flippant sneerers whose knowledge is derived from reading text books, or those of empirical smatterers, were permitted to be their own auditors. Instead of our platforms and press being anxious to cater to such "educated" and "respectable" egotists, allowing them unchallenged to talk of "spooks" and indulge in other like atheistic methods, to call them to book. These people, claiming liberal culture, who laugh at or sneer at the mountain of facts that Spiritualism presents, must be treated as they are—simply uninformed or subordinating their reason to bigotry or demagoguery.

We are on a world of which so far as history goes we have been profoundly ignorant anterior to this. We are just beginning to see that it is truly "mother earth" in every sense. That it preceded life upon it; that all life exists from it, and that forms of life are in harmony with its conditions, as varied as its states and localities are dissimilar. As these have been referred to in a former mention, they need not be repeated here. What is proper, however, is that this new cosmic knowledge owes its original suggestion to spirit instruction. This may be met with a pooh-pooh, or more formal denial, but it will not alter the fact. If Spiritualists, even, prefer to discuss souls, or brood over things impossible of knowing so be it, but these things are on our book shelves, and ignorance of them is not for remedy here. Yet the statement is true, to the student who tries to know what Spiritualism really is and has accomplished.

Why, for example, are not the great prehistoric saurians now in existence, and why no record of them on the oldest monuments of man? Nineveh, Nippur, Egypt and other witnesses give us pictures of bulls, bugs, and such sacred things, but no sign of these monsters. Our science doesn't explain. Spirit science tells us they preceded man, that planetary conditions necessary for them precluded man. Or to be more scientific, that they required a higher temperature than life does now. Even our science has demonstrated that man exists within eight degrees Fahrenheit—98 being normal. These great animals by mathematical demonstration had an average of 2½ to 3 degrees above the present. And nowhere else than in spirit teaching is this explanation found. Call it as you may, a mere hypothesis or speculation, it is at least non-miraculous and based upon absolute mathematical deduction. And why not? Our science tells us that the earth was once incandescent and has cooled down to present conditions, and gradually cooling; one theory as to earthquakes, crust contraction, being based on this idea. What, then, is there improbable in this theory that life forms did once inhabit it at higher temperatures than those now can bear? Yet this is all spirit teaching is. But spirit speculation is that when the planet cools to say 96 degrees normally the power of reproduction will cease and man cease to be on the earth. And our science holds this to be the case with the moon.

Now, spirit does not teach that man was "made," but that he is as any other form of life, a product of the planet, individualized like any other. You may put one god or a god for every form of life into your theory, it doesn't alter the fact that it takes a chemical union to produce form life. To "make" a human being requires the contact and coalescence of two opposite microscopic germinal substances, the positive and negative chemical principles—polarities, science calls them—and a human individual is the result—from what? Is it from a soul or from a chemical union? Or is it a third, or new soul, from two full-orbed old souls? All the bibles ever written or creeds invented cannot change the fact.

Then why not stop here and put our mind, our education, our reasoning powers to work upon this premise of fact and evolve such philosophy or ethics as our thought may be equal to, and upon a system of principles for a civilization as even Plato never dreamed of? That, to common sense, seems to be a part, at least, of the mission of Modern Spiritualism.

HYPNOTISM AT HOME FREE

Some people fear this mysterious power. It is because they do not understand it. In truth it is the most powerful of human influences for good. A FREE BOOK, published by the American College of Sciences, contains the opinions of thirty distinguished men, Professors in the largest Colleges and Universities in America, on this subject, and its hidden mysteries are made perfectly clear. It gives simple directions for acquiring the secret power at home and tells how to cure bad habits; how parents can control their children and make their dispositions sweet and lovely; how homes not fully in accord can be reunited by bonds of love; how diseases can be cured without drugs or medicine; how hundreds of startling, mystifying and beneficial experiments can be performed. According to the honest statements of eminent Doctors, Lawyers and Clergymen, the book is worthy of a prominent place in any home. Remember it is absolutely free. Write for it to-day. Address American College of Sciences, Dept PL 6 120 Walnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

THE SPIRITUAL SIGNIFICANCE.

A VERY IMPORTANT WORK.

The Spiritual Significance is by Lilian Whiting, author of "The World Beautiful," "After Her Death," "Kate Field, A Record," "A Study of Elizabeth Barrett Browning." Cloth, $1.00.

Miss Whiting finds the title of her new book in these lines from "Aurora Leigh:"

"If a man could feel
Not one, but every day, feast, fast, and working-day,
The spiritual significance burn through
The hieroglyphic of material shows,
Henceforward he would paint the globe with wings."

The aim of this book is to reveal the curiously close correspondence between the developments of modern science and spiritual laws; to note that new forces, as discovered and applied in wireless telegraphy, are simply laws of an unseen realm into which humanity is rapidly advancing and thus gaining a new environment. From this evolutionary progress, as illustrated by physical science the author of "The World Beautiful" continues the same argument presented in those volumes in a plea that the future life is the continuation and development of our present life in all its faculties and powers, and that the present may be ennobled by the constant sense of the Divine Presence, and a truer knowledge of the nature of man and his relations to God tend to a higher morality and increasing happiness. The book is characterized by the same essential style and qualities that have insured for "The World Beautiful" volumes an almost world-wide popularity.

Discovery of a Lost Trail

BY CHARLES B. NEWCOMB,

Author of "All's Right with the World." Cloth 270 pages. Mr. Newcomb made a distinct success with "All's Right with the World," which continues in the front rank of the Metaphysical books that are now so popular. The great number who have been cheered and strengthened by him will welcome another book by the wise teacher whose words of help are doing so much to make the world better by making men and women better able to understand and enjoy it.

"Discovery of a Lost Trail"

is a simple study of that strange and beautiful thing called life, but grand in its scholarly simplicity. It will be in demand by many who have not previously read metaphysical writings. Price $1.50. For sale at this office.

INVISIBLE HELPERS

A Very Excellent and Comprehensive Work.

One from the Theosophical Standpoint.

This work, "Invisible Helpers," written by C. W. Leadbeater, the remarkable English psychic (whose lectures have graced the columns of The Progressive Thinker), is certainly very interesting and suggestive throughout. It treats of the "Universal Belief in the Invisible Helpers," the "Angel Story," "Work Among the Dead," "What Lies Beyond." The work is neatly bound in cloth, and the price is 55 cents.

WISDOM OF THE AGES.

Revelations from Zertoulem, the Prophet of Tlaskanata.

A Mine of Valuable Reflections and Suggestions.

This work was automatically transcribed by George A. Fuller, M. D., a gentleman who stands high as a lecturer and medium. It is a mine of valuable reflections and suggestions. The paragraphs are short, suggestive and inspiring. Every one of them leads to something higher, grander, nobler. Price $1.00.

CANDID OPINION.

Be Just and You Will Be Right.

He who struggles for the right, obtains the same more surely if just. Prejudice is a strong motor to govern impulsive action. Disappointment in the achievement of a pet plan or desire is apt to cause anger and discontent. Any great object worth working for is worthy of persistent effort. You cannot always immediately convince others that you are right, and you may not always be right yourself. We may be very positive of the right and yet not able to see all sides of the question. Humanity is prone to wage war from a selfish standpoint, rather than for exact justice.

As Spiritualists we should be candid and free—expressing our opinions and exerting our energies in whatever direction that best appeals to our personal judgment; and thus precluding denunciation and defamation. We should not decry all laws because of some that are unjust. To remedy an ill or a public injustice we should not turn anarchists. The reformer will not reform by wholesale destruction, but by healthful development will he re-mold and evolve.

Because we may not, as Spiritualists, have the perfected plan of organization in correct system of operation, is no reason why we should destroy what we have. Rather should we seek to develop it.

Faults may be kindly enumerated and openly discussed; and remedies suggested. If a convention fails to apply our suggestions, we should not childishly rebel and go home in anger. As Spiritualists, we should be harmoniously poised whilst we aggressively seek for resultants. To flee at the first adverse fire is to show either cowardice or panic. Neither of these should characterise a soldier, nor a parliamentarian. Equipoise under all circumstances is a blessed possibility of personal realization.

All this is suggested by the fact that every annual convention of the N. S. A. (as of all other bodies) finds some disgruntled persons whose "hobbies" did not carry, and who says: "I am done!" or "The N. S. A. will soon be a failure!"

Since our late convention in Washington, these expressions have been made, and even The Progressive Thinker has joined the disgruntled! If it were not so serious a matter, we would laugh at all such. But the same bears fruitage of prejudice and ill-will; and thus our public cause is damaged by every opponent gaining support from those who should always be its friends.

Unwittingly, perhaps, the Spiritualists often destroy themselves. A steadfast upholding of the best and truest in our teaching and in our examples is far more necessary than to only expose the errors of the depraved!

The time has come to build our public cause of Spiritualism!

I hope the editors, speakers, mediums and all Spiritualists will emphasize that. Too long we have been our worst enemies! Let us cry a halt!

If any see their duty otherwise, let them labor unto themselves—or so associate in effort. They who see a public ransom in possibility of organized co-operation, should have no barriers placed in their path of action.

The N. S. A. has a duty to perform, and every lover of the right and the truth will help it! They who assail, may hinder its progress, but it cannot be stopped. Its great duty is far superior to our personal aspirations and pet opinions.

No one has more right to feel disgruntled over defeats and oppositions at the late convention than the writer—and no one can proclaim more heartily their candid appreciation of results.

Wisdom and experience are gained by the conflict and decisions.

What we need is more clearly shown. The officials are important factors to insure good results, and should be carefully chosen, and should have cordial support when so called. If found incapable, should be summarily dismissed. And capability accompanied by zeal should be rewarded and retained. Public honors should be fully appreciated by the recipient; and public position aspired unto by any earnest adherent; but "glory" should not be the prime motive.

One who has well-served and earnestly toiled should not be turned out in dishonor. As Spiritualists we should learn to better appreciate our toilers! A meed of praise is the heart-hunger of every public worker for Spiritualism; and it is a great compensation for effort and sacrifice. For work well done let us praise Bro. Barrett, and in charity overlook defects and shortcomings. When we desire that he shall be succeeded by another, let us crown him with the flowers he has deserved, and not prick him with thorns that prejudice may create. Then he will rejoice that his works are done as your official servant, and gladly welcome his successor. You mistake if you think he finds his services for you a bed of roses.

No doubt but his mind and soul wholly longs for that day when the peaceful hearthstone shall receive his devoted homage, and the official cares shall pass to other hands and hearts. Whilst the delegates see fit to re-elect him and he consents to serve, we should be his willing helpers. When any one who has been or may be so kindly suggested for the foremost place in our Cause shall be elected, it must be when the office claims the person instead of the person seeking the office.

In the meantime let us work in unity. The Cause is superior to the man! No one—Bro. Barrett included—sought in the late convention to secure votes. At least I saw no evidence to the contrary. The secret nominating ballot gave to Bro. Barrett an overwhelming expression of good-will and said to the people he shall be retired from office only when he shall go with acclaim for good work accomplished.

It may be politic to change—but the reason must be other than for malice or to gratify any personal ambition. The great good of our organized Cause should be our supreme care! And the same applies to legislation.

Some few of us see a need for a more equable basis of representation and a more thorough system of organized co-operation. The State Associations have claims that cannot be overlooked. These are not yet ready to manifest and to obtain justice—but are worth working for.

I had no idea of carrying the measure to regulate the N. S. A. auxiliaries upon the lines proposed—but I did hope for a more fair hearing of the needs, with a sincere desire to work unto the end that must come sooner or later and insure the harmonious co-operation that will be the means to prevent much of the present injustice and lack of harmony. With a good result to work for, I am willing to work long and zealously.

Agitation must be first. Growth will come by earnest application of needs. If the State Associations cannot become superior to the local societies in usefulness and capacity, then they cannot expect other autonomy than inferiority deserves. But they will in time unfold to the plane of utility that will give them rightfully the place we are struggling to have them occupy. Hence our present defeat is a victory that creates an object to labor for.

Be courteous, friends, and labor for the good that only earnestness will bring. There is no inharmony now, and there will not be in the mind of any lover of true Spiritualism!

The N. S. A. Convention in Washington was a good one; and its results will be for good to our Cause. I am personally able to say that the will of the majority is my will. We have no more just way than to let the majority rule; hence I take off my hat to those who win, and bow in grace over any defeats I may have experienced.

It is the people's way—let their will be done! This paraphrase I gladly apply to our public cause.

New England does not rule the N. S. A. It cannot. But if the West fails to send a full quota of delegates then that section has no reason to complain.

Boston has fairly won the next convention and will give it a grand welcome. She promises to do what other cities have failed in—the local societies will provide entertainment, give helps and take a public part in providing for the welcome and enjoyment of every guest and for public exercises. I hope the West will send large delegations and have a superiority of members present on New England soil—even as the latter has invaded your territory.

Proxies next year will not be possible, and the delegates should be carefully elected and every possible vacancy provided for.

Let us lay aside all personalities and work for our Cause by upholding the N. S. A. Its missionaries will labor this year in the great West, and that section should be so awake that the sleepy East shall not outwit it nor outvote it.

Fraternally, GEO. W. KATES.

COMMENTS.

Brother Kates, a most excellent missionary for Spiritualism, does not take a very comprehensive view of our cause when he says of those who have seen fit to criticise the N. S. A.—they are "disgruntled." For nine mortal years the N. S. A. has been considered as a delicate child of Spiritualism—too delicate to be even criticised in the most tender manner, fearing fatal results therefrom. Mr. Barrett, for whom we have the highest personal esteem, has been elected for nine years in succession, while all the old workers have labored valiantly to reflect light on the Figurehead at Washington. He has been comparatively free from criticism from the simple fact that we hear exceedingly little of the N. S. A. during the intervals between the conventions, except when a meeting is held under its auspices, for the purpose of raising funds. The only criticism we have made thus far on the methods of the N. S. A., is the yearly election of the same man to stand at its head, and ignoring all the old workers who have made the history of Spiritualism. It puts on them the stamp of unworthiness; it labels them not competent, and here comes the interesting part: Whatever light is reflected on the Figurehead at Washington, and whatever prominence it is given, comes directly from those who have this stamp of inferiority. In fact, nearly all the light and prominence that this Figurehead has, comes directly from them. The placing of one man at the head of Spiritualistic national affairs nine years in succession, is demoralizing to the rank and file. It introduces discord; it breeds discontent; it is looked upon with distrust; it shatters the faith of men of good sound business sense in the ability of Spiritualism to manage successfully its own affairs; it hints at bossism; it is an indication of wire-pulling; it leads to the thought that our cause is sadly deficient in available "timber" to sustain the Figurehead; in fact any one who would suggest that Mr. X shall be considered as the President of the N. S. A. for the next nine years, would be voted a consummate dunce, yet that is what the N. S. A. delegates have done—only a little change of the phraseology!

A little criticism, a gentle reminder of some foibles and weaknesses, the pointing out of what is conceived to be serious blunders—doing this makes one "disgruntled"—does it? It is the violent storm, the rain, the lightnings, etc., that purifies the atmosphere. So will this storm that has been evolved in connection with the disgruntled and the N. S. A. result in placing it eventually on its feet, with a substantial foundation on which to rest. It has had for years the stigma of bossism, wire-pulling and worse than political intrigue resting upon it, and we do not wonder that wealthy Spiritualists hesitate in making bequests in its behalf. It is the dissatisfied who work for progress; who evolve reforms; who correct abuses; who establish the truth and banish error. Without dissatisfaction, accompanied with agitation, there can be no rapid advancement.

That the N. S. A. needs a thorough ventilation and overhauling is evident at the present time, judging from the discontent and dissatisfaction manifested on all sides. Out of this agitation it is to be hoped that a N. S. A. will emerge which will more fully meet the wants of the people. Let all the dissatisfied or disgruntled work to that end in the future, with the one main object in view to eliminate the objectionable features of the N. S. A. Extend to Mr. Barrett, who is pre-eminently a self-made man, and brilliant intellectually, your cordial support, believing that in the end a N. S. A. will be evolved that will be worthy of the confidence of Spiritualists generally. Another convention conducted along the same lines as the one last held in Washington, with a continuation of the blunders there made, will result in the extinction of the N. S. A., as an influential body.

Salt Lake City, Utah.

The regular Sunday morning meeting of the Independent Free Thought Bible Spiritualist Society was held last Sunday at the rooms of Mrs. Fontyn, a local medium and faithful worker. At the conclusion of a short lecture on Spirit Communion, by the writer, a poem entitled "Thoughts," was delivered by an aged lady member of the society, Mrs. Chamomile, which on account of its beauty I herewith enclose.

During the evening meeting, at the home of Mrs. Millner, another local medium, the spirit of a former Mormon bishop personated through the organism of Mr. Reynolds, a medium and member of the society, over 80 years of age. The peculiar walk and handshake of the bishop were so true to life, that he was readily recognized by his son and daughter and others who were present, the daughter being also a medium. He spoke only a few words, saying with evident signs of weakness, that he had found things somewhat different from what he expected, and learned that there were other truths besides those which he had taught his children. Our society has about 40 members, is free from debt and in a healthy condition.

The spirits have promised us that in the near future we should be able to build and own a temple in Salt Lake City.

THOUGHTS.

Thoughts are things, with arrows winged,
Tipped in a poison bowl;
Or born aloft on wings of light,
Sweet nectar to the soul.

Thoughts are things, they fly on wings
To bring you good or ill;
They shape your lives as best they may,
Your destiny to fill.

And when your thoughts shall fly from you
Unto some distant place,
They then return in peace and joy,
Or strike you in the face.

And when your thoughts return to you
And bring you deep despair,
They leave their trace upon your face
To show that they were there.

Then think the purest thoughts you can,
The best of all you know;
'Twill leave its trace upon your face
And on your smiling brow.

Every thought is weed or flower,
To bloom again in future hour;
It may be in early morn,
Or hightide noon when they are born,

But sure it is, thy thoughts will be
In course of time returned to thee,
And then will bring to thee again
Much peace and joy or grief and pain.

Speak no evil, think no wrong,
Let love and good abound.
For when you're thinking only good,
You're treading angel ground.

And when on angel ground you tread,
Your feet shall not grow weary;
But lightly fly to realms on high,
Far, far from earth so dreary.

Array yourself in truth's bright robes,
Put on the shining raiment;
That you may be prepared to flee
From earth at any moment.

Take love and truth into your life
And let them be your guide;
They'll be a bright and shining light,
Whatever may betide.

And when from earth you're called away,
At any hour or moment,
You will appear in shining robes—
The robes of true endowment.

A Valuable Suggestion.

To the Editor:—After carefully reading and pondering over the first paper of the Hull-Jamieson debate, I find the reasoning of Brother Hull so logical, so full of that honest confidence which carries conviction to the thinking minds, that I feel sure if a large portion of our friends could have the opportunity to read this debate, it would cause them to seek the truth through a channel of their own investigation. Therefore I wish to say to every one of your subscribers, that we the file of this great body of thinkers have not, and are not taking our share of the burthen.

Why, just think of it, the members of the orthodox churches do not lay back in their ease and call on their ministers and editors to do all the work, as we do our speakers and editors; no, they are all scratching as busy as an old hen with a new brood of chickens.

Now I wish to make this proposition to every Spiritualist, or to every reader of The Progressive Thinker: To send one dollar to the editor with the address of seven friends of our own choice, for three months' subscription, commencing with last issue. Why, just think of it, to have the circulation of The Progressive Thinker increased six fold, would it not be spreading our light abroad and giving our noble cause an impetus which will have a forceful bearing all over this broad land? Now, friends, let us be up and doing, and we will have the satisfaction of collectively working for the grandest truth known to mankind.

Here, Brother Francis, is my little dollar, and names for three months' subscription, covering that portion of the Hull-Jamieson debate.

With a long pull, a strong pull, and with all pulling together, we are bound to receive joyful results.

..GENERAL SURVEY..

THE SPIRITUALISTIC FIELD—ITS WORKERS, DOINGS, ETC., THE WORLD OVER.

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best subserved thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet we wish it distinctly understood that our space is inadequate to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that The Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy, to insure insertion in the paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require. Every item sent to us for publication, should contain the full name and address of the writer. We desire to know the source of every item that appears. This rule will be strictly adhered to.

Keep copies of your poems sent to this office, for they will not be returned if we have not space to use them.

Bear in mind that all notices for this page are cut down to suit the space we have to occupy when received.

Take due notice, that all items for this page must be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer. It will not do to say that Secretary or Correspondent writes so and so, without giving the full name and address of the writer. The items of those who do not comply with this request will be cast into the waste basket.

Mrs. L. W. Dimock writes from Williamsport, Pa.: "We have had with us for some time Mrs. Elizabeth Demorest, of Pittsburg, Pa., whose wonderful mediumship surprises all. Under her instruction, we expect some grand results, as we will have in our midst some very good mediums when fully developed. Mrs. Demorest takes quite an interest in the development of the local mediums, and we are in union with her instructions, and fully rely on the promises given that all who seek in the right way shall receive the fullness of the spirit. Your book, 'A Wanderer in the Spirit Lands,' is grand, and will satisfy the longings that fill so many souls craving light on this subject. Long live The Progressive Thinker."

The Philadelphia Inquirer has the following from Montgomery, Pa.: "A sensation has been caused in this vicinity by the almost nightly appearance of an alleged ghost, which has followed and terrorized a number of persons on the road between here and Clintonville. The "ghost" first made its appearance near the place where the quadruple murder was committed by rag peddler Hummel, and superstitious people declare that the apparition is the ghost of Hummel's murdered wife."

G. N. Kinkead, 202 East Fourth street, Little Rock, Ark., trumpet and test medium would like to correspond with societies within a radius of one hundred miles, who need his services.

The Chicago American has the following: "Surprise has been created in local business circles at Morristown, N. J., by the sudden retirement of John D. Guerin, who for forty-seven years conducted a meat market in Washington street. Mr. Guerin says his retirement was hastened by a strange dream. Recently three well-known merchants whose places of business were in the same block as his, died suddenly. Mr. Guerin says that in the dream a white dove appeared bearing a message in his bill, the purport of which was a warning to him to retire from business. He connected the dream with the deaths of the other merchants and the next day sold out."

The Milwaukee Free Press has the following: "The first of a series of circles to be given under the auspices of the Milwaukee Unity Spiritual Society, was held last evening at the residence of Medium A. P. Roberts, 1211 Chestnut street, and was attended by over sixty followers of the cult. The evening was given over to readings and manifestations by well known mediums, among whom were Prof. Roberts, Mrs. Moulton, Mrs. Gladys Cooley, Mrs. Smead and Mr. Helgarson. This evening the second circle of the series will be held at the residence of Mrs. A. Schnurstein, 668 Tenth street, when it is expected that Mrs. Stuart, president of the state society, will be present."

B. F. Sliter is now located at No 336 Drury avenue, Kansas City, Mo. October 6, he lectured to one of the societies there.

Address G. W. Kates and wife, N. S. A. missionaries, at 600 Pennsylvania avenue, S. E., Washington, D. C. Letters will be forwarded to them until further notice.

Eliot Wyman writes: "I have read the various opinions and views on the subject of prayer, and the supposition is that each one speaks his honest belief or unbelief; no one should be blamed for an honest expression of opinion. If one cannot believe in a God or an Infinite Intelligence, then he cannot consistently pray to such a source, while one who does thus believe is consoled in praying. It would seem that all who are Spiritualists, or who believe in the presence of guardian angels of wisdom, purity and love, and kind spirit friends who know our wants and desires for knowledge and aid to direct us in discharge of duty by impressing our minds and caring for us, can feel the need of praying to them for such help as can come to us from them. But the practice of the orthodox clergy generally, of praying in public, 'to be heard of men,' by long and 'eloquent' prayers, giving God particular directions what to do on all occasions, just as though he were a servant and might not attend to it unless reminded of its necessity—such praying is not in accord with what we believe to be true and sincere desire to be made wiser and better by such good influences that may come to us by believing and asking in humble secret prayer."

Harry J. Moore writes from Rochester, Ind.: "I have just completed an engagement of six weeks' duration in Alexandria, Ind., and am now in charge of my church at Rochester. I would like to correspond with camp associations with regard to being employed for the ensuing camp season. I have from the 1st of June to the 1st of October open for camp engagements. With best wishes for the success of the best Spiritualist paper published."

H. W. Henderson writes from Lawrence, Kansas: "The Wallala Camp was a success. Many new faces and nearly all of the old campers, speakers and mediums were present. Mrs. A. L. Lull, D. W. Hull, Mr. and Laura B. Payne, Mrs. Conley and Mrs. Inez Wagner were there. The people seemed to enjoy themselves and expect to hold another camp next year about July."

Reporter writes: "A very pleasant party assembled at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. Hurlbut, 341 Englewood avenue, on Tuesday evening, the occasion being a reception to Spirit Sunshine, the bright and cheery message-bearer who, through the organism of her instrument, Mrs. G. S. Lincoln, usually follows the speaker at the meetings of the Englewood Spiritual Union. Short addresses of welcome were given by W. C. Hodge, Mr. Hurlbut and Mrs. Harrington, as well as by 'Prairie Flower' through the organism of Mrs. Geo. H. Brooks. Response was made by Mrs. Lincoln and 'Sunshine,' who fairly outdid herself on this occasion. The remainder of the evening was passed in social converse, interspersed with music and song, after which refreshments were served, the program closing with many loving messages by 'Sunshine.' There are few better mediums than Mrs. Lincoln, who enjoys to a great degree the love, confidence and esteem of people at large, and few spirit message-bearers who have so won the admiration and affection of all with whom she comes in contact as 'Sunshine.' That she and her instrument may long continue to bring hope, joy and sunshine into the lives of mortals, is the sincere prayer of every member of the Englewood Spiritual Union."

Speaking of Mr. Morris Pratt, of Whitewater, Wis., the Milwaukee Sentinel says: "Mr. Pratt is the owner of a vast amount of real estate in Whitewater and vicinity, and is supposed to be extremely wealthy. He lives a very unpretentious existence and one would scarcely suspect him of being a generous philanthropist. It is the fact, however, that he has spent many thousands of dollars in the interest of Spiritualism and seems perfectly willing to spend more. As an illustration, he recently hired a lecturer to come to the 'Temple' and paid her $100 a month for six months, simply to deliver lectures and talk to the interested. Mr. Pratt seems broad-gauged in the matter of citizenship and general public spirit. He is evidently a man of little school-house education, but has a clear mind and a logical way of presenting facts pertaining to his beliefs that are entertaining. His philanthropy commends him to consideration for the matter of a $30,000 gift for an educational purpose is worthy of more than passing comment. It may be that the foundation desired to be builded by Mr. Pratt will have a far reaching effect and one that can hardly be surmised at present. Incidentally it may be mentioned that while Mr. Pratt disclaims any control over him by any particular spirit, he has become impressed with a suspicion that the spirit of Tom Paine has occasionally intervened in his behalf and exercised a mild control over his mind and actions. However, Mr. Pratt expressly says that he does not state this to be a fact, but infers it from manifestations which have tended to create this shadow of belief."

Hattie Tiffany writes from Alliance, Ohio: "October 27 ended my engagement with Mr. and Mrs. E. E. Carpenter at the Independent Church. The meetings have been crowned with success, spiritually and financially, and it is the general expression of many conservative Spiritualists that they never felt so much like putting their shoulders to the wheel and moving the Car of Progress as at the present time. We are now seeking good talent to complete our winter's work."

Charles Carter writes from Lancaster, Ohio: "Frank Ripley came from Columbus and held a meeting in our city hall on Sunday. He gave good satisfaction. There is some talk of organizing a society here. I also understood that he said he would have the management of the Summerland Beach Camp next year. The boom is still on here, new houses going up all the time. Mediums come and go."

The Chicago American has the following from Terra Haute, Ind.: "John E. Ellabarger, one of the three men instantly killed in the Vandalia freight wreck near Judson, Ind., last night, was to have been married next Thursday to Miss Nettie Palmateer, a school teacher of this city. Three weeks ago Miss Palmateer dreamed that her intended husband was killed in a wreck. She told several friends of this vision, and also mentioned it to Ellabarger and attempted to persuade him to quit work until after the wedding. The vision of his fiancee had no terrors for Ellabarger, but the manner in which he met death last night was true to the fatal dream in every detail. In the dream Miss Palmateer was notified of the death of Ellabarger by Fred Black and Louis Cook, and it was these men who broke the news to her last night at 11 o'clock. The dream and the reality are identical in every detail, including the time of the wreck, the place and the manner in which the collision occurred. Two months ago Ellabarger insured his life for $2,200 and made the policy payable to his fiancee. He had bought a cottage in which they were to go to housekeeping immediately after their marriage, and this he also placed in her name. Ellabarger was buried this afternoon from the home of Miss Palmateer. The railroad men of the town held special services at the house and grave, and the religious services were conducted by the minister who would have officiated at the marriage ceremony next week."

If Prof. Caesar Lombroso, the eminent Italian "criminologist," knows what he is talking about, there is not a monarch in Europe nor a man prominent in politics or in literature, who ought not to be in an asylum for the insane. Professor Lombroso recently examined plaster casts of the heads of famous Europeans in the presence of a number of French surgeons and scientists. If his judgments are sound this is, indeed, a mad world. After a critical inspection of the cast of the head of the Czar of Russia, Professor Lombroso declared the ruler of Russia to be "an innocent, melancholy idiot." King Edward VII. of Great Britain has a head which indicates "general degeneracy, incapacity to comprehend abstract concepts and a mediocre mind." The heads of the Emperor of Germany and the Sultan of Turkey, according to the Italian criminologist, suggest "irresponsible, because irretrievable, criminals." In the lower walks of life "the Sultan might have been a bank sneak and the Kaiser a brawler." Joseph Chamberlain, Cecil Rhodes and Rudyard Kipling were pronounced mentally unsound.—Baltimore Sun.

J. B. Nichols writes from Toronto, Canada: "The city of Toronto, in the Dominion of Canada, is understood to be the most severely respectable, and the least tolerant of any innovation in anything unorthodox. Spiritualism, however, is making converts all along the line. This result is brought about by the able exponents of the Spiritualistic philosophy. Recently Mrs. Georgia Gladys Cooley, of Chicago, a gifted medium, has been giving to large and appreciative audiences some fine discourses and telling tests. Regret was expressed that, owing to prior engagements, her stay was necessarily brief. She will be heartily welcomed when she can visit us again. A number of her friends saw her off by the midnight train to her destination in the States. Her genial, bright and social qualities had endeared her to every one who was brought into contact with her."

Dr. H. C. Andrews writes: "I am located for the present month at 911 Madison street, Toledo, Ohio. I am serving the Independent Society of Spiritualists for November. I am now ready to make engagements with societies in Michigan, Ohio or Indiana, upon reasonable terms, and would be pleased to correspond with societies wishing a good lecturer and test medium. Our cause is growing nicely here. My address until the 25th inst. is as given above."

The Houston (Tex.) Post says: "The Spiritualist society of this city will hold its regular weekly meeting at Caledonian hall this evening. The members have determined, if possible, to make this meeting a grand rally and hope to see the hall well filled, as they expect to have some very interesting and attractive new features. These meetings are free, and the public is invited to attend them. This evening Mrs. Florence E. B. Shaffer, B. A., will deliver a lecture, taking for her subject 'The Saving Grace of Spiritualism, or Bodily Redemption.' Mrs. Shaffer has been doing a great deal of very valuable lay work in the society, and we learn there is a movement on foot to have her engaged as a regular lecturer. The views she holds are broad and liberal, and in more accord with those held by the public and the members of deep thought, and the originators of this movement to have her engaged regularly are looking to the best interests of the society of Spiritualists and its advancement and progressive spirit."

Is he a medium? As set forth by the Toledo Bee, one of the most remarkable things that ever came to light in Ottawa, Ohio, is the strange intellectual power with which Harry Harris, an 8-year-old boy of this county, seems endowed. Slight, pale and small of stature for his age, he is not a child who would attract unusual attention, yet he is possessed of powers and capabilities that are denied most men 40 years his senior. Born in poverty and left without a mother when but a few days old, the boy's life has been an up-hill struggle. For six months after his birth he was a charge upon the township poor authorities and then was adopted into the home of Eiza Harris, a kind-hearted farmer. One bitter cold night in January, 1894, he was bundled up and carried for two miles through the storm to his new home—the first and only one he ever knew. For months it seemed that the frail life would go out, but gradually he gained strength and soon began to show signs of an exceptionally bright mind. Unfortunately for him the kind people who had given him a home and shared with him the comforts they themselves possessed were unable to properly fit him for a public education and thus at the age of eight years now he has never had six months of schooling all told. But what has been withheld from him in the way of opportunities seems to have been provided in some mysterious way by an unseen power. In his short school experience he learned so rapidly that it became necessary to remove him from his classes and allow him to go on alone, as none of his schoomates could keep pace with his wonderful progress. Learning came to him as if by a miracle. He became complete master of his lessons at almost a single glance and his tasks were accomplished seemingly without an effort. He learned to read apparently at sight and no matter what the book that is given him he will open its pages and read for hours at a time, the most difficult words falling as glibly from his tongue as from that of one long trained in the art. He early developed a liking for the scriptures and they, like everything else, were easily and quickly mastered. With him to read them was to know them and he could quote passage after passage from the Bible with bewildering rapidity and accuracy. Not alone does his strange power lay in learning, but he is also wonderfully endowed with the gift of speech. He fills regular appointments in the pulpits of the various churches in his neighborhood and is commonly known as the "boy preacher." Temperance is his hobby and he will take his text from the Scriptures, mount a rostrum before an audience and deliver a temperance lecture that is wonderful for its depth of thought and forceful delivery. His great comprehension and natural ability for learning is a mystery which none can solve He is quiet and unassuming and the promptness and readiness with which he answers any question pertaining to the Scriptures startles and bewilders the questioner. The boy's mysterious powers as a propounder of the gospel and as a temperance lecturer have only recently become generally known, but already a great part of his time is taken up in filling appointments to speak over the county. The fame which he is rapidly gaining is a source of great delight to his foster parents, who have always given him the best that was in their limited power.

Dr. W. R. Bell writes from Philadelphia, Pa.: "Mrs. Mary Von Kanzler has just closed a month's engagement with the First Association of Spiritualists of this city. She assisted in the dedication of our new church, gave an address morning and evening. She has at each service given convincing tests, and our association is so well pleased with her work, it has engaged her to return to us at as an early a date as December. The Rev. Dr. Austin, of Toronto, reached here this morning, and begins a month's service with the First Association of Spiritualists."

The Chicago American says: "For two months Mrs. Emma Tallman, of Arlington, N. J., has lived as in a trance. She has been unconscious except for a few brief intervals since September 1 as the result of a fall. Physicians who have studied her remarkable case are of the opinion that she might recover. At one time her life was despaired of. Mrs. Tallman is a daughter of Samuel Munn, a wealthy retired contractor. Her husband died two years ago and she lives with her parents in a handsome residence at Ellsmemus and Grand avenues. While standing on a stepladder in the cellar of her home, Mrs. Tallman was seized with an attack of vertigo. She fell to the floor, striking her head violently against a gaspipe. Members of the family who heard her fall found her unconscious. Household remedies were first tried to revive her, but in vain. A physician was called, but his efforts were unavailing. When days passed and the state of coma continued, specialists were summoned. She did not regain consciousness, however, until a few days ago, when she revived sufficiently to recognize relatives and friends. Mrs. Tallman's condition has taken a change for the better since then, and every effort is now being made to prevent a lapse into unconsciousness. Mrs. Tallman's mother said that her daughter was paralyzed and entirely helpless. Dr. G. F. Lightfoot, the family physician is in constant attendance. The invalid has suffered intense pain since reviving."

Dr. A. A. Kimball has removed from Bangor, Me., to 104 Broadway, Somerville, Mass., where he can be addressed.

Geo. F. Perkins writes that Mrs. Perkins is not as well as formerly. She took a bad cold and a number of setbacks has been the result. They are now residing at the home of Mrs. H. F. Michener, president of the Psychical Society, and agent for the noted Vitae-Ore remedy. Their address will be 1118 Brush street, corner 13th street, Oakland, Cal. Sunday meetings at Woodmen's Hall, Tenth street.

The Chicago American has the following from Watertown, N. Y.: "One of the remarkable episodes of the life of Mrs. Julia A. Sherman-Hunt, who died last week at the age of ninety-five, was her daily visit to the tomb of her husband, where she sat for an hour conversing with him. Mrs. Hunt, who was the widow of John A. Sherman, the philanthropist, was married to Benjamin A. Hunt three years ago, when she was ninety-two and he eighty-nine. For nearly two years they lived in what each frequently expressed as complete happiness, and then the husband died. His body was placed in a compartment in the Sherman family vault. Mrs. Hunt had believed in Spiritualism for forty years, and was guided in all her worldly affairs by her spirit counsellors. After the death of the husband of her old age she went daily to the vault, and visitors there beheld her seated beside the casket, which was partly withdrawn from its resting-place, gazing upon the face of her dead and engaged in earnest conversation, her part of which was audible to those who paused to look. Mrs. Hunt's will, which has been filed for probate, leaves $23,000 of her large fortune to personal and charitable bequests, and the bulk of the property to two sons of the late Mr. Hunt. Her residence, known as the Sherman mansion, is left to the House of the Good Samaritan, a Watertown hospital."

John C. Hemmeter writes: "The first anniversary was observed by the Erster Deutscher Spiritualisenverein, von Cleveland, Ohio, at their (Warmington) hall, corner Pearl street and Franklin avenue, Sunday, Nov. 3, 1901. The hall was packed and beautifully decorated with American and German flags (the American predominating), palms, flowers and ferns. Sister G. Heinsohn, a medium and speaker by the way who will make her mark, was the 'master of ceremonies,' and it was conceded by all present that she performed her duties nobly. The president of the society, Mr. C. F. Hunger, made the opening address; the nucleus of his remarks was that Spiritualism is not a belief, but knowledge; that it is the one religion that will bind all nations in a common band, making all wars on earth to cease, and the wide world one fatherland. The speaker also dwelt upon the expectancy of Spiritualists of this city of having their own place of worship in the near future. After the demonstration of her psychic powers in a few experiments by Mrs. Effie Moss, a poem by Mrs. Uhl, a member of the society, remarks, essays, etc., by the divers members present, a luncheon was served by the ladies of the society, which was highly appreciated. Music and solos, in the German language, were interspersed between numbers by several ladies of the society, whereupon an adjournment was had and everyone left satisfied. You may truly note for this society that it is not apathetic, lazy, indifferent and stingy in sustaining its organization. And it knows Spiritualism is the best philosophy and the grandest religion ever given to mortal man."

W. R. Alger writes: "It is a grand work you are doing. What cost me 500 miles travel and $50, all can get for 25 cents now. I am inclined to think the Piper expose, so-called, is going to be a great advertizer for our philosophy. Philanthropy and gratitude never had a camping-ground on earth, and never will have so long as the intoxicating influence of the dollar dominates the minds of the people. My address will be Lake Helen, Fla., for the next six months."

The society at Neoga, Ill., would be glad to engage a good phenomenal medium for December. Address Judge C. E. Dugan, Neoga, Ill.

Clara E. Beverlin writes: "Mrs. Josephine Ropp, of Indianapolis, trumpet and test medium, also independent voice, has been holding seances at Sheridan, Ind., giving splendid satisfaction."

J. E. Dura writes: "The premium book, A Wanderer in the Spirit Lands, is splendid. It gives a clear idea of the many stages and conditions of life after death. It will be a great help to any one who may read it."

C. J. Budlong, of Ashaway, R. I., writes: "The work on mediumship, by Hudson Tuttle, is the very finest thing of the kind on earth. It deserves, and will no doubt receive an enormous circulation. Bro. Tuttle is one of the foremost mediums and speakers."

J. M. White writes: "On Sunday night, October 27, there was a successful lecture, followed by tests, at Yorkshire, Iowa, being the first Spiritualist meeting ever held there. Newton, Iowa, was my next stop, and I held two meetings there. It is impossible for Spiritualists in Newton to obtain a place for public meetings, owing to the fact that Christians run the town and control the halls. Even the Court House is closed against a Spiritualist meeting, but we had good parlor meetings there. If a good, reliable slate-writing medium will write me I can put him or her where they can have steady work at good pay indefinitely; but I have been requested not to advertise the localities as the people only wish genuine talent and have an aversion to fraud. My address is 111 South Third avenue, Marshalltown, Iowa."

Justice writes from Seattle, Wash.: "The Church of the Soul here is conducted on a liberal platform. Dr. G. Castiday is president, the right man in the right place. The pastor, Mrs. Nogle, has been in Alaska for the last eighteen months. She returned and was given a royal welcome. On Sunday, October 20, the conference was again opened at 2 p. m. It is conducted by Miss C. J. Van Aistine, of Long Beach, Cal. She is here for the winter. She is a worker, earnest and true. We were blessed by the presence of Mrs. Maud Lord Drake on the 20th, at both meetings. She is a grand soul. I cannot mention all of the earnest workers who are with us from Sunday to Sunday for want of space in your columns. I can say this much, that with the return of our dear pastor, we hope to do much good and build up the society so large and strong that a wave of harmony from it will permeate all Seattle."

Mrs. L. Holliday writes from Admire, Kan.: "I saw an article on prayer in a late Progressive Thinker, and it reminded me of a circumstance that happened in our home thirty-one years ago, in Sturgis, Mich. We lost a baby three weeks old, and as Moses Hull was in town he officiated at the funeral. There was one of our neighbors, a lady, a strong orthodox, present. She said to me the next day, in speaking of Mr. Hull's discourse, that she liked it real well, and said there was more contained in his prayer than she had ever heard in any sermon in Sturgis. There were other church members who liked his talk. I wish I could see him and hear him lecture again."

Christine Cooper writes: "Spiritualism is not dead nor on the decline at Clinton, Iowa. A number of the prominent Spiritualists here have rallied to the front and organized under the name of the Philosophical Society of Spiritualists, for the purpose of mutual helpfulness in our search for truth, and in our efforts to reach our highest ideal of life and its duties, believing that in psychic phenomena and an exalted spiritual philosophy lies the correct solution of all the problems of life here upon earth and in the world to come; and that by the dissemination of such truths as have been and may be revealed to us through earnest, reverent study and exploration along these lines, we shall add our mite to the sum total of the world's work for the upliftment of humanity. With the following officers we shall know no such word as fail: President, Emma J. Knowles; vice-president, L. M. Rose; secretary and treasurer, Christine Cooper; trustees, J. C. Blodgett, R. E. Rowantree and Altano Anthony. We feel to congratulate ourselves in having for our president one who is capable of presenting to us the higher and more exalted truths of our beautiful philosophy."

Z. F. Vallier writes "The Progressive Thinker is again paying regular visits to my home, filled as usual to the brim with 'manna' from heaven. I also received the book, 'A Wanderer in Spirit Lands,' and read with interest, and words are too feeble to express myself properly when I say it is a grand book."

The Herald, of San Diego, Cal., contains the following: "Pursuant to instructions from Prof. Streight, the world-renowned artist, we obtained a piece of prepared canvas to have him paint us a picture thereon. The instructions were to sit with hands upon the canvas daily, fifteen minutes at a time, for three successive days, to magnetize it. At each sitting we beheld beautiful visions of "the home over there," with its surrounding valleys, hills and mountains, with their celestial verdure. Without communicating what we saw to anyone, we gave the canvas to the Professor. Upon calling for the picture, to our surprise we found the essential parts of the visions upon the canvas in all their delicate colors. When the artist obtained the vision he also received the following key to its interpretation, with the hieroglyphic signature of an ancient spirit. Through the rising mists of superstition and bigotry the poetic and spiritual eye discerns "The Valley of Harmony.' Far back in the distance stands the Temple of the Muses on the Mount of Inspiration, and still nearer the three mountains symbolizing Poetry, Painting and Music. At the base of these mountains is the pure water of life. On the eminence to the left is seen the home in spirit life of the one for whom the symbol was painted. This structure, still incomplete, is crowned with three statues of colossal size representing Poetry, Painting and Music. In the surrounding clouds will appear in the future well-defined forms, if the conditions are favorable—harmonious—among them a number of ancient spirits who often come to the young poet who will feel their presence and be inspired to write of them and their work for humanity."

The Bangs Sisters have returned to their homes an Adams street, after an absence of several months in the East.

Robert J. Hewett writes: "On Sunday, Nov. 3, at Kalamazoo, Mich., Mr. and Mrs. Carpenter dedicated the hall for the Kalamazoo Spiritual Association. Although it rained the hall was crowded and much interest was felt in the cause. Mrs. Carpenter's address was well received by many who never heard such talk before. There has been no society here until this fall for some four years, but now a society has been formed and it has engaged Frank T. Ripley, and a good work is being done."

George Friend writes from Toledo, Ohio: "Members of the Independent Association of Spiritualists met Nov. 6, and elected the following officers for the ensuing year: Henry E. Dowd, president; Elizabeth Schouss, vice-president; Henry Lynch, recording secretary; Henry Hoffman, financial secretary and treasurer; Dr. W. O. Hubbell, Wm. F. Travis, William Lynch, Lizzie Dowd and Louise Hoffman, trustees. A new office, that of usher, was created and the writer elected to serve in that capacity. For the present month the association has as speaker and test medium, Dr. H. C. Andrews, of Jonesboro, Ind. Next month the association is anticipating the re-engagement of Oscar A. Edgerly, who is an efficient exponent of the cause which we represent."

W. C. Jessup, trumpet and test medium, writes from Rochester, Mo.: "I have been in this locality about six weeks, and having good success in my meetings. I have held seances here and St. Joseph, Mo. I will conclude my work here in a few weeks and join Mrs. Alice Gehring, in the work at Frankfort, Ind., until after the holidays; then we will take up our work in Chicago again for the winter. We will do some work in Grand Rapids, Mich., also."

Clara L. Stewart writes: "I am now ready to begin my regular winter work as missionary, and will be glad to hear from all parts of the state where meetings are desired. Address me at Whitewater, Wis."

F. L. Jobson writes from Richmond, Va.: "Under the auspices of the Richmond Psychical Research Society, Mr. and Mrs. E. W. Sprague, the N. S. A. missionaries, gave four public lectures, supplemented with messages, in Lee Camp Hall in this city. They were greeted with a large and intelligent audience at each lecture. The closest attention was given to what they had to say. The success of their efforts can be summed up in a few words: From a small nucleus to start with, a membership of 50 has been obtained. The society has been granted a charter by the N. S. A. Mr. and Mrs. Sprague are grand workers and any community visited by them cannot fail to be benefited, as the truth as they present it must surely grow."

SURGEONS OPERATE ON HYPNOTIRED GIRL

An Ugly Tumor Successfully Removed from Unconscious Patient.

While in a hypnotic sleep at the New York Institute of Science, a tumor was removed from the breast of Miss Ethalyn M. Depew, who lives at 71 Sherman St., Rochester, N. Y. She was put to sleep by a graduate of the Institute and the operation was performed by Dr. L. B. Hawley of the regular staff of physicians in the presence of a number of reporters and scientists. The patient lay as if under the most powerful anaesthetic while an incision three inches long and two inches deep was made and the morbid growth removed. She suffered absolutely no pain during the operation or after.

MISS ETHALYN M. DEPEW.

In an interview with a reporter at her home after the operation Miss Depew said: "I became interested in the science of Hypnotism by a book called "The Philosophy of Personal Influence," which was sent me free, by the New York Institute of Science. I read the book carefully and it gave me confidence in the marvelous power. I decided to be hypnotized for the operation. I am simply delighted with the successful result and so are all my friends. I believe hypnotism is the most powerful human agency on earth for good. I earnestly advise everyone to send for the book I have mentioned. It does not cost a single cent and tells how you can quickly acquire a mighty hypnotic power and cure yourself and the sick and the suffering around you. I would not be without the knowledge I have gained from the book for anything in the world. Anybody who desires to improve his condition in life or master a perfect method for healing the sick ought to write for it immediately."

The reporter also learned that the demand for the free book referred to by Miss Depew, has been so great that the directors have just decided to print a special edition of five thousand copies and distribute them absolutely free. It is requested however that only those write for it who are really interested. This request is made because the special edition of the books will be published at great expense and it is manifestly unfair to people who are really in earnest to be deprived of the opportunity to get vital information that will help them all through life, by mere curiosity seekers. The book is totally unlike anything ever printed. It contains half the writings of the most famous hypnotic specialists in the world. It is richly illustrated with the finest half tone engravings of thrilling and amusing hypnotic scenes and experiments. It is intensely interesting. It tells how the all-powerful, secret forces of nature are controlled and made to serve the needs of man. The veil which hides the inner mysteries of Hypnotism, Personal Magnetism and Magnetic Healing is drawn aside and the real secrets revealed with wonderful clearness. You are told exactly how to acquire these mystic influences in a short time in your own home; how to increase your income; how to cure disease and bad habits without the use of drugs or medicine; how to control the minds and actions of those you love; how to make your business pay better; how to overcome bashfulness and gain self confidence; how to win social distinction. How to become personally magnetic, how to gratify your ambitions and become an individual power in your community.

Write to the New York Institute of Science, Dept. MK 5, 1031 Broadway, New York, N. Y., for a copy of this wonderful book to-day, before the special edition is exhausted.

THE PSYCHOGRAPH

—OR—

DIAL PLANCHETTE.

This instrument is substantially the same as that employed by Prof. Hare in his early investigations. In its improved form it has been before the public for more than seven years, and in the hands of thousands of persons has proved its superiority over the Planchette, and all other instruments which have been brought out in imitation, both in regard to certainty and correctness of the communications received by its aid, and as a means of developing mediumship.

Do you wish to investigate Spiritualism?
Do you wish to develop Mediumship?
Do you desire to receive Communications?

The Psychograph is an invaluable assistant. A pamphlet with full directions for the

with every instrument. Many who were not aware of their mediumistic gift, have, after a few sittings, been able to receive delightful messages. A volume might be filled with commendatory letters. Many who began with it as a amusing toy, found that the intelligence controlling it knew more than themselves, and became converts to Spiritualism.

Capt. D. B. Edwards, Orient, N. Y., writes: "I had communications (by the Psychograph) from many other friends, even from old settlers whose gravestones are moss-grown in the old yard. They have been highly satisfactory, and proved to me that Spiritualism is indeed true, and the communications have given my heart the greatest comfort in the severest loss I have had of son, daughter, and their mother."

Dr. Eugene Crowell, whose writings have made his name familiar to those interested in psychic matters, writes as follows: "I am much pleased with the Psychograph. It is very simple in principle and construction, and I am sure must be far more sensitive to spiritual power than the one now in use. I believe it will generally supersede the latter when its superior merits become known."

NEW EDITION.

THE LYCEUM GUIDE

Do you want to organize a society, for the social, intellectual and spiritual advancement of the children and adults?

THE PROGRESSIVE LYCEUM

furnishes all you desire.

Do you want a self-sustaining society, founded on the basic principles of the spiritual philosophy? You have it in THE PROGRESSIVE LYCEUM.

It furnishes a system of evolution by internal growth; not the old cup and pitcher Sunday school.

It has something to interest and advance every member, and those who are most active in teaching are the ones who learn most.

NO SPECIAL INSTRUCTOR REQUIRED.

THE LYCEUM GUIDE gives every detail needed for effective organization, and for conducting the society when established.

It has Golden Chain Recitations; the prettiest songs and music; choral responses; a service for a Band of Mercy; calisthenics; how to make the badges, flags and banners; marching exercises; full instructions in conducting the exercises, with parliamentary rules, etc.

Many Spiritualists living in isolation, have formed lyceums in their own families; others have banded, two or three families together, while large societies have organized on the lyceum platform, and found great interest in this self-instructive method.

Do not wait for a "missionary" to come to your assistance, but take hold of the matter yourself, procure copies of the GUIDE, and commence with the few or many you find interested.

Mrs. Emma Rood Tuttle (address, Berlin Heights, Ohio) will answer all questions pertaining to lyceum work.

The price of THE LYCEUM GUIDE is 50 cents, postpaid, or by the dozen, 40 cents each, by express, charges paid by receiver. Address

IMMORTALITY,

...OR...

FUTURE HOMES AND DWELLING PLACES.

BY DR. J. M. PEEBLES.

AN INVALUABLE WORK!

This admirable work contains what a hundred spirits, good and evil, say of their dwelling-places. Give us details—details and accurate delineations of life in the Spirit-world!—is the constant appeal of thoughtful minds. Death is approaching. Whither—oh, whither! Shall I know my friends beyond the tomb? Will they know me? What is their present condition, and what their occupations? In this volume the spirits, differing as they may, are allowed to speak for themselves. No man is better qualified than Dr. Peebles to place a work of this kind before the people. He treats of the Mysteries of Life; Doubts and Hopes; The Bridging of the River; Foregleams of the Future; Testimony of Saints; The Growth and Perfection of the Spiritual Body; Is it the Soul or Body that Sins?; Clothing in the Spirit-world; Our Little Ones in Heaven; The Personal Experiences of Aaron Knight; The Red Man's Testimony; Evil Spirits; Testimony of Physicians in Spirit-Life; The Homes of Apostles and Divines; The Friends and Shakers in Spirit-Life; Spirit Homes of Bruno and Others; Many Voices from the Spirit-Land. Many other matters are treated, too numerous to mention. Price, cloth, $1; paper 50 cents. Postage 12 cents. For sale at this office.

Life of WILLIAM M'KINLEY,

Our Martyred President,

With Short Biographies of Lincoln and Garfield, and a Comprehensive Life of President Roosevelt.

Edited by

RT. REV. SAMUEL FALLOWS, LL. D.

The book contains 453 pages, weighs a little more than three pounds, is printed from large clear type, has 51 illustrations, including half-tone portraits of Mr. and Mrs. McKinley, and his mother, the author and members of his cabinet and warm friends, Lincoln, Garfield, President Roosevelt and family; battle scenes of the rebellion in which Mr. McKinley participated; also a photo of the assassin, scenes of the tragedy, the death-bed, Mrs. McKinley's leave-taking of her illustrious and devoted husband, and other interesting illustrations.

This massive work contains a complete biography of the martyred President, and many of his masterpieces of eloquence as a statesman, and a record of his beautiful home life and untiring devotion to his wife and mother. It also contains sketches of Lincoln and Garfield, and a brief history of Anarchy, its purposes and results.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected. Homer R. Ward: Q. What is transcendental physics?

A. Prof. Zollner, an eminent professor in a German university, investigated the phenomena of Spiritualism for the purpose of exposure. He received facts which were to him astounding, and inexplicable by any known laws. It was the apparent passage of matter through matter presented by the tying of a knot in an endless cord which forced him to abandon known laws of physics for what he was pleased to term "transcendental physics." The name is not recognized as necessary by any one who has followed him. He adopted it from Kant, and attempted to prove by the so-called "fact" an obscure conjecture of that philosopher. In other words he attempted to sustain metaphysics by physics, and this he called "transcendental physics." For this purpose he adopted what he understood Kant to believe, the fourth dimension of space, but his understanding of the philosopher was erroneous. For this he should not be blamed for probably Kant, himself, never understood his own writings.

It is to be regretted that Prof. Zollner allowed himself to be diverted from the observation of facts, to theorize, especially after the vicious metaphysical fashion. He thus transformed what should have been a plain statement of facts into a metaphysical dissertation, and vainly supposed he had transcended that form of argument. His theory of the fourth dimension of space is not understandable, because it is unthinkable.

The problem of the character of space is one of those bequeathed from immemorial time, and will be continued into the future until it will be known to be not a problem but a chimera growing out of mental limitations. Strictly speaking, so far as space having three, or four dimensions, it has none. For space simply gives a place for something to exist. That something must have the three dimensions, length, breadth and thickness, else would not be something, but nothing.

Space which contains nothing has no dimension, for if it had it would be something, or would be matter to the extent of its dimensions. Length, breadth and thickness are dimensions of matter, and we understand them because they are made known to our faculties; but applying these to space as an abstraction, makes the subject unthinkable. The mind has had no experience with more than three dimensions.

J. M. Rose, Fowler, Cal.: Q. Is there a book containing Mother Shipton's prophecies? and where can it be obtained?

A. These so-called prophecies have been going the rounds of the press for so many years that the belief is quite prevalent that they are genuine, and just what is claimed as to date and authorship. An anonymous tract was published in 1641 entitled, "The Prophesies of Mother Shipton in the Reign of King Henry VIII, foretelling the death of Cardinal Wolsey, the Lord Percy, and others, as also what should happen in ensuing times." The Dictionary of National Biography, 1897, says: "In all essentials the narrative of 1641 was doubtless a fiction."

Numerous other publications of her alleged prophecies have appeared from time to time, with additions and subtractions. It has been treated much like the Mother Goose Rhymes, additions having been made whenever a daring scribe wished to make a sensation by showing how the current events had been predicted.

In 1667 Richard Head published what purported to be a full account of the "Life and Death" of Mother Shipton. He represented her to be the daughter of the devil, and of hideous aspect. She was said to have been born in 1488, and to have died at the age of 73, near York, where a stone was placed to her memory on which was inscribed this epitaph:

"Here lies she who never ly'd;
Whose skill so often has been try'd.
Her prophecies shall still survive
And ever keep her name alive."

Nearly 200 years lies between her birth in 1488 and the writing of her life! Can it be for a moment entertained that the memory of an obscure witch could that long survive? "Mother Shipton is in all likelihood a wholly mythical personage," says the Dictionary of National Biography. A sculptured stone in Yorkshire, says the same authority, which was long supposed to mark her grave is really a mutilated effigy of a knight in armor, doubtless taken from a tomb in the neighboring St. Mary's Abbey. It is now in the museum of the Yorkshire Philosophical Society at York. This appears to be the stone on which the aforsaid epitaph was inscribed.

How the prophecies grew and adapted themselves to events, and this may be applied to all "ancient propheeies," is shown by one Charles Hindly, who in 1862 reprinted a version introducing some verses he said were written in 1448, foretelling the invention of the steam engine, electric telegraph, and the end of the world in 1881. These verses attracted wide attention, but in 1873 the author confessed to having forged them!

In one of the old and rarest editions of these "prophesies" is a rude woodcut of her with a frightful visage, a nose almost touching her lower lip. She holds a staff terminating in the head of a bird, answering to an Egyptian magic staff, and wears a strange head-gear. She is addressing Cardinal Wolsey. All the clap-book copies of the prophecies, contains the one relating to him and his vow of vengeance against the "witch." As that profound scholar, W. H. Burr, of Washington, well says: "Many an 'old witch' has answered to such a character, and some of the 'witches' have prophesied both truly and falsely." Mother Shipton may be regarded as the personification of the belief in witches and their power to foretell future events, which was rife in the centuries of theocratic rule and ignorance.

Joe Meives, Sheboygan: Q. Can an immoral person become a medium?

A. Sensitiveness, as is well known by all investigators, does not depend on the moral or intellectual character of the medium. The character of the manifestations, however, have direct dependence on that of the medium. The sordid, selfish medium attracts spirits like himself. You can not expect to dip a cup of crystal water from a corrupt fountain. Should the clearest mountain stream flow through a bog or cess-pool, it would become turbid.

William Walsh: Q. How do you account for the forty years of persistent and unsuccessful persecution of Dr. R. Greer, of Chicago, by Romish spirits, as reported in The Progressive Thinker, of August 10? Surely there ought to be, by this time, in spirit life, a large majority, or enough of the Protestant element to protect him, especially seeing that he was on the side of Protestantism, as against Catholicism.

A. It is Dr. Greer's misfortune to be by organization intensely susceptible to the influences which have dominated and controlled him. In his case his belief, education, methods of thought are not in accord with his spirit controls. They want one thing, and he another, and there is constant conflict. Were he a Catholic he would become a miracle-worker in the church. According to well known psychic laws, the "Protestant element" can have no influence on him, to expel a psychic power which his organization attracts. Every medium can, however, assert and maintain his independence, and decide what control shall come to him.

The New Liberal Organization.

A few of us organized a National Liberal League at Buffalo, N. Y., October 5, 1901, with seventeen members, composed of Materialists, Monists, Theosophists and Spiritualists—a good combination. "Our Moses" is one of us; So is Prof. A. J. Weaver.

Suppose we all do not agree in our convictions, especially about a spiritual world, is that any reason why we should not be liberal in this world? I want to see all sectarian lines thrown down. I have talked with Freethinkers and find that almost universally they are in favor of justice, fair play for all, special privileges to none. If the Spiritualists and Agnostics had been united in one compact organization the infamous medical legislation would have been nipped in the bud. Just think of Jesus Christ not being allowed to heal people unless he had a diploma! The test of a healer's power to heal is to heal. We ought to stand shoulder to shoulder in maintaining our rights; in securing a complete separation of church and state. Although Agnostics do not agree with Spiritualists concerning another world, they do agree with them about human rights in this world.

We have at the head of our National Liberal League one of the ablest Liberals in the United States, Dr. T. J. Bowles, Muncie, Ind.

Spiritualists, join us. Send in your names as charter members. The annual fee is but one dollar. Send the fee when it suits your convenience. In one month's time we have enrolled more than one hundred charter members. Send in your names to me. Remember, many a prosperous church has started with less than a dozen members. They put in lots of zeal and hard work. We can do the same.

We will hold our first annual meeting in Cincinnati, the Sunday nearest Thomas Paine's anniversary, which falls on the 26th of January, 1902, and you are invited to participate.

THE BEAUTIFUL SOUVENIR VOLUME,

By A. LEAH UNDERHILL,
(Of the Fox Family.)

The Missing Link in Modern Spiritualism.

Thirty-three chapters, 477 pages, superbly printed, and bound in colors and gold, 15 illustrations, 5 steel engraved portraits of the celebrated Fox Family, a full page engraving of the old house at Hydesville, which to this day, by the act of its wealthy and respected owner, Artemas Hyde, Esq., bears the inscription, "Here Spiritualism Originated in 1848."

A complete history of the initiation of the movement known as Modern Spiritualism, from the epochal period which dates from March 31, 1848, Since that day, starting from a small country village in western New York, Spiritualism has made its way against tremendous obstacles around the civilized globe.

Only a limited number of copies of this rare book, now out of print, are to be had, and these can be obtained only at this office. Those who remit at once will receive a copy, post paid, at the GREATLY REDUCED PRICE OF $1.

Note.—By failure in 1885 to complete contract with the author, a large portion of the edition was left unbound, and so remained for a number of years, when they were rescued and bound at additional cost, hence this valuable contribution to the cause of Spiritualism was not properly presented to the Spiritualistic public, and a host of investigators have not had the opportunity of securing a copy until the present time. Do not fail to send for a copy at once. J. H. FRANCIS,

A CRITIQUE.

Is There a God in Spiritualism?

It would seem so, judging from the lavish use of the word, and the language used in recognition and support of that idea, by some speakers and writers who are trying to saddle onto Spiritualism many doctrines which are no part of it. It has something to do with every department of human life, but it takes in no false doctrines or errors of any kind. It is the champion of truth, knowledge, facts in every domain of life, and this truth will overthrow error.

Is there a God in Spiritualism? We are well aware that some Spiritualists retain the God attachment to their beliefs because they have not progressed above and beyond all the erroneous doctrines rooted in their early education. But Spiritualism, per se, as taught by angels, is and always has been emphatically opposed to all gods, devils and myths of all religious systems. Theism is incompatible with Spiritualism.

It is utterly impossible to force upon us a recognition of any god by the vain repetition of the God-idea in modern literature. Yet in defiance of all opposition, there seems to be a determined purpose of some speakers and writers to force it upon public attention. As long as they keep it up there will be war.

At the Cleveland N. S. A. Convention, Dr. J. M. Peebles read an address which was made a part of the records of that body, according to the published report; and the address was published in The Progressive Thinker, October 27, 1900. As the sentiment and belief of an individual, the address is of little significance; but standing on the records of the N. S. A., it is a matter of some importance to Spiritualists generally; for in it they have an undisguised God. In view of this fact, we want to analyze it in a few points.

The address opens and closes with Bible quotations, contains the word God 18 times, and reads like a theological sermon. Dr. Peebles says: "When I speak of Christianity, I have no reference to the Jewish Jehovah." Then he should not speak of it at all, for one is the complement of the other, inseparably united. And here is his own statement in contradiction: "God did not speak his last word to Lao-Tze in China, Manu in India, Moses on Sinai, or to John on the rugged isle of Patmos. He speaks in every true soul-thought to-day." Was it not Jehovah who spoke to John and Moses? The pronouns he and his indicate a person of male gender, and, it is said, spoke to certain men of historic renown. Then, evidently, it is the mythical Jehovah that Brother Peebles says "speaks in every true soul-thought to-day." If so, we do not recognize his voice nor his thought. It may be a foreign language. If he speaks to us in the soul-thoughts" expressed by Dr. Peebles, he says some very crooked things, impossible to understand. We do not know that any god ever spoke to a man; and we cannot take Moses' word for it.

Mr. Peebles says, "God is spirit and spirit is God;" but gives no explanation. This is simply a dodge into mysticism—an attempt to say something wonderful and incomprehensible.

"Great is the mystery of godliness." We know nothing of a god-spirit nor a spirit-god.

"Men are made in the image of God." Which men? are they black, white, red or yellow? The maker would require a number of different models if he makes them true to nature. We can't understand how the several races of men are the image of one god.

This god has a "voice" and an "all-seeing eye." He ought to have two, if he is like a man. To be convinced, I want to see the God-man and hear him speak; then I shall know if he resembles an African or European or Indian. I should also want to observe him in the act of making things. He must be a queer-looking creature if he is the image of some men I have seen. Trot out your God, and let us get a square look at him.

"The Christianity of Apostolic times and true Spiritualism of our times are in perfect accord." Are they? Let us see if they are. The chief points in the former are worship of Jehovah-God—a Savior Jesus—salvation by faith and grace—pardon of sins through blood-atonement—sacraments, sacred ceremonies and church membership—an angry God and Devil, and damnation in hell for those who obey not the Gospel. Spiritualism is not in accord with these and other Christian doctrines, but is opposed to them and meets them with a square denial.

"When Emerson was asked what he thought of Christianity, he replied, 'It has never been tried.' So Spiritualism in the richness of its mentality and fullness of its spirituality has never been tried." That is discouraging, to say the least. Who can believe it? If it has never been tried, J. M. Peebles has never tried it and knows nothing about it. He should try Spiritualism "in the richness of its mentality and fullness of its spirituality" before talking so learnedly about it. His mystic ideas of it never can be tried.

He says: "If Spiritualism is not Christian it is of little avail. It is of God, aflame with Christ-spirit, the bread-of-life pabulum of popular religion."

Moreover, "There are in the land comparatively but few spiritual Spiritualists." This upsets our calculations. We should like to know who they are, and where located. We suppose the Doctor is one of the few, and that they bear the Christian prefix.

He has discovered much of genuine Spiritualism and a host of true Spiritualists in the popular churches.

We will now sum up the preceding arguments to see where we are at. Mr. Peebles has no reference to the Jewish Jehovah—the God that spoke to Moses, John and others speaks in every true soul-thought to-day—God is spirit and spirit is God—men are made in the image of God, but which men he does not say—Christianity and Spiritualism are in perfect accord—Spiritualism has never been tried—there are in the land but few spiritual Spiritualists—there is much genuine Spiritualism and many true Spiritualists in the churches.

This is the kind of logic we have to face; and considering these arguments altogether, we are compelled to reject Dr. J. M. Peebles' address as being not a fair exponent of Spiritualism.

MISSIONARY WORK

In New York and Elsewhere.

It is expected by the many Spiritualists in New York State that we shall make a summary of our labors in their behalf during the month of October.

We were not engaged by the state association far enough in advance to secure the necessary co-operation to achieve a great success. The Spiritualists must realize that a missionary should make engagements en route and fill all of the time. Loss of dates and doubling over railroads will exhaust all the proceeds so that no profits can be realized.

The lowest possible expense should be incurred, because every locality is yet unprepared to assume the payment of a generous compensation.

The wanting of something for nothing is prevalent, and often is manifested to the Spiritualist missionary. And localities think the state association or the N. S. A. should send missionaries free of any charges or collections. When you, my friend, and all friends of the cause, will liberally provide the means to send free workers forth into the field of labor, then that will be done. Until then, these workers must pay their way—and you will give them pennies and nickels and think you have been generous. Angels and humans in numbers pity such soulless appreciation and spiritual poverty.

A generous contribution is seldom given to the officers or speakers of a Spiritualist society. When you learn to give freely, you will freely receive. The financial results of our missionary labors are always discouraging, even when we feel they are more liberal than usual. Any other sect or cult of people would give thousands of dollars where we give tens. Local societies are poor because they lack business methods and fail to raise finance. They all cry, "We are poor!" We can fill our coffers if we will work with confidence and zeal. Millions are expended for superstition, and we can surely get some of it for truth.

I want to see money provided for our cause—and as a N. S. A. missionary I want the people to expect I shall beg hard and work hard, and feel bad if not able to raise a generous sum for the public cause.

During October we lost six days from the missionary field in order to attend the N. S. A. convention. That left twenty-five days to labor, and we held twenty meetings. We lost five days by our inability to get people or societies to provide every day for us. The total receipts of our twenty meetings were $154.80, an average of $7.74 per meeting. This will show that missionary work is poorly paid.

Rochester gave us good receipts, and thus offset the poor results in some places. Our work should have resulted in a net gain of at least $100 in twenty meetings—and $12 per meeting would have done that. This should be the basis for the compensation of a missionary, by the local societies or persons.

Our total expense for the month (including our salary) was $130.80. The surplus turned over to the State association was $15, or seventy-five cents profit on each meeting, for the association.

We obtained nineteen personal members. Two local societies are started as the result of our visit, and two or three places ready to make a start if an other visit shall be made by an appointed missionary. Two or three organized societies are discussing the feasibility of chartering with the state association. The results are good for one month, and shows what each state association will do if a continuous effort is made. We should be able to get fifty chartered societies in New York in one year and have a financial balance of $1,000 from active missionary effort. New York is a fertile state and should be well cared for. The officers of the state association should make an active campaign. We can expect only poverty and failure if we are idle; but by energy and with enthusiasm we can capture the world for Spiritualism!

There is only one need: Work. By proper effort, finance and membership will result, and our usefulness be assured. Press on, New York, and all other states, and we shall then have the grandest National Association and the most useful body on earth!

During October in New York State we held meetings in Buffalo, Rochester, Utica, Rome, Auburn, Elmira, Waverly, Freeville and Troy, with a return visit at Utica. Each place gave us earnest help and excellent hospitality. One and all, we shall always have you enshrined in our affections, and will ever hope you may be blessed.

We commenced our N. S. A. missionary work at Paterson, N. J., the evening of November 1. We wanted a good beginning and obtained it. Paterson gave us a royal reception and a good meeting. The N. S. A. has an excellent auxiliary here. And this society needs a medium, a speaker and a leader. Some earnest worker can here find a lucrative and useful field of labor.

Sunday, November 3, we had our opening meetings for the society presided over by Brother Locke. We had good meetings and a crowded hall. We hope for a prosperous month here.

Mrs. May S. Pepper preceded us here, and had such a pronounced success that it becomes a pleasure to follow, as it insures our greater opportunity to succeed. What helps one, helps all. Let us all so labor that truth shall find its way unto all people.

Remarkable Phenomena.

To the Editor:—The stepping stone to the southeast of my house has been a phenomenon since July 16, 1901. The first that manifested was a lady, always smiling, her face highly mental and eyes black. The next picture I observed was Col. R. T. Van Horn. The last I saw of him was November 25, 1900. The next that appeared on the rock was blue eyed, his face more upturned, and of bolder temper than Col. Van Horn. The next that followed him was a man of splendid mien, dark eyed, and highly intellectual bearing. The next was written above Col. Van Horn's head a little of some letters, in a language, and a writing different from anything I ever saw. The next was a large J; and they are now constructing a large H to the left of it. They (the spirits) cut away the rock to smoothness, and then cut out the figures 1739. They cut out a vessel of ancient Greek design next, to the south center of the rock they cut out plainly the bust of a man who was successful in life. He now manifests the equality of law. He is now reduced on the rack of wretchedness. On October 28 there was formed a most perfect female. She is formed above the group of three first described.

The stone is as nature formed it; six and a half feet long, by 22 inches broad, and 7 inches thick. The hammer and chisel were never upon it. I am old and decrepit; can only use one hand; have been so for ten years and eight months since I was paralyzed. I am 79 years old; cannot get down to the rock. I write with my left hand. Fraternally,

Spring Hill, Kan. J. H. PRATT.

EXPLANATORY

Remarks from the N. S. A. Secretary.

To the Editor:—Kindly allow me to make a few explanations on certain points in the recent article by our good friend Moses Hull, which appeared in your issue of the 2d inst. In referring to the heavy representation from the East, at the last N. S. A. Convention, Brother Hull says: "The East had two very decided advantages, one was the convention was so near that it cost but little to ship in all the delegates it wanted." This is rather unfair, since it costs no more to come to this city from parts of Ohio, Illinois, Indiana, and other States that have chartered societies of the N. S. A., than it does to come here from Maine and other portions of New England. One fact, too, that our friend perhaps does not know is, that two years ago, when the convention was held in Chicago in order to give the "West a chance," very few indeed were the delegates that came from Western points, and even then proxies for Western societies were placed on the floor who were from Eastern States, or residents of Chicago. Brother Hull continues: "Another advantage was, its system of representation would allow it, if it chose to claim them, not less than four delegates to the West's one, even though the West had more Spiritualists than the East. Its State Associations were allowed representation the same as those of the West, beside that, its local societies not being connected with the State Associations were entitled to their delegates." This is equally true of the West, many Western States have no State Associations, societies from such States are chartered with the N. S. A., and have the same right of delegates as do those of the East. Mr. Hull states that a person can belong to a State Association and be represented by its delegates, he can belong to a local society and be represented by its delegates, and be a member of the Veteran Spiritualists' Union, and be represented by its delegates. The Veteran Spiritualists' Union is not chartered with the N. S. A. and has no delegates or representation at the convention of that body.

What is true of the East is true of the West, a person can belong to the Wisconsin State Association, and be represented by its delegates; he can be a member of the West Superior local society, holding charter from the N. S. A., and be represented by its delegates, he can be a member of the National Young People's Union and be represented by its delegate, and he can be a member or officer of the National Lyceum and be represented on its charter. The same may be said of Michigan, California and other States. Mr. Editor, the distinction between the East and the West is that enterprising men East work up excursions to the conventions—even as far as Chicago from remote New England, and are a year "booming" them, get people and societies interested in them, while no one in the West thinks of doing such a work. Brother Hull states it will be a saving of thousands of dollars for Western people if they stay away from next convention. I presume the thousands of dollars have been saved each year by hundreds of Western friends who might come to conventions and help to represent the struggling societies of their section that cannot send a delegate—but who do not come. In one breath he berates the East for running the convention, and in the next he advises Western people to save their money and stay away, when the facts show, that had any numbers come from the West, the East would not have had the management it is charged with having had.

As to the holding of proxies, but one vote can be cast by any one person, and we know that Western societies sent a number of proxies to their trusted friends with the instructions that they be placed in the hands of true and tried Spiritualists who would conscientiously represent the societies sending them.

It seems to me now, Mr. Editor, as it has always seemed, that if the good Spiritualists who stand aloof and condemn and criticise would enter the organization, and become working members helping to eliminate its objectionable features, a much better showing for the Cause would result. In the same light, if our Western friends would make their societies as strong as possible, and come into membership with the N. S. A., it would not be long before they could gain the balance of power and right whatever wrongs they fancy exist, or which really do exist. The N. S. A. is not perfect, we know it can be improved, and we trust our captious friends will do their very best to strengthen the Cause, and at the same time add such sound and noble timber to the N. S. A. that it will be immeasurably strengthened for good.

Notes From G. H. Brooks.

The work here in Newport, Ky., is going on nicely, the audiences are good, and the interest on the increase. I began an afternoon meeting the second Sunday after I arrived, which is proving interesting, and the attendance is inspiring at that service. The evening is the time when it suits the larger number, but the afternoon meetings will be kept up. The Ladies' Aid is to give a fair and supper in the Temple, Nov. 18, 19 and 20, and I hope the many friends in the near-by towns will turn out and help them. This society is small, but all are working like beavers to help in any way they possibly can. At the regular business meeting held Monday, the 4th, the society desired me to remain with them for December and January, which I have decided to do. The N. S. A. has appointed me as one of their missionaries and wished I should give them December and January, but after looking the matter all over I felt I could do no better work than to remain right here with the Newport society. I am, however, anxious to do missionary work during the week, and want to hear from places in Kentucky, Ohio and Indiana where there is any prospect at all of getting up either a public or parlor meeting. I want to secure the names of as many people and places as I possibly can. I want to go among the people and organize and help in this glorious work. I want the friends all over Kentucky to write me, as well as in the other states mentioned, and I will arrange my dates with you for week-night meetings. Come, friends, come to the front; let us all pull together and make a showing as to our strength. Let us work for the spread of our glorious philosophy. I will respond to calls for funerals. Send all mail and telegrams to 120 East Third street, Newport, Ky.

DEAFNESS CURED

By No Means Until ACTINA Was Discovered.

Ninety-five per cent of all cases of Deafness brought to our attention is the result of chronic catarrh of the throat and middle ear. The air passages become clogged by catarrhal deposits, stopping the action of the vibratory bones. Until these deposits are removed a cure is impossible. The inner ear cannot be reached by probing or spraying, hence the inability of Aurists or Physicians to cure. Ear drums are worse than useless.

It is folly, therefore, for deaf persons to hope for a cure by the old methods of the aurists and physicians, and instead of wasting precious time and money on methods that never have cured Deafness or Catarrh, they should awake to the times and apply the scientific cure. That there is a scientific cure for Deafness and Catarrh is demonstrated every day by the use of ACTINA. The vapor current generated in the ACTINA passes through the Eustachian tubes into the middle ear, removing the Catarrhal obstructions as it passes through the tubes and loosens up the bones (hammer, anvil and stirrup) in the inner ear, making them respond to the slightest vibration of sound.

RINGING NOISES IN THE HEAD.

ACTINA has never failed to cure this distressing symptom. The vapor current passes quickly and freely through the Eustachian tubes removing the catarrhal substances that obstruct the easy exit of the wave sounds. We have known people troubled with this symptom for years to be completely cured in only three weeks' use of the ACTINA.

As Deafness and ringing noises are caused from Catarrh, the hearing cannot be restored and noises stopped till the Catarrh is cured, and as Catarrh cannot exist under the use of ACTINA no person need be deaf or have ringing noises in the head if they will use ACTINA properly.

ACTINA also cures Asthma, Bronchitis, Sore Throat, Weak Lungs, Colds and Headache; all of which are directly or indirectly due to catarrh.

Write us about your case. We give advice free, and positive proof of cures.

LIFE BEYOND DEATH

Being a Review of

The World's Beliefs on the Subject, a Consideration of Present Conditions of Thought and Feeling,

Leading to the Question as o Whether It Can Be Demonstrated as a Fact.—To Which Is Added an Appendix Containing Some Hints as to Personal Experiences and Opinions.

BY MINOT J. SAVAGE, D. D.

8vo, Cloth, 342 Pages.

After a review of the beliefs held in the past concerning life beyond death, Dr. Savage takes up the present conditions of belief and considers the agnostic reaction from the extreme "other-worldliness" which it replaced, which was in turn followed by the Spiritualistic reaction against agnosticism. He points out the doubts concerning the doctrine of immortality held by the churches and the weakness of the traditional creeds and the loosening of their hold upon the people. He then considers the probabilities of a future life, probabilities which, as he admits, fall short of demonstration. The volume includes a consideration of the work of the Society for Psychical Research and also an appendix giving some of the author's own personal experiences in this line. Dr. Savage holds, as a provisional hypothesis, that continued existence is demonstrated, and that there have been at least some well authenticated communications from persons in the other life. The chief contents of the volume are as follows:

Primitive Ideas—Ethnic Beliefs—The Old Testament and Immortality—Paul's Doctrine of Death and the Other Life—Jesus and Immortality—The Other World and the Middle Ages—Protestant Belief Concerning Death and the Life Beyond—The Agnostic Reaction—The Spiritualistic Reaction—The World's Condition and Needs as to Belief in Immortality—Probabilities Which Fall Short of Demonstration—The Society for Psychical Research and the Immortal Life—Possible Conditions of Another Life—Some Hints as to Personal Experiences and Opinions.

This work was specially prepared for publication to meet the demands of a large and very earnest class of people who cannot afford to pay for a regular course of instruction under a qualified teacher. And those who can afford this privilege will find the work an invaluable text-book to their studies.

The Price is One Dollar Only, and is within reach of all who seek light. For sale at this office.

"Principles of Light and Color." By E. D. Babbitt, M. D., LL. D. A truly great work of a master mind, and one whom Spiritualists should delight to honor. The result of years of deep thought and patient research into Nature's finer forces are here gathered and made amenable to the well-being of humanity. Medical men especially, and scientists, general readers and students of occult forces will find instruction of great value and interest. A large, four-pound book, strongly bound, and containing beautiful illustrative plates. For sale at this office. Price, postpaid, $5. It is a wonderful work and you will be delighted with it.

"Encyclopedia of Biblical Spiritualism; or a Concordance of the Principal Passages of the Old and New Testament Scriptures which prove or imply Spiritualism; together with a brief history of the origin of many of the important books of the Bible." By Moses Hull. The well-known talented and scholarly author has here embodied the results of his many years' study of the Bible in its relations to Spiritualism. As its title denotes, it is a veritable encyclopedia of information on the subject. Price $1. For sale at this office.

DR. G. E. WATKINS,

The Noted Chronist,

Will on October 15, open his new Boston office, at 1087 Boylston street, where he will be pleased to meet all who may call between the hours of 10 a. m. and 2 p. m. The wonderful work in healing the sick that Dr. Watkins is accomplishing is indeed most astounding; his patients live to testify to his wonderful powers as a healer. For the last year his work has been most wonderful. He says himself that his cures this year have been more than ever before in numbers, as he confined himself to only 30 new patients a month. Dr. Watkins attends personally to each case, and therefore he can do better work than if he had a great many assistants; no staff of visible helpers are in his office to annoy and suggest this and that. He knows what is the trouble with each patient, and knows the right specific to give. He prepares and puts up all of his medicine, and has no help in his medical treatments that is visible help. Write him to-day, and by return mail you will receive the diagnose. No charge made for diagnosing your case. Send age, sex and leading sympton. C. E. BATH, M'gr.

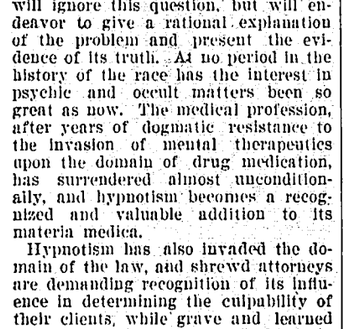
? ARE YOU SICK ?

—IF SO—

Does Your Doctor Understand Your Case?

Are You Getting Better?

If you are not getting better write today to Dr. C. E. WATKINS, Boston, Mass., and write him just your condition financially, and he will make his price for treatment within your reach. He is treating a great many cases free; others he charges a light fee.



He makes no charge whatever for Diagnosis.

If You Are Sick

Why not write him today, and no matter who has failed to help you, to consult him COSTS NOTHING.

Try DR. WATKINS.

Let him diagnose your case, and then it will help you to decide who knows best what is the matter with you. Send all letters to 1087 Boylston St., Boston, Mass.

TELEPATHY.

It Can Not Explain Spiritualism.

W. F. Peck lectured in St. Louis on the subject, "Does Telepathy Explain the Phenomena of Spiritualism?" In the course of his discourse he said:

The question most frequently asked of the advocate of Spiritualism is, "How can we know of a certainty that spirits can communicate with mortals?" People who are familiar with the latest developments in the line of psychic research no longer question the reality of psychic phenomena. Besides, the world-wide facts attested by Spiritualism, the investigations of the Society for Psychic Research, and the experiments of many well-known scientists pursued independently have removed all reasonable doubts of the substantial truth of these claims. The only question now is, What is the nature, source and purport of these phenomena?

No thoughtful and candid Spiritualist will ignore this question, but will endeavor to give a rational explanation of the problem and present the evidence of its truth. At no period in the history of the race has the interest in psychic and occult matters been so great as now. The medical profession, after years of dogmatic resistance to the invasion of mental therapeutics upon the domain of drug medication, has surrendered almost unconditionally, and hypnotism becomes a recognized and valuable addition to its materia medica.

Hypnotism has also invaded the domain of the law, and shrewd attorneys are demanding recognition of its influence in determining the culpability of their clients, while grave and learned Judges are modifying their decisions and qualifying their sentences in accordance with the extenuating circumstances of mental suggestion and hypnosis exercised upon the culprits to persuade them to crime. Instances of telepathic communion between men still on the mortal plane of being are so numerous as to scarcely excite surprise.

Clairvoyance, the ability to "see without eyes," to become cognizant of events, scenes and persons transpiring and existing at great distances, to read the contents of sealed letters and closed books, is now universally admitted to be a fact. The ability of some psychics, while in the trance state, to relate facts unknown either to the psychic or to the other persons present, has also been thoroughly demonstrated. These facts have been recognized and put forward by Spiritualists for years as evidence of the truth of the Spiritualistic theory. While admitting the reality of the phenomena many thinkers refuse to believe they indicate the truth of Spiritualism, but that all the power professed by the psychic pertain to this mundane sphere and may be explained on purely psychological grounds without reference to any other sphere of existence. They claim that man has two minds, objective and subjective. The objective or normal mind has no knowledge of the contents of the subjective mind. When the psychic is in the trance state he is under the domination of the subjective mind and is knowing to many things that the normal mind has no consciousness of.

Another theory is that "we are surrounded by, or immersed in, a sort of universal mind, which is a reservoir containing all knowledge, and that in some mysterious way the psychic unconsciously taps this reservoir, and so astonishes herself and others with facts the origin of which is untraceable and unknown." Thought is a universally diffused substance. "Thoughts are things." There is a mental atmosphere, so to speak, and every mind breathes it in as the lungs inhale the air.

The believer in the Spiritualistic hypothesis recognizes the substantial truth of much of the foregoing statement, yet unhesitatingly accepts the challenge to prove that the spirits of the disembodied can and do communicate intelligently with dwellers on the mortal plane of being.

In the first place, the admission that telepathy is a fact, and that minds in the body can communicate with each other in a supernormal way, is to admit constructively the possibility of similar intercourse between the discarnate spirit and the mortal, provided, of course, that the existence of disembodied spirits is also admitted. There is nothing favoring one proposition that does not equally support the other. Brain does not create thought any more than the thermometer governs the temperature. The brain is the instrument through which the intelligence gives expression to its thought. Thought and intelligence are not necessarily the same. Intelligence is an orderly arrangement of thought. An idiot or a lunatic may have thoughts, but they are rarely intelligent because not correlated. We think in our dreams, but in the great majority of cases there is no correlation or orderly arrangement of thought, hence dreams are usually fantastic and absurd.

Thought may exist independent of brain or organism, but there is no evidence of an intelligence existing separate from an organization, for intelligence is organized thought, and that is the crucial point, the test by which to determine the nature and source of psychic phenomena. A message containing a sustained and orderly arrangement of ideas is positive proof of an organized, individual intelligence, a personal, reasoning being. If the message says "I am John Smith," the chances against this being an accidental arrangement of words or thoughts are millions to one. And every intelligent word added to that sentence increases those chances a million fold. There can be no shadow of doubt that the above statement emanated from an organized intelligence, and the question becomes one of personal identity. How shall this identity be established? Precisely as you distinguish one thing or person from another—by its characteristics, its distinctive peculiarities, its earmarks. No two persons are exactly alike, physically or mentally. A friend or acquaintance can always identify himself to you on the earth plane, however distant, and the same has been done thousands of times by discarnate spirits.

If an intelligence writing or speaking through a psychic says to you, "I am your brother. My name is so and so. I died at such a place of such a disease, oh such a date," and details numerous circumstances known only to you, and some of which you were ignorant but verified later, all of which was unknown to the psychic in her normal state, would it not be straining credulity to the very point of breaking to attribute this communication to some hypothetical subliminal consciousness of the psychic rather than to accept the simple, plain, practical, rational solution of the question offered by the controlling intelligence itself? An overwhelming evidence of the truth of the spiritistic theory is the fact that the controlling intelligence always claims to be a disembodied spirit, and, having set aside the element of fraud, to attempt to explain such phenomena on the plea of telepathy and unconscious cerebration is to make of man's "subliminal self" a universal liar and give the psychic world over to the rule of devils.

Life of Dr. J. M. Peebles, by Prof. E. Whipple.

To the Editor:—To the spiritual student this work will make an excellent text book, covering as it does over a half century of the footprints made by one of the first pioneers ever to step on the Spiritual platform. In perusing its nearly six hundred pages, the writer meets with many old-time workers and friends, that revive reminiscences of the long ago, and we hear again the echoes of their spiritual axes as they hew a road through the wilderness of superstition to those spiritual highlands in "the divine to be," where their tired feet are now resting from their labors. To the young people in our ranks, this book is a valuable acquisition, as it makes a reliable history of the Cause, from its inception to the present time. I count it a privilege to place it in my library, and recommend the readers of The Progressive Thinker to do likewise. R. SPALDING.

The Old Men and Women Do Bless Him.

Thousands of people come or send every year to Dr. Bye for his Balmy Oil to cure them of cancer or other malignant diseases. Out of this number, a great many very old people whose ages range from seventy to one hundred years on account of distance and infirmities of age, they send for home treatment. A free book is sent telling what they say of the treatment. Address Dr. W. O. Bye, Drawer 1111, Kansas City, Mo. (If not afflicted, cut this out and send to some suffering one.)

TO SPIRITUALISTS.

The Progressive Thinker in its issue of October 26, very kindly printed the address delivered by the undersigned at the N. S. A. annual convention in Washington. Following out a suggestion made to me, I have sent a great many copies of the address to Spiritualists who in turn have passed them out to Liberalists and members of churches. The reports thus far show that the address is going to be an excellent missionary document. Hoping this is true, I have, therefore, concluded to reproduce the address in pamphlet form, and will send to any Spiritualist, without charge, as many copies as he thinks he could use. Please address me at Lima, Ohio. JAMES B. TOWNSEND.

CURED BY A MIGHTY POWER!

A System of Psychic, Hygienic, and Medical Treatment which Banishes Chronic Diseases.

DESPAIR NOT, THERE IS STILL HOPE FOR YOU.

DR. J. M. PEEBLES.

DR. PEEBLES, the Grand Old Man of Battle Creek, Michigan, so well known throughout the world as an authority on Psychic Phenomena and the application of the Psychic Science in Curing Disease has, with a corps of able assistants, so perfected a system of curing chronic and "incurable" cases that almost every disease known to man yields promptly and permanently when placed in their hands. Do not despair if other physicians and methods have failed in your case for they have on file thousands of letters from patients telling of their wonderful recovery under their care after years of unsuccessful treatment from the best physicians of the world. Geo. H. Weeks, of Cleveland, O., sends heartfelt thanks for restoration to health after suffering from nervous prostration and insomnia for years, he says he now enjoys excellent health and restful sleep every night. Mrs J. A. Rust, of Itasca, Minn., cured of uric acid poisoning in two months' treatment writes. "I am better than in years and each day brings new health and strength. I will refer all ailing ones to you." Mary A. Earl, Crawford, Mich., suffering from pronounced female difficulties and kidney disease says: "I took your treatment three months and it has been a success in my case. I am indeed grateful to you for my recovery." C. E. Davis, Woodman, N. H., who suffered all the miseries of a dyspeptic writes that as a result of Dr. Peebles' treatment, he had not missed a meal since last March. D. W. Bridgman, of Del Norte, Col., writing Sept 30, after a three months' course, "When I began treatment with Dr. Peebles' Institute of Health I was a cripple, unable to walk but little with a cane. Now I am able to walk with ease, some days ten or fifteen miles. My general health is excellent. I can hardly find words to express my gratitude as previously I had tried everything I could hear of and got no relief. Mrs. Isaac Varney, Dover, N. H., a sufferer from spinal trouble and nerve exhaustion, writes she would not go back to the state of health she was in before taking this treatment for all the world. Solmon Fried, of Vanderbilt, California, cured of neuralgia and catarrh, says, "I am well and a thousand times obliged to you." If you are in poor health, no matter if you have suffered for years and your case has been pronounced incurable, just write the Doctor a plain, truthful letter, and they will carefully consider the same, giving you a complete diagnosis of your case stating just what may be expected from a course of treatment with them. All sufferers are invited to write them for they wish to prove to all the sick and afflicted that there are no Incurable Diseases, for as the Doctors say: "Every symptom or condition has its cause and when the cause is discovered its removal is easy." They have proven the truth of this statement time and again by diagnosing and curing thousands of cases not understood or cured by the regular practicing physician. They will not only tell you your exact condition but will also give you special advice in your case and valuable literature explaining their wonderful system of home treatment which has cured thousands and thousands numbered among the incurable. It matters not how far distant you live from them their methods will restore you. In perfecting this grand system of treatment the members of this Institute spent over half a century in close study and investigation into all forms of chronic diseases in leading medical institutions of the world; also three journeys have been made around the world to gain along these lines and to add the experiences of the most noted authorities of every land until at last they discovered and perfected a system of Psychic and Home Treatment equal to such a degree that no matter how far away you may live from them, you may take the treatment and be cured the same as if you were to spend hundreds of dollars in going to some sanitarium, or to Battle Creek for the Doctor's personal treatments. It is an ideal home treatment that all may take in the privacy of their own homes without the knowledge of anyone. Thousands have taken it and been cured and you can do likewise. The Greatest Discovery of the age is Psychic Treatment. Investigate it and be healed. No matter where you live, for this is positively a home treatment, or what your disease may be or how many have termed it incurable write the Doctors for a complete diagnosis of your case and get their literature explaining fully the wonders of their treatment and also for Dr. Peebles' essay "The Psychic Science in the Art of Healing" explaining fully the wonders of this grand science and Psychic treatment, the greatest power known to man for the relief of suffering and cure of disease. Sit down and WRITE TO-DAY.

It Costs You Absolutely Nothing.

No matter what your trouble is.

There Is Hope for You

In this GRAND SCIENCE!

PASSED TO SPIRIT LIFE.

Passed to the higher life, October 23, 1901, Mrs. Johanna Miller, from her home, 31 Bissell street, Chicago, aged 45 years. She leaves one daughter to mourn her loss, but the knowledge of spirit return brings a comfort that mother has just passed the veil into a better life. Services were conducted by Rev. H. Schmitt, of the German Lutheran Church.

LENA R. DELLINGER.

John L. Chambers, of Dillon, Montana, passed from this life, October 10, 1901. He was a firm believer in the principles and faith advocated by The Progressive Thinker. His death was the result of a fall which caused great suffering, but the end was peaceful. May the good angels help him in his pursuit for knowledge in the spirit land.

ENCYCLOPEDIA
...OF...
BIBLICAL SPIRITUALISM
...OR...
A CONCORDANCE

To the principal passages of the Old and New Testament Scriptures which prove or imply Spiritualism;

Together with a brief history of the origin of many of the important books of the Bible.

BY MOSES HULL.

Much that is in this book appeared in an abridged form in a series of nine full pages of THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER. These articles were prepared at the call of hundreds of Spiritualists who felt the need of some kind of document for ready reference. They only seemed to whet the appetite for more; hence the publication of this work.

The author, Moses Hull, has written many volumes on Spiritualistic and other themes and each one is full of careful study on the subject chosen. Mr. Hull, in his introduction of this work says:

"Hoping that this book will serve to lead the people out of the wilderness of doubt and despair, and that when Spiritualism shall have wrested the Bible from its 'sanctified' enemies, it will not 'spike' it, but will use it to batter down the walls of Christian superstition and ignorance, I send it out on its errand of enlightenment with the humble prayer that it will prove a divine benediction to every reader."

THE ENCYCLOPEDIA OF BIBLICAL SPIRITUALISM contains 325 pages, beautifully printed on good paper, contains a full-page portrait of the author and is handsomely bound in cloth. Every Spiritualist should have this work.

T. JAY HUDSON ON SPIRITUALISM.

A Critical Review, and Reply to the Assumptions of the Noted Author, by Leo Miller, of Chicago.

But there are other cases in the New Testament where there is no possible room for evasion of the truth. In the book of Matthew, 17th chapter, and also in Mark, is related the story of Christ's transfiguration on the mountain. Peter, James and John were with the Master. Celestial influences fell upon the little party, and Christ was transfigured in the presence of his three disciples. "And behold," says the record, "there appeared unto them Moses and Elias, talking with Jesus."

Now here is a case of two men who had been dead physically many hundreds of years, who were still in possession of their objective faculties and did reveal themselves to three men while they conversed with Jesus.

How is it possible that Doctor Hudson who seems to be a student of the Bible, should have overlooked the cases I have cited? His oversight leaves him open to the suspicion that he purposely passed them by because they would not fit into his abhorrent theory that one-half of our personality becomes extinct at death. But in his evident anxiety and zeal to destroy Modern Spiritualism, at any sacrifice, cannot he see that he strikes a fatal blow at the "book of books" which he professes to revere? I challenge him to show by science or philosophy or reason that the revelations of truth contained in the Bible are other than revelations made by the spirits of men. They certainly were made by spiritual beings in the service of God; and one of the most notable books of the collection was given, as I shall presently show, by the spirit of a man who once lived on earth.

The Bible is commonly called the "Word of God." It may properly be called such in a qualified sense, but not in the sense that God personally dictated the subject-matter to, or through, an inspired amanuensis. This was done by spiritual beings called angels, who came in the name of God to make known his will. In hundreds of passages we read of the "angel of the Lord" who did something or said something. Often the expression is used, "God spake by his angel;" on other occasions the term angel is omitted, and it says "God spake;" but we must infer as on other occasions, through intermediate agents.

Now, if there be one book in the Bible that would seem to have required the personal attention of God to make known its wonderful contents to the mind of the revelator, that book is the Apocalypse; and yet the amazing revelations contained therein were given to St. John on the Isle of Patmos, not by God, nor yet by Jesus Christ, but by the spirit of one of the old prophets whom Jesus delegated to go to John and make known through him the "things that must shortly come to pass."

"And I John saw these things and heard them. And when I had heard and seen, I fell down to worship before the feet of the angel which shewed me these things.

"Then saith he unto me, 'See thou do it not; for I am thy fellow-servant, and of thy brethren the prophets; worship God.'" (Rev. 22:8,9.)

Here we find an instance where the spirit of one of the old prophets, whose body had been dead hundreds of years, still in possession of a most vigorous objective mind, and with hypnotic faculties of suggestion the most wonderful ever recorded of men or spirits. Nothing reported by members of societies for Psychical Research, or by Doctor Hudson in his "Law of Psychic Phenomena," begins to compare with it in magnificence and power.

I confess I feel reluctant, as if it were an insult, to ask Doctor Hudson to rise and explain away this case. And yet his attitude on the subject constrains me to seem pitiless, and require him to perform this impossible feat, or else frankly renounce his dreadful theory that, in our transit from earth to the skies, we become poor, weak, emasculated souls, deprived of all our vigorous faculties of observation, research, analysis, reason, induction and hypnotic power. These faculties belong to the objective mind and this mind he kills off with the death of the body. All he leaves us is intuition, memory and emotion; and as knowledge and truth come to us through intuition without effort, application, investigation and study are over forever.

What will we do in the Doctor's paradise? I can imagine nothing but rest, everlasting inactivity and indolence. Knowledge and wisdom will flow into the soul through the channel of intuition without personal exertion. Will they be worth the having purchased so cheaply? Doubtful. The active, restless spirit of man protests against such a listless immortality. Dr. Dick, Elizabeth Stuart Phelps, and the Spiritualists' philosophy, offer a future existence a thousand thousand times more inviting and sensible. Eternity is altogether too long for loafing without respite or change. We should all die of ennui. Doctor Hudson, who has led an active life in the exercise of his objective faculties, and often, no doubt, became very weary from much thought, may long for a good long rest when "the day is done;" but possibly he, after being shut up in his tramp's paradise of laziness for a few million years, might feel like getting out to stretch his limbs and try his hand again at writing books.

Long as my criticism of Doctor Hudson's theories has already become, it would be notably incomplete if I fail to notice briefly two other points of importance in the discussion of this subject. The Doctor admits that mediums as a rule, are honest, and that the psychic phenomena they exhibit are real; and the reason why they ascribe the agency to spirits, he says, is due to silent suggestions made by persons present who hold such belief, and to auto-suggestion. He assumes that the power to move even ponderable bodies, produce percussive sounds (raps), and read the minds of persons present or absent, is latent in the subjective mind. This mind is ever amenable to suggestion whether the thing suggested be true or false. The latter statement, with certain qualifications, I admit as true; and I also admit that mediums are often misled by false suggestions. In his work on Hypnotism, Doctor Hudson himself confesses that he has often purposely deceived mediums by suggesting fictitious names, such as that of a sister which he never had, a brother's name still living, and even the spirit of a pig, and got a communication from it! We usually find what we seek, and I think the zealous adversary of Spiritualism fooled himself quite as much in the inference he draws therefrom as he did the impressible mind of the medium in responding to his piggish suggestion. The conditions precedent to reliable mediumship, all will admit, must be extremely delicate and easily disturbed. Human minds are not easy things to control. Persons present at a seance should be passive and hold the objective powers of the mind as much in abeyance as possible if they wish to obtain reliable impressions on the sensitive mind and brain of the medium. If Doctor Hudson were sitting for a photograph, and some wag without the fear of greatness before his eyes should thrust a pig between him and the sensitized plate in the camera, conditions would be sadly disturbed; the developed photograph would reveal much more pig than Doctor. That fact would hardly refute photography. Good pictures are taken every day under good conditions; and so when there is no active opposition, no false suggestions, and all present are in a passive, quiescent state, invisible intelligences may impress their thoughts upon the sensitized tablets of a human mind. This fact has been attested by hundreds of thousands of honest inquirers, among whom are men of eminent learning, whose scientific attainments and painstaking methods of investigating psychic phenomena, are unsurpassed by any in the world.

But if environment and preconceived notions of the medium determine the result, what will Doctor Hudson do with cases where all present believe that the invisible agency back of the phenomena is electricity, "odic force," the devil, or anything rather than spirit power? and yet invariably the same answer—"I am a spirit." Let him explain away the very first case on record. Modern spiritual phenomena appeared about fifty years ago in the family of Mr. and Mrs. Fox and their three daughters who lived in Hydesville, a small hamlet near Rochester, N. Y. Unexpectedly, and very much to their annoyance, strange noises, like muffled raps, were heard about the house, usually on the floor and walls. The dominant belief in the family was that the sounds were produced by rats under the floor and in the ceiling; but as the disturbances grew more and more persistent their fears and superstition led them to admit the possibility of a devil haunting their house. One of the daughters in a trifling, half-playful spirit undertook to interrogate the unseen power. She said, "Make one rap," and one rap was heard; "Make two raps," two raps came; "Make three," three distinct sounds. Now I want to know, she said, what you are and what you want. I will ask you direct questions, and for "no" make one rap, for "yes" make three. "Are you a mischievous rat?" One rap, "no." "Are you a wicked devil haunting our house?" One thundering rap, "no." "Then are you the ghost of a dead person?" Three distinct raps came, "yes." The poor mediumistic girl was frightened almost out of her wits to think she had raised a ghost, and ran crying to her mother and told her what she had done.

Now, this one case upsets the Doctor's hypothesis. He says himself, that a theory that does not explain every fact is false. The members of the family and all the world besides had no belief in "spirit rapping." Environment and auto-suggestion were all adverse to the theory of spiritual agency.

But this is by no means an isolated case; there are hundreds of thousands more where the conditions were substantially like it. Every day in rural districts, as well as in towns, individuals and families who believe Spiritualism to be a big humbug, or, if superstitiously inclined, the work of the devil, find themselves unexpectedly confronted by some phase of this unseen power. Clergymen and priests are often called in to exorcise the devil by prayer, and drive him away. But the "devil" persists that he is not a devil, but the harmless spirit of a departed human being, and wants them to recognize him. Gradually their fears and prejudices and preconceived beliefs give way, and they become happy converts of the new faith.

Under similar circumstances of disbelief and opposing surroundings thousands have become mediums, and millions made believers in the reality of spirit communion. In deed, the whole progress of Modern Spiritualism for fifty years has been made against a world of adverse environment and adverse auto-suggestion; but never once has the power back of the phenomena confessed itself to be other than a disembodied spirit! Will the Doctor please explain cases where the conditions he presupposes to exist do not exist, but the very opposite?

And right here arises questions touching the intelligence, veracity and gullibility of the subjective mind. Doctor Hudson says that this subjective entity is the "true Ego," and possesses "powers which "proclaim it as a part of God, as partaking of the nature and attributes of the Divine Mind"—powers which "demonstrate its kinship to Omniscience" (page 324). This semi-omniscient mind, he seriously claims, is, under suggestion, the real source of all alleged spiritual phenomena. It peers into the mind of an investigator and discovers that he wants a message, for example, from his mother-in-law, and straightway gives him one, though the dear spirit isn't within a million miles of the "circle," and knows nothing of it. It can read like a book the minds of people at the antipodes, produce percussive sounds on floors and ceilings, and float tables and pianos around the room in mid-air as if they were feathers! In one case which the Doctor relates (page 246) a pious darky dozing alone in a railway car was suddenly awakened by a cry of "wreck! wreck!" which was repeated three times. In the twinkling of an eye the ego jumped out of its dusky body and flew ahead to make an inspection. It found mountainous rocks projecting above the track, and by some system of higher mathematics unknown to the objective mind of mortals, worked out the problem to a fraction, and discovered that in just one hour, twenty-seven minutes, and four seconds (or thereabouts) the cohesive attraction of the rocky particles would give way, and the immense masses would come crashing down on a passing train and wreck it!

I confess that in my version of this remarkable case, which Doctor Hudson accepts as true, I have perpetrated an unimportant anachronism. The Ego of the colored preacher must have been out on a tour of inspection and made his discovery previously, and then returned and woke up the dozer with the cry of "wreck! wreck!" My slight chronological error does not change the marvelous character of the incident.

But who or what hypnotized the negro and freed the ego so that it could go out and perform this wonderful feat? According to the Doctor's theory the subjective mind knows nothing and does nothing till acted upon by a suggestion from an objective mind; it may be its own or that of another's. But who in all the world knew that the projecting rocks along the track would fall asunder in an hour and a half from the time the negro heard the alarm, and wreck a passing train? Of course nobody.

Now when the astute hypnotist gets hold of a hard case like this which will not fit his theory, he is very prolific in discovering loop-holes of escape. In this instance he suggests, as a probable solution of the case, independent clairvoyance, or a temporary disembodiment of the darky's Ego, trusting that the gentle reader will not notice the inconsistency of his explanation; for the stubborn fact remains that the clairvoyant and clairaudient powers of the soul can be awakened, and the Ego released from its fetters of flesh, only by hypnotization. Who or what hypnotized the negro?

Oh, to what straits of absurdity and subterfuge a person is driven when he is more anxious to support a favorite theory than to discover truth! How easy the explanation of the colored preacher's experience if we accept the simple declaration of the inspired psalmist affirming the truth of spirit guardianship over mortals, when he says (I give a free version of the text): "God giveth his angels charge over us, lest at any time we dash the foot against a stone."

I have, in conclusion, a question of serious import to ask Doctor Hudson. If, as he says, the subjective mind has intelligence and "powers which proclaim it as a part of God, as partaking of the nature and attributes of the Divine Mind, and demonstrate its kinship to Omniscience;" and which is really the author and maker of all so-called spiritual phenomena, why it should not know the simple fact, and confess it, and take the credit to itself? Or if it does know, why it should lie so about it? A semi-Omniscient being that knows next to everything knowable, ought to know a little something about itself and what it does. Is it too modest to confess its greatness, and rather tell a lie and give the credit to spirits

This point needs explanation. Millions of times during the last fifty years when seriously questioned as to the cause of the psychic phenomena, the invisible intelligence has ascribed the agency to departed human beings and never to anything else. Is that intelligence a truth-teller, a dupe, or a liar?

It will not do for the Doctor to say, as some hypnotists do, that the subjective mind is compelled to obey every suggestion whether true or false or criminal. He is on record as saying (see chapter 10, "Law of Psychic Phenomena") that any amount of influence brought to bear upon the mind of the hypnotic subject cannot make him or her violate settled convictions of right and honor and virtue; cannot induce the person to steal, commit murder, burglary, reveal secrets, or, if a virtuous woman, submit to immoral relations. Very good; but how about lying? The most harmless lies are bad; but when it comes to deceiving and misleading millions of human beings into a belief that the eminent author calls "pernicious," I think it must be set down as a thousand times worse than the theft of a pocket-book, or a little harmless tattling about the ritual and pass words of a secret order.

Doctor Thomas Jay Hudson, you drive us to the conclusion that your subjective Ego and soul divine is the most consummate liar, or pitiable dupe, in all creation! Alas!

Chicago, Ill. LEO MILLER.

A Correction.

To the Editor:—Kindly allow me to correct the erroneous impression given by one of your recent writers on the late convention, that a small local society of a very few members can have two delegates at the N. S. A. annual convention. This is not the case. Every chartered society can have one delegate for its charter, but no local society has ever had two delegates unless it pays dues on over fifty members.

Courtesy of temper, when it is used to veil churlishness of deed, is but a knight's girdle around the breast of a base clown.—Walter Scott.

"WHERE AM I AT NOW?"

In 619 of The Progressive Thinker Bro. McFarland returns to his assault on me by a misstatement, or total misapprehension of my explanation heretofore published in The Progressive Thinker. Were it not for the opportunity of presenting a few important facts, I should pay no attention to the writings of a man who confesses, as Bro. McFarland has to a friend of mine, that he doesn't believe in a personal God, and then publicly assaults me as an atheist. What is he but an atheist? Every one rejecting the idea of a Deific Personality is an atheist.

There is a vast amount of "twisting and turning" on the part of many professing Spiritualists to escape the imputation of atheism. They are atheists as much as Bro. Nicholas or myself, but not honest enough to confess their true position. So they will pray on the platform, and follow the prayer with an atheistic lecture.

But to the article. The Brother seems very much astonished at my lack of reverence for the authority of great names. Well, I not only have no reverence therefor, but I have a positive contempt for that style of argument which seeks to bolster itself up by quoting them as proof. My reason therefor is, that it is only the opinions of these parties that are appealed to. And this is especially true of all who are appealed to on this God question. They don't know anything about it. They only believe. And among the long list of distinguished names who have been God believers a large percentage have been believers in witchcraft; and a still larger number in the Devil and eternal damnation. Professing Spiritualists ought to be so far progressed as to know that Spiritualism is a Science and a Philosophy, and not a bundle of beliefs founded on other people's beliefs.

But the great appeal is to A. J. Davis, who is termed "the greatest of Spiritualists." I am glad that there is somewhere an appreciation of A. J. Davis, whom I regard as the most wonderful man of the 19th century. But I must remind Bro. McFarland that many years ago a large per cent of the Spiritualists substantially excommunicated Bro. Davis from the Spiritualist fold; and the God believers, like Henry Kiddle, of New York, wrote the most savage criticisms of the "Apostle of Nature." Since then Bro. D. has quietly pursued the calling of a physician in Boston, and nothing has come from his pen, as in the earlier period of his earthly labor.

Bro. McFarland confuses and misrepresents my allusion to the friendship between Davis and Finney, and my opinion that Davis was more or less influenced by Finney. And because I applied the phrase, "God intoxicated" to Finney, he crows as though he had won a great victory, and put me in the limbo of a flagrant inconsistency. Let us see. Spinoza was the first man termed "God intoxicated." But he was a Pantheist. So was Finney—an ultra, Idealistic Pantheist. Spirit was all—"the eternal stuff of which all things were made." Said Finney: "God is IntelliGENCE, but not IntelliGENT." God, he said, had no personality except in man. Now, if Bro. Davis was influenced by Finney it would be only in the direction of Pantheism.

Conversing with Davis at one time, he said his highest conception of Deity was that of a Central Sun. For years Bros. Davis, Finney and myself were laborers together. I have spent weeks with Davis, and had Finney in my house as a guest, and met them both in I don't know how many conventions, and we were always in accord, working together in harmony. If Atheism is such a fearful condition, I should suppose Bro. Davis would have sought to convert me to the true faith.

But the most important matter is the article in the Arabula, affirmed to be a mathematical demonstration of a Deity. This article appeared first in the Democratic Review. It was copied afterward into the Herald of Progress. But no name was signed to it. I had no idea, when I read it, and wrote a review, that Bro. Davis claimed to be the author. That claim came in the Arabula.

Bro. McFarland thinks he catches me tripping when I doubt Davis' ability to construct such a mathematical argument, and then affirm that there is not one real, original argumentation in the whole article. It seems to me that any person of good common sense could understand that position. But it seems they cannot, and therefore I must explain farther. The form of the argument was strictly mathematical and logical; but it was not real because it rested upon a false assumption. It was not original, because it was simply a repetition of Paley, with a mathematical nomenclature instead of Paley's form of statement. Paley starts out on this affirmation: Design implies a Designer, that is an intelligent personality capable of adapting means to ends so as to secure a desired result. His illustration is a watch, a purely mechanical contrivance for keeping time. His application of the proposition is to the innumerable adaptations in nature of thing to thing, and things to force, and forces to things. The stupendous fallacy of the whole argument is the unproved assumption that the vital and chemical adaptations of nature are analogous to the mechanical construction of a watch, or any kind of a machine. It is a sweeping denial of the self-evident autokratism of nature in all her vital and chemical processes. The most stupid intellect will tell you that there is no analogy between a forest of growing trees and a watch factory. But Paley's argument assumes that they are perfectly identical. This transparent fallacy has led many able theologians to reject Paley entirely; and the late President Finney, of Oberlin, declared that Paley's Natural Theology laid the foundation for Atheism in the minds of theological students.

Now let us examine the famous argument ascribed to A. J. Davis. One says design implies a designer; the other that mathematics implies a mathematician. A mathematician is an intellectual personality; so also is a designer. Both are agreed so far as the form of their argument is concerned. They differ only in their terms. They both then appeal to nature to furnish them the evidences of design or mathematics, to prove the existence of a supreme intellect which is a mathematician and a designer. "God geometrises," said Plato, which the Davis article interprets God works mathematically, and mathematical working evidences the highest form of intellect. So taught August Comte, and yet he was an Atheist.

I have already stated the monstrous fallacy of Paley in assuming the identity of vital processes with mechanical constructiveness. But the assumption of the Davis article is more absurd, if possible, than Paley's. It assumes that there is a perfect analogy between the concrete mathematics of nature and the work of the school-boy solving the problems of Euclid. Is there the slightest difference in the essence of the argument? Not the least. One starts from the watch shop, and the other from the student's study, but both start with precisely the same proposition which everybody admits because it is self-evident; that is that intellectual activity demonstrates the existence of an intellectual personality behind it. The employment of the terms design and mathematics is useless, so far as the gist of the argument is concerned, for intellect includes them both.

To test the sameness of the two forms of argument, I will take the two leaders to a beehive. Here is a splendid manifestation of mathematical working. Euclid himself could not improve upon the construction of the comb cells for the storing of honey. They are the perfection of mathematical construction. And the argument asserts that mathematical working is the highest form of intellect. Here is the working. Where is the intellect? But the design man is in ecstasy. See, he says, this wonderful plan. No mathematician has ever yet contrived a form of cell which conserves so much space for use on the same area as this arrangement of cells. But this is only part of the design, for this method of construction calls for the least possible amount of comb material, and it costs the bee much more labor to gather that than it does to collect the honey. What a wonderful evidence of design. The arguments in essence are the same, but the Paley argument is the most complete, because it includes the mathematical as a part of itself.

But we will leave the hive, and go into another place where there is before us a piece of honey-comb. We ask who made this finely and mathematically constructed material? The answer comes from a common man, "The honey bee." The respective representatives put in their arguments as stated above. The common man then remarks: "Either God or the bee made that honey-comb. If the bee made it then he possesses, according to your argument, the highest grade of intellect. He is equal to man. He has designed a structure which man may imitate, but has never yet excelled. But if God is the designing mathematician, then he has been personally employed in the construction of every honey cell for countless ages of duration. Take your choice, gentlemen."

I don't think it necessary to say that very able argument may be used to defend the extremest falsehood, and that in essence it may be simply a repetition of what has already been employed. Could any one question the wonderful power of Chalmer's arguments, and yet he was largely repeating Paley; just as our mathematician has done.

Let us now come to the authorship of the article. I said, in my explanation, that I did not believe that A. J. Davis wrote it, and gave some reasons for my lack of faith. Those reasons are still strong, but as I only briefly hinted, I will state them and others more freely.

1. In the first place, Davis does not claim to be the exclusive author, but admits he borrowed some of it. When we know what he borrowed and what he supplied we can form a better judgment of the article in its entirety.

2. I said, very mildly, that I did not believe that Davis had ever been in Texas when that article was made up. I will now say that I know, and Bro. McFarland knows, and every American, not an ignoramus, knows that A. J. Davis was never in Texas, "lying on the banks of the beautiful Colorado, reading Plato, watching the Rockies, meditating on the God question, and suddenly converted by a Texas flower and Plato's 'God Geometrises;'" for the simple reason that the Colorado River is not in Texas, but out here in California and Arizona mainly, though some of its affluents come from other States. But the story is a very pretty romance to preface the sterner mathematical work of the article, and would have more effect upon some minds than the argument itself. We will pass the geographical and botanic portions for the present.

3. The next point is the ability of Davis to write such an article. As he does not claim to be the only author, we might dismiss this part of the subject with no farther comment. But as much depends thereon, and as the future history of Spiritualism is involved, I am impressed to treat the matter at greater length. And especially from the presentation of one quotation from the article. Referring to the argument, he says: "I hold myself pledged to maintain it in fair controversy against all adversaries; though I will not debate the question with any person unacquainted with algebra, geometry, and the strict rules of logic." Now it sounds very funny to any one acquainted with the history of A. J. Davis, that he should refuse to debate with persons uninformed in those particular studies. What did he know about algebra, geometry or logic? It is doubtful if he could have explained the difference between the Binominal Theorem and the Differential Calculus, or between a regular Syllogism and an Enthymeme. A. J. Davis was not a student but a Seer. When he gave the Divine Revelations he could neither speak nor write the English language correctly. Thrown into the mesmeric trance by Dr. Lyon, he gave that work to the world. After that, he of himself passed into what he termed the Superior Condition and wrote the Great Harmonia and other works. Now, what was the claim put forth by himself and his most intimate friends? Was it that he was a literary man? A student, mastering Algebra, Chemistry, Geometry, Logic and other branches of Science? Nothing of the kind. At the opening of his career he had had but five months' schooling in the common schools, and had read a few Universalist controversial books. The claim (and it was just) was that he was not a scholar, not a reader of books, not a student in any of the sciences, but a Seer. Does any one believe that an unobtrusive, modest man, like A. J. Davis, would put forth such a condition for debating such a question? I, for one, do not. Nor do I believe that he ever denounced atheists as "the moral felons" of the universe.

The article in question, so far as its romantic Texas episode, and the root idea of mathematics is concerned, is undoubtedly from some excitable scholar, whose nervousness got the better of his soundest judgment. Just read the story of the Colorado River in Texas, of A. J. Davis throwing Plato on the ground, in a fit of anger or despair, of his picking up the three-times-five star flower, and then snatching up Plato, pressing it to his bosom, kissing it and the flower with tears of joy, being in a perfect tempest of nervous excitement, and then turn and read the Magic Staff by this same A. J. Davis, who after the gift of that Staff was never either greatly depressed or exalted in feeling. Who ever saw A. J. Davis excited? Who ever saw a man of such uninterrupted placidity of feeling and action? I never have. If the Texas story was true, then the Magic Staff is a sham and a falsehood. But I believe in the Magic Staff. I have seen its author tried, and never saw him excited in any direction.

But it may be re-urged that Bro. Davis claims the authorship of the article. I have already stated that he does not claim the exclusive authorship. He says, "the aggregate argument is my own, though many of the particular elements have been borrowed from others." This substantially tells the whole story. A. J. Davis is the editor of this article. He is the aggregator. The "aggregate argument" is made up from "particular elements," many of which were "borrowed from others." In modern phraseology it is a symposium with the names of most of the authors omitted. When we get the particulars we shall know how much to attribute to each contributor.

I don't think there was ever any call for controversy, as it fell dead from the press so far as I know. It made no impression on the thinking, intellectual world.

In conclusion, I will remind Bro. McFarland that Spiritualists have never regarded A. J. Davis as authority, nor any other person. They appeal to no man, no Bible, nor to the God of any Bible. A. J. Davis appeals to no God or Bible as authority, nor does he anywhere counsel others to do so. I esteem him, as before said, as the most wonderful man of the 19th century. Not because he ever learned "algebra, geometry or logic," but because, ignorant of these, and all other branches of science, and literature as well, he produced such works as Nature's Divine Revelations and the Great Harmonia. I recall with unalloyed pleasure the many, many seasons of pleasant and profitable intercourse spent with him in the past. I regret that he identified himself so much in the article in question, and this writing is intended to free him from the position of being regarded as an authority, as nothing could be more distasteful to him than that. But no one is above mistakes at times. However, mistakes are not crimes, and, therefore, Bro. McFarland may be pardoned for trying to ring in A. J. Davis as an authority for the existence of a personal God, in which he confesses he does not believe.

J. S. LOVELAND.

First Spiritualist Church of Columbus, Ohio.

The ladies of the First Spiritualist Church of Columbus are arranging for an entertainment and sale of useful and fancy articles, to take place in the vestry of the church on December 7 next. The object of this sale is to procure funds wherewith to furnish a suite of rooms above the vestry, which are needed for social purposes, sewing circles and the like, in connection with the church work. Dinner will be served from 5:30 to 8 p. m. This sale will be of the booth style, the various articles being in charge of competent committees in suitable booths.

In this connection an invitation is cordially extended to the friends of Spiritualism all over the country to donate articles to the church to be sold on this occasion.

Although the church building and its appurtenances are entirely free from debt, and the beautiful structure an ornate addition to the city's temples, the suite of rooms referred to require furnishing in order that methodical work can be carried on in behalf of the church.

It is hoped that the friends everywhere will join in this work of love and offer of their store of good things some article that the ladies can dispose of in their effort to raise funds.

All donations will be gratefully acknowledged and should be forwarded to Mrs. J. D. Arras, Chairman, 42 East Rich street, Columbus, Ohio.

MEDICAL MURDER.

And Such Must Be Protected by Law!

The following Associated Press dispatch at the present time has special interest:

"St. Louis, Mo., Nov. 6.—The thirteenth fatal case of lockjaw, resulting from the injection of anti-toxin for the treatment of diphtheria, was reported to-day. Charles Cytron, eleven years old, was the victim. His death occurred several days ago, but was not reported at the same time to the coroner."

In plainer speech, thirteen children were pronounced, by those licensed by the Board of Health to practice medicine because well qualified by having received diplomas from medical colleges, to be suffering from diphtheria. These doctors received anti-toxin from its manufacturers as a cure for that dread disease. Because of their assumption of superior knowledge the parents of these children allowed these practitioners to inject the deadly anti-toxin into the blood of these children, and to the last one the result was not restoration to health as promised, but lockjaw, with the most terrible suffering that can be experienced; suffering to which the rack of the torture chamber has no comparison. After a few trials, it would have been inferred that the doctors would have called a halt and become doubtful. Yet they did not, any more than they do with vaccination for small-pox, to which lockjaw and blood poisoning are constant attendants.

Thirteen victims, and the fourteenth receives the deadly virus with the same unyielding trust in the treatment! No one can resist this ruthless massacre of the innocents, for the doctors are licensed by the state; are formed into the most despotic trust that exists, and support each other against all charges of malpractice. What would be the result should any other class attempt the cure of disease, and by the remedies employed bring on thirteen cases of lockjaw with its awful death scenes? It would not then be malpractice but murder, premeditated, coolly calculated and fiendish murder!

Anti-toxin! Why anti? Is not this anti-toxin filtered from the fever-corrupted and putrescent blood of the horse, made diseased and putrid by injection of toxin, and capable of fermenting any blood into which it enters, as yeast of changing the substance into it is blended? Instead of being anti-toxin; it is more deadly in its effects than the woorara with which the savage tips his arrow.

Yet such treatment is recommended by the great medical schools; laboratories erected for the production of the various anti-toxins, and fortunes made in their sale and dispensation. Can it be expected that the doctors will turn from the slaughter by their use when injection is so easy and the pay so far exceeds that of hygienic treatment? Perhaps sometime when other remedies are introduced they may, but the pages of medical history are not cheering. For many centuries mercury was the chief remedy for nearly all diseases, in various combinations, more or less virulently poisonous. The doctors gave it, and waited for their victims to pass through the slow changes their remedy induced. Salivation, dropping out of the teeth from the swollen gums; the necrosis of the bones, the formation of abscesses, through the discharge of which they believed the bad humors passed, were considered indications of returning health, and if the patient lived, it was to drag through life-long suffering.

For centuries in connection with mercury, blood-letting was inseparable. To be able to bleed made a doctor of the most ignorant. The doctor let the "bad blood" and disturbing "humors" out of the veins; he injected mercury through the stomach; "cleansed the system" with acrid cathartics, and this not being torture enough, he created "counter-irritation" with blisters, or cupping, or later with white-hot irons. It was all done by "learned doctors," that is for the time, and considered soundly orthodox.

If a patient with fever called in a doctor, and that doctor proceeded to give a purge that would prostrate a man in robust health; take a quart of bad blood away; administer an emetic to cleanse the stomach, and follow with calomel till the lips could not close over the swollen jaws; and while suffering the tortures of the damned from thirst, water was withheld until death in pitiful mercy came to stay the hand of the torturer, the wonderful skill of the practitioner was not called in question, and he was as trustingly called to the next afflicted.

Not only were the doctors trusted, but more wonderful they went on for centuries scarcely changing the treatment although they saw its dreadful consequences.

Now they have anti-toxin for mercury. They do not use the lancet to let out blood, and regard so doing as equivalent to death to the fever patient. Are they more skilled? Have they at last mastered disease? They out to be satisfied, for in their anti-toxins they have of all remedies, those which combine the most deadly; the essence and concentration of ferments which by corrupting the blood strike at the source of vital forces, and fill every cell and fibre with the debris of decaying tissures.

How long will a credulous public be made to believe that health, which is the purity and harmony of the organized body, can be gained by introduction of toxins which corrupt every cell from the grey nerve substance to the indurated bone, and make it a putrescent pest house!

If there must be medical legislation, should not such a slaughter-house practice be prohibited? Should not this torture, this murder under the guise of professional science, be called by its true name, and correspondingly punished? HUDSON TUTTLE.

He deserves small trust who is not privy counselor to himself.—Ford.

THE GREATEST DEBATE WITHIN A HALF CENTURY UPON MODERN SPIRITUALISM

DISPUTANTS:

REV. MOSES HULL,

President New York State Spiritualists' Association, Headquarters, Buffalo, N. Y.

—AND—

W. F. JAMIESON,

Secretary National Liberal League, Headquarters, Cincinnati, Ohio.

PROPOSITION:

Resolved, That the phenomena and philosophy of Modern Spiritualism prove that departed spirits can communicate with mankind.

MR. HULL'S SECOND SPEECH.

Gentlemen Moderators, Ladies and Gentlemen:—There is nothing in the really eloquent speech of my opponent demanding such immediate attention but that it can wait until I naturally come to it. I will say to Mr. Jamieson, as the man in the parable said to his creditor, "Have patience with me, and I will pay thee all."

In my opening speech I gave you two out of many personal experiences on which for my respondent to apply his inductive methods of reasoning. Whether his reasoning is legitimate and good will appear after I shall have carried the argument begun in my former speech to its legitimate conclusion. I will now give you a few cases which antedate the work of even the Fox girls.

Dr. Kerner relates the fact of Madame Hauffe going to Weinsberg, a place in the mountains where she had never been before; nor had she ever seen or heard of any person there except Dr. Kerner. She had not been there more than one hour, when a spirit came to her and told her that he had been a wine merchant, and, I believe, gave his name. He said that his wife was about being wronged out of one thousand florins. He wanted her, the madame, to tell the bailiff where the papers were that would clear the matter up. She finally wrote the woman about the matter; they searched in vain for the papers. She described the paper, told where it was, and what was in it. They searched again and found the paper, and saved the thousand florins for the widow.

William Howitt relates this matter at length in Vol. 1, pp. 72, 73 and 74 of his History of the Supernatural. A quotation of a few linees from page 73 is all I have time to use.

"The high bailiff Heyd, drew up a statement and signed it, saying, that the man whose spirit had appeared, had conducted the business of wine merchant F——, and on his death there was a deficiency of one thousand florins, and the private book of the manager was missing. That proceedings had been taken against his widow on that account, when the whole was cleared up by the discovery of this paper through the appearance of the spirit through Mrs. Hauffe. Mr. F——, the wine merchant, also gave a written attestation of the truth of these relations, saying that he previously had no belief in apparitions, nor in somnambules, but that his eyes and ears in this case had convinced him that there was no deception. That the affair, which had happened six years before, had ceased to be talked of; that he had not mentioned the subject of the paper to any one but the magistrate, and when it was now spoken of to him, he had difficulty in recalling the particular case."

What explanation is there of this case, except on the spiritual hypothesis? The matter of the wine merchant had been forgotten; he had been dead six years. More than that, Madame Hauffe had never heard of him. There was no possibility of the facts being in her sub-consciousness. Everything proved true, and was attested by the bailiff.

How strange also, that this sub-consciousness, this od force, electricity or devil, should always claim to be some one who has lived before. In this case it professed to be one of whom the Madame had never heard, and one forgotten by others. The whole circumstance had even passed out of the mind of the bailiff. What is the reasonable conclusion, if not the one arrived at in Job xxxii:7, "There is a spirit in man, and the inspiration of the Almighty giveth them understanding"?

The following case is familiar to Mr. Jamieson. As Mr. Howitt's statement of facts has never, so far as I know, been questioned, I quote the matter as presented by him, Vol. 1, pp. 104, 105. You will find it also in White's Life of Baron Swedenborg, and in Robert Dale Owen's "Footfalls on the Boundary of Another World."

"Madame Harteville, the widow of the Dutch envoy in Stockholm, sometime after the death of her husband, received a demand from a goldsmith, Croon, for the payment for a silver service which her husband had ordered from him. The widow was confidently persuaded that her husband had been much too orderly to allow this debt to remain unpaid; but she could discover no receipt. In this trouble, and since the amount was considerable, she begged Baron Swedenborg to give her a call. After some apologies she ventured to say to him, that if he had the extraordinary gift, as all men affirmed, of conversing with departed souls, she hoped that he would have the goodness to inquire of her husband how it stood with the demand for the silver service. Swedenborg made no difficulty in meeting her wishes. Three days after this, the lady had a company of friends taking coffee with her; Baron Swedenborg entered, and in his matter of fact way informed her that he had spoken with her husband. That the debt had been discharged some months before his death, and that the receipt was in a certain cabinet which she could find in an upper room. The lady replied that this cabinet had been completely emptied, and amongst the whole of the papers this receipt could not be found. Swedenborg said that her husband had described to him, that if they drew forth a drawer on the left side, they would see a board, which, being pushed aside, they would find a concealed drawer, in which he kept his secret correspondence with Holland, and there this receipt would be found. On this representation, the lady betook herself, with all the company, to the upper room. The cabinet was opened, they found the secret drawer described, of which she had hitherto known nothing, and in it the required paper, to the great amazement of all present."

One such fact as this ought to forever settle the question as to whether the spirit of this man Harteville had returned and communicated. Can any fact be more plainly proven? Will my opponent please be kind enough to inform this audience what would prove the existence and return of spirits, if this does not? If he will give us a specimen of the kind of proof needed I will try to supply him with it.

A thousand failures, or a thousand frauds, or a thousand things explainable on any other hypothesis will not explain this case away.

It is well known that in the year 1766 Baron Swedenborg, when in the city of Gottenberg, 300 miles from Stockholm, his home, described the process and work of a fire which was at that time raging in his own city. He told the very moment and place where the fire was put out.

Now, if materialism is true, if man can only see with his material eyes, then he cannot see beyond their range. No explanation of this occult phenomenon, or of these occult phenomena, can by any possibility be made, which will not carry the matter beyond the possibility of being explained on the materialistic hypothesis.

Unless Mr. Jamieson should think me inclined to neglect his effort, I will now make a few "feeble remarks" in reply to his speech.

I endorse all he says about debates in general; it seemed a little tedious to hear it over and over, as if he was the only man in the world who believed in the freedom of speech, or who had the courage of his convictions.

Mr. Jamieson occupies a peculiar position; he has nothing to sustain. His business is to attack. He finds much fault with Spiritualists in general because they manifest a reluctance about stopping their work and coming down to amuse him. His position is on a par with that of the incendiary, who finds fault with all the builders in the world because they will not stop their work of building to watch his dexterity in pulling down. It seems a little like adding insult to injury for the incendiary to demand that builders of homes for the poor should take a recess in their work to behold his expertness in building fires under what they have builded. It took wisdom and skilled labor many years of hard toil to build Chicago, but the kick of a poor old crumple-horned cow could in three hours destroy all these years of labor. One incendiary can tear up more railroad track than a hundred skilled workmen can build. The Bible is right when it says, "one sinner destroyeth much good."

Perhaps if Mrs. Murphy's cow could speak or write, Chicago would have heard orations, and its papers would have been filled with "challenges" to all Chicago builders to give her an opportunity for a few more kicks. And when they failed to gratify her, they would have been favored with speeches on all Chicago, "actually standing back and cowering and trembling at what one little cow "not five feet tall" has to say about their building cities that she can't burn down.

All this time, Mr. Jamieson informs us that Spiritualists are challenging the clergy to meet them in discussion. Now, supposing this to be true, which it is not, does that prove that Spiritualists are moral cowards as he intimates? By no means. The clergy have a following; Mr. Jamieson may be as able a debater as the average clergyman, but he is building nothing for himself nor is he harming others because the people do not pay any attention to what he says. They do not even listen to him.

As a general thing, there have not been so many people to listen to our debates in the past, as came to hear me when I had no opponent. Why should I cut my audience down for the sake of a debate? In Buffalo I speak to from two hundred to four hundred persons every Sunday night. I tried to get twenty of them to say they wanted a discussion; the one voice was, "Yes, if you can get Rev. Mr. Stauffer, Rev. Mr. Helms, or any other leading minister to debate, we will do all we can to make it a success. But we have no interest in a debate with a man who has nothing to build."

It is true that last fall I went over three thousand miles to debate with Rev. Mr. Baer, when I would hardly have gone one hundred to meet Mr. Jamieson. Not because Mr. Jamieson is unworthy—not because he is not in every sense of the word quite as able a man as Mr. Baer, but because Mr. B. has a large following, and Mr. Jamieson has none. Mr. Baer preaches in the largest church and to the largest audience in the city where he lives. His people believe in him, and thus both he and I were furnished with an audience which neither of us could get were we delivering lectures. It does not pay to stop to debate with every individual who is traversing the country in search of a reputation. I do not want Mr. Jamieson to take this last sentence as applying to him. He has a reputation—perhaps too much of a reputation; that may be the reason why he happens to be out of a job. The world knows of his iconoclastic work in the past.

Once more, I must say, Mr. Jamieson is mistaken about Spiritualist lecturers going about the country and challenging the clergy for debate. There are not more than three or four among all our lecturers who ever debate or could be induced to do so. Please, Brother Jamieson, do not accuse our lecturers of something of which they are profoundly innocent.

Now, Mr. Jamieson, "suffer the word of exhortation," do not spend any more of our precious time in complaints about our not being willing to "face the music." Bring on your music. Prove yourself worthy by building up something worthy of defense; build some church, cult or guild—get a following somewhere in this big world, then it will be in order for you to issue your challenges. Until you do that you have not proved yourself worthy the attention of the world. With the exception of my brother, D. W. Hull, and myself, you will generally be answered by everybody in the language of Nehemiah, "We are doing a great work and cannot come down."

Friend Jamieson's little joke about not seeing my soul I will allow for the present to pass. There are many things he has not seen. The poor man has lost his own soul; until he finds that it will be useless for him to go in search for mine.

He next treats us to a homily on what he calls "dubious conditions." Some of this may be true. The communications and manifestations may not always be on tap for him; nor may they be as exact nor as full as might be wished. Frauds may reap a rich harvest in this field, as they do in others. Counterfeiters may, here as elsewhere, find those who will take their "green goods." Everything good I believe is counterfeited. I rejoice to know that there are no counterfeits on Brother Jamieson's kind of Materialism. I have heard it said that copper coin is too cheap to counterfeit.

Notwithstanding the frauds and counterfeits playing in the name of Spiritualism, all who really have a right to know acknowledge that, at least there is in the so-called phenomena, a residuum of fact which can be accounted for on no other known hypothesis than that they come from departed human spirits. In the Spiritual field we may sometimes as in other fields have to sift a great deal of chaff in order to get a little wheat; yet the wheat is there, and millions have found it. This is confessed by the best men—the most competent witnesses in every department of the thinking world—men who, to say the least, are as capable of observing and examining as my respected opponent. Let me present one case in addition to what has already been presented.

I need not tell my opponent who Dr. W. F. Barrett is. I will say to those who do not know, that he is professor of experimental physics in the Royal Academy, in Dublin. This great savant says:

"It is well known to those who have made the phenomena of Spiritualism the subject of prolonged and careful inquiry in the spirit of exact and unimpassioned research, that, beneath a repellant mass of imposture and delusion there remain certain indubitable and startling facts which science can neither explain nor deny."

Here, this wise professor takes the only sensible and tenable ground. This great man acknowledges the imposture and deception in the name of Spiritualism. "Yet," said he, "there are indubitable and startling facts which science can neither explain nor deny." If Spiritualism claimed that there never had been any frauds practiced in its name, then Mr. Jamieson's arguments would be to the point, but under the circumstances they are as foreign to the point in debate as a dissertation would be on "skinning eels and shoeing horses."

Nor do we claim that communications are as minute and perfect as communications generally are in this world. We should all remember that we are at the bottom of an ocean of atmosphere; and that though we may not always be able to speak to our friends on the top side of life, face to face as we might wish, yet, when conditions are favorable, by the use of a code of signals we may be able to receive enough from them so that we can know that death has not stricken them out of existence. It is true that while the world was growing from worse than Jamiesonian ignorance of the causes of certain phenomena upward toward Spiritualism, it witnessed many strange phenomena, which before its power to reason inductively had developed it characterized as gnomes, fairies, witches, devils and satyrs. I am far from denying that the phenomena occurred; I only think the hypotheses of those who witnessed them were reached, as are those of my friend, without taking in all the facts.

It is not safe to reject the fact that the world has witnessed strange phenomena because it has not been able to give the true philosophy of the causes which produced them.

Marine deposits have been found by travelers on the tops of very high mountains. Such bishops as Horne and Watson, and such commentators as Clarke and Henry have said these marine shells afford abundant proof of the Noachian deluge. That hypothesis is now universally rejected, but that rejection does not deny the fact that these fossils were found as claimed.

I gave you the testimony of Dr. Johnson. Of that testimony, Mr. Jamieson, true to his idiosyncrasies, makes light; but facts seldom "down" even before the fun of one who finds it more easy to create a laugh than to get down to downright argument.

Mr Jamieson wants facts; when they are presented, he meets them with odium scientificum, or rather odium materialisticum, which he pours all over such great men as Dr. Samuel Johnson, a man who stood head and shoulders above any or all of his traducers. He claims that he wants a "this year's fact." Very well; this year is young yet, but it is not altogether barren of facts. Only last Saturday night, in the city of Buffalo, the impression came to me that Mr. Jamieson would demand facts of today, as though they were better than those a year old, so at our celebration of the fifty-third anniversary of the Hydesville manifestations I invited one of our modest little home mediums to occupy the rostrum for a few moments. It was Mrs. C. Lewis Chase. She occupied in all less than fifteen minutes. In that time she gave no less than eight out-and-out, clear-cut, square-toed tests. I made notes of a few of them; here they are. She said to a lady—a stranger, "Lady, Cornelia comes to you, and brings Martin and the babe. She says it looks dark for your father. He has brain trouble. Cornelia asks me to tell you that you can keep your father with you for some time yet by careful attention. Keep him as quiet as possible. Even where he is surely in the wrong do not cross him; you can control him if you do not let him know it. You must urge Walter to be more independent. He lacks the stamina one who fills his position needs." The lady recognized every part of the test.

She then called a lady to her—one whom I knew well, and gave her tests concerning her children. These tests I knew to be true.

Another spirit came and said, "I want Helen. She sits near the rear of the Temple on the right hand side of the aisle; the sixth row from the rear. My name is Susan." A lady arose and said, "I am Helen, and I know who Susan is; she was a dear friend of mine, but not a relative." "No," said the spirit, "but I want to send a message to James; he is rather too independent." "Yes," said the lady, "James is Susan's brother. He occupies a position where he has to deal with a great many unreasonable people; sometimes he does not have the patience with them he should."

The medium then said, "Here is a man whose name is Wright, and he says he was right. He wants to speak to his son, James Wright. He says, 'Jimmie, do right, and you will come out all right.' He says, 'You don't live here. You belong in the east—in Vermont. All your possessions are there.'" The man acknowledged this was all true. He said he thoroughly understood what the play upon the word Wright meant. He had never seen nor heard of the medium before. I select these as the first three out of about a dozen communications, all given in less than fifteen minutes. We had two other of our home mediums there—Mrs. Coats and Mrs. Atcheson. Each of them gave tests as definite as those described. I took notes of what they gave, to use, if need be in this discussion, but by mistake I left the notes at home.

Such things seldom, if ever occurred before the days of Modern Spiritualism. Now I ask, is it as reasonable to suppose that a trick, sub-consciousness, electricity, or some other outlandish thing should come in thousands of instances, and give the names of your friends, and tell so often just what your friends might be expected to tell, as that it should be just what it professes to be? Did these intelligences ever in the world come and claim to be sub-consciousness? Did this influence ever call itself electricity? Is there anything in the universe except stony-headed and stony-hearted Materialism that could imagine such a thing? Surely, the one who is determined not to admit the true explanation, but grasps at subterfuges, as drowning people do at straws, is in a thorny path.

"Martin Luther," says Brother Jamieson, "honestly believed in a personal Satan, hock, hoof, horns and all. How easily Mr. Hull by such argument could establish the existence of his Satanic Majesty."

Now is not that profound! Such passages as this contain the proof that Brother Jamieson is not yet entitled to occupy a chair in Logic in any of our great universities.

Luther had come out against many of the dogmas of the Romish church. Millions of monks had passed from that church to the other side of life. Millions of them had not yet out-grown their old theology. Now, what would be more natural or likely to happen, if spirits can return, as I have already proved, than for these old Catholics to come back? They would perhaps, have been fighting Luther had they remained in the form.

Luther believed in two almost Almighty powers—one of them helping him in his warfare upon Catholicism; the other using all its force against him. Now what would be more natural, than for him, when he saw certain phenomena, which were working against him, to accuse the devil of being their author? What more natural, when he saw one of those departed monks than to think he had actually caught sight of his Satanic Majesty? and, when he hurled the bottle of ink at him, what is there more natural than to think he was assailing his adversary, the devil, with the only weapon he had at hand?

Luther's experience can be brought forward as proof that he witnessed certain phenomena; they may have been materializations. His limited knowledge in spiritual matters led him to think he had actually been in company with the devil.

We, observing the matter from the high altitude of Spiritualism interpret all these things as proofs that the so-called dead are not dead. Both the good and the bad—the wise and the ignorant can return. Something came to Luther; that is one of the proofs to us that Dr. Johnson was correct. The dead can return and are seen.

THE .. DIVINE PLAN .. EIGHT REMARKABLE BOOKS.

Every Subscriber to the Progressive Thinker Reaps the Benefit of the Divine Plan.

"A Wanderer in the Spirit Lands," a most remarkable book, will be our leading feature until June 1, 1902, and will be the only one of the eight Divine Plan books sent out for 25 cents.

If you order only one book, and that one not the "Wanderer in the Spirit Lands," the price is 50 cents. If you order two books, and neither of them the "Wanderer in the Spirit Lands," the price of each one is 45 cents.

Any three of the eight Books you may order, Price $1.10.

Any four of the eight Books you may order, Price $1.50.

Any five of the eight Books you may order, Price $1.80.

Any six of the eight Books you may order, Price $2.10.

Any seven of the eight Books you may order, Price $2.35.

Lastly all of the eight Valuable Books here announced are sent out, all postage prepaid, for $2.50—a price never offered before by any other publisher.

Read This Carefully Before Remitting.

When you send in your subscription to The Progressive Thinker, carefully look over the books which you desire in this list, and their price, and send for them. They are very valuable. They are intensely interesting. They are elevating in tone and will do you good. In remitting do not fail to enclose a dollar for The Progressive Thinker.

These eight books, substantially and elegantly bound, and printed in the neatest style of the printer's art, will be furnished to our subscribers for $2.50, a price which modern machinery and enterprise has rendered possible. Sending out these books, however, at the prices we do, does not reduce the price of the subscription of the paper, apparently or otherwise, a single cent, for that cannot be afforded for less than one dollar per year, inview of the fact that we publish such a vast amount of reading matter.

REMARKABLE OFFER.

EIGHT REMARKABLE BOOKS FOR $2.50.

Total price to our subscribers, $2.50.

The Progressive Thinker one year and the eight Divine Plan books, $3.50.

In order to assist in forming a Spiritual and Occult Library in every Spiritualist's home, these eight valuable books, substantially and elegantly bound in cloth, are furnished to our subscribers for $2.50. We are able to do this, from the fact that the authors make no charge for the vast amount of labor bestowed on these works, and which extended over many years. That is why you are getting these intensely interesting books for the price you do. We are only carrying out the Divine Plan, inaugurated only by The Progressive Thinker. There are thousands of our subscribers who have no Spiritualist or Occult library, and this inducement is offered in order that they may commence forming one at once, and thus keep in line with the advancing procession. The postage on the above books and expense of mailing is about 95 cents, hence you are receiving them at an exceedingly low price—simply the result of modern enterprise combined with a desire to do good.

"After Her Death. The Story of a Summer." By Lillan Whiting. No mind that loves spiritual thought can fail to be fed and delighted with this book. Beautiful spiritual thought, combining advanced ideas on the finer and ethereal phases of Spiritualism, leading the mind onward into the purer atmosphere of exalted spiritual truth. A book for the higher life. For sale at this office. Price, cloth $1.

"Right Living." By Susan H. Wixon. The author shows a wise practicality in her method of teaching the principle of ethics. She illustrates her subject with many brief narratives and anecdotes, which render the book more interesting and more easily comprehended. It is especially adapted for use in Children's Lyceum. In the hands of mothers and teachers it may be made very useful. Young and old will be benefited by it. Cloth $1 For sale at this office.

"Poems of Progress." By Lizzie Doten. In this volume, this peerless poet of Spiritualism may be read in her varied moods, "from grave to gay, from lively to severe." It is a book to be treasured and richly enjoyed by all who love genuine poetry, and especially by Spiritualists. The volume is tastily printed and bound. Price $1.

"The World Beautiful." By Lilian Whiting. Most excellent in their high and elevating spirituality of thought. Series 1, 2, and 3, each complete in itself. Price, cloth, $1 per volume. For sale at this office.

"Mind and Body: Suggestions and Hypnotism Applied in Medicine and Education." By A. O. Halphide. President Chicago Society of Anthropology. For sale at this office. Price $1.

"A Few Words About the Devil, and Other Essays." By Charles Bradlaugh. Paper, 50 cents. For sale at this office.

"The Bridge Between Two Worlds." By Abby A. Judson. This book is dedicated to all earnest souls who desire, by harmonizing their physical and their psychical bodies with universal nature and their souls with the higher intelligences, to come into closer connection with the purer realms of the spirit world. It is written in the sweet spiritual tone that characterizes all of Miss Judson's literary works. Price, cloth $1; paper, 75 cents. For sale at this office.

IMPORTANT MATTER FROM OUR FOREIGN EXCHANGES

LIGHT, LONDON, ENGLAND.

ETHER AND MATTER.

In a Note in Light of October 12, commenting upon the significant utterances of Lord Kelvin, with regard to the change in the opinions of scientific men that had taken place within the last fifty years, a doubt is expressed whether we ought to call the hypothetical ether "matter;" and the remark is made: "It does not behave like it. It, in fact, behaves a good deal more like a 'disembodied spirit.'"

With all deference I confess I am puzzled how a "disembodied spirit" behaves, nor have I ever come across anyone who could tell. In fact, I challenge anyone to say that he or she has ever seen, heard, or even thought of a disembodied spirit.

Please do not think that I am quibbling with words or attempting to deny that "spirits" exist on other planes than the physical, for I have seen, heard and touched them; but "disembodied spirits" never!

Of course, I know that by the term "disembodied spirit" the writer meant a spirit freed from the physical body, but I believe that the great need of to-day is to eschew all such vague terms and to adopt a precise and well-defined terminology. With this object, therefore, I ask all readers of Light to ponder over the following propositions, which I do not claim as my own at all, but merely as what should be regarded as fundamental axioms, for they have been almost universally adopted by the great occult and spiritual schools of thought:

1. Spirit is different from matter.

2. Spirit can only be manifested through matter. "No one has seen the Father," said Jesus Christ.

3. The term "matter" refers to the underlying "substance," "stuff," or "thing," the various motions of which constitute Nature, or the manifested universe.

4. Every thing or being that is manifested to the senses, and even to the finest clairvoyant sight, must be formed out of "matter," however fine. To speak of a "disembodied spirit" is tantamount to speaking of "The Absolute," which, we have it on the highest authority, no one has ever seen.

5. What is meant by a "disembodied spirit," of course, is a being clothed in a form too fine for the physical sight to see. The so-called "spirit" has always a material form or body, but not a physical form or body.

6. There is nothing at all inherently impossible in the idea of an individual dwelling in this fine body condensing more matter round his form and thus temporarily bringing it to the level of the physical plane. Materialization is constantly going on in nature. Water is nothing but a process of materialization.

7. Electricity, magnetism, nerve-force, chemical action are modes of motion of "matter," the hypothetical ether, which every day becomes less of an hypothesis, and more of a necessary postulate in science.

8. The terms "a spirit," "a disembodied spirit," etc., serve no purpose whatever, but that of confusing the mind, for they are based upon misconception; whereas by mapping out, or dividing, "matter" into varying planes or degrees of fineness and grossness, on which an individual spirit acts, the hopeless confusion which seems to exist in so-called "spiritualistic" and "materialistic" circles will be avoided, and the way paved for a more or less complete understanding of important questions with which human evolution is intimately connected.

FRAU ROTHE'S DIRECT WRITING.

In the October number of "Spiritistische Rundschau" there is—as usual—apaper by Professor Sellin dealing with the Rothe case. It is headed, "Einwandfrei"—free from reproach, or, as we should usually say, "above suspicion." The only portion of it requiring notice occurs near the end, and contains an account of an unpremeditated manifestation of direct writing, which, according to Professor Sellin, belongs to the category of those phenomena which he calls "einwandfrei." Whether this instance is quite happily selected, readers can judge for themselves. Here is a translation of the Professor's narrative:

"I now come to another phase of the Rothe mediumship, that of direct writing. For this, happily, the torture involved in undressing and dressing again is not required; all that is wanted is open eyes. A wonderful criticaster of one of my short accounts of the first writing I obtained in Chemnitz, published in "Psychische Studien," tries to make out that suspicion even there was not absent. I think the gentleman was named Kalbel, and I can only say, in reference to the above, that he must for the time being have forgotten how to read, when my narrative was before his eyes.

"At Zurich the occurrence was somewhat different. It took place at a vegetarian restaurant, at which we had just paid our bill. Frau Rothe had risen to make preparations for leaving, when at that moment the fixed expression of her features showed that she had entered the trance condition. A sheet of paper appeared in her hands; from where she produced it, I cannot say; I only know that I took it from her and found it blank, and that Herr Jentsch told me, in answer to my inquiry, that it was one of the sheets he used at the hotel. Frau Rothe then pushed the same sheet under the tablecloth and laid her hands upon it, the fingers of the right hand moving almost as if she were writing. When this ceased, Frau Rothe passed me the sheet, which was covered on the first and last pages with the well-known handwriting of the supposed Paul Flemming, while the two middle pages were blank. The writing was as follows:

Here follows a poem of twenty-two lines, commencing thus. Of course the translation does not give the rhymes:

"In life I am thy companion,
And share with thee both toil and rest,
While still a childish mind and years,
Thou stoodest at thy mother's grave, etc."

Written Thursday, 18, 8, midday, half past one in Zurich."

Professor Sellin adds:

"I think the whole proceeding, like a dozen other similar cases of direct writing, may be considered by all persons possessed of sound judgment as 'einwandfrei.'"

"The Gospel of Buddha, According to Old Records." Told by Paul Carus. This book is heartily commended to students of the science of religions, and to all who would gain a fair conception of Buddhism in its spirit and living principles. Spiritualist or Christian can scarcely read it without spiritual profit. Price $1. For sale at this office.

INCONSISTENCY.

Palliative Reflections Concerning Czolgosz' Crime.

Even a Spiritualist of forty years' standing will get disgusted at the shallow brains of mankind sometimes. The other morning I entered a car to ride down town about 7:30, and was greeted by the conductor with, "Well, Mr. H., I suppose the miserable fool who shot President McKinley is being put out of the way about this time; don't you think it is all right?"

"No, sir; I think it about as poor a use as a man can be put to."

"Are you an anarchist?" he asked.

"No, sir, but I have some common sense left, and have made a practice of studying such cases about three hours a day, to see if there was not something hidden beneath the surface, that we made no note of, urging men to commit such deeds."

"But you forget God's command," spoke up a woman at my side.

"What command?"

"Why, the Bible says, 'An eye for an eye, and a life for a life.'"

"Madam, does not your record speak of a sage called Jesus, who said, 'A new command give I unto you, That ye love one another'? Pray, who is your best and wisest authority, Moses or Jesus?" Silence in the car.

I am surprised and pained at the cruel and revengeful sentiments expressed, broadcast, all over our land by clergymen, teachers, statesmen, and mothers, even Spiritualists, concerning this poor dupe who has been hurried, to use the words of prison officials, "out of the way in a dignified manner." How came that soul in our locality? Who or what located him in a human form and allowed him to be used for such a purpose? Why are not all who come to our shores required to present a "certificate of character" from the ruler of the province where they resided in Europe, ere being received here? Who asked his mother if there were any prenatal conditions surrounding her child that would lead him to do such an act? Were the centuries of oppression on the part of tyrants a factor, like a slumbering volcano that burst forth when the right conditions were brought to bear? Are these not pertinent questions that we should study and seek to understand?

By removing the body of this misled man we have not crushed nor removed anarchy. The multitude do not seem to consider that we had his personality within our grasp while in prison, but that now his spirit is set free to inflict untold injury upon mankind. Question the multitude and they will admit that each body has a soul to guide it, but there they seem to drive a stake for the limit, and have no thought beyond that point.

Would I condone these murderous acts? Certainly not; but I would confine the dangerous individuals and ere sending their souls to spirit life, where no one wants them, would seek by every means that patience or wealth could command, to educate and uplift these legacies of a tyrannical government; for we shall have them upon this earth while kings and emperors are allowed to have unlimited sway over their fellow-men.

I am a strong advocate of peace, for when I gazed upon the pale faces of my comrades in '61 and later, the spirit of war departed forever, and I can see no grander field where the human soul can work than in the education and uplifting of humanity.

FRED L. HILDRETH.

Worcester, Mass.

WOMAN'S TRANCE PHENOMENA PUZZLE SCIENTISTS.

Recent declarations of Mrs. Leonora E. Piper, the trance medium, of her disbelief in the spirit authorship of the messages she has given to the world through the Society for Psychical Research has renewed a controversy that had its origin years ago, when she first attracted the attention of scientists. There is one thing, however, on which they all seemed to be agreed, and that is that she is honest in all that she does, she having successfully submitted herself to every condition they imposed to discover trickery or deceit. Volumes have been published about her in the proceedings of the society of which she is called to be a member and for which she is under contract to sit exclusively for a fee, it is said, of $20 a sitting.

The investigation of her case, which has been carried on continuously and persistently since Professor William James of Harvard university, fourteen years ago, began seriously to study the influences that possessed her, has been thorough and judicial, and there has been no attempt to prejudice the public or to advocate any pet theory. In fact, there have been attempts made to discredit her by members of the society who did not find the tests they made satisfactory.

It has been found and so reported, for instance, that the intellectual attainments of "Phinuit," Mrs. Piper's control, were notoriously limited to her knowledge. Although he professes to be a French physician who died about 1860, he has shown a lamentable ignorance of his native tongue. Concerning his inability to speak French, "Phinuit's" original explanation to Dr. Richard Hodgson, secretary for America of the society, was that he had lived in Metz the latter part of his life; there were many English there, so that he was compelled to speak English and had forgotten his French.

SPIRIT USES MUCH SLANG.

Dr. Hodgson replied that this explanation was very surprising, and a much more plausible one would be that he was obliged to use the brain of the medium, and would therefore manifest no more familiarity with French than she possessed. This suggestion appeared to "Phinuit" also more plausible, since a few days later he offered it himself to another sitter as an explanation of his inability to sustain a conversation in French. No attempt has apparently been made to have "Phinuit" explain where he acquired his extensive vocabulary of distinctly American oaths and slang of the New England variety which he uses freely and with great familiarity. Of course, this is quite alien from the manners of Mrs. Piper. He has been questioned about his life on this earth, but not one of his statements admits of verification.

Notwithstanding his claims to high rank as a physician, "Phinuit's" medical knowledge does not extend beyond what Mrs. Piper may have read in "Domestic Medicine." He always gives the common or vulgar names of the medicines he describes and never their botanical ones. Similar limitations have been shown in his references to history, literature and science. "Imperator," Mrs. Piper's latest and present control, has also shown a shocking ignorance of some of the most commonplace things. He tells the scientific men who are seekers after biological knowledge that the "interior," the "spirit," comes in "in the bird and the monkey," not in the horse or the dog; for "the brain of each is of a lower quality and has practically no mind." All birds and monkeys, he says, have "interiors," but no other animal has except man. He is equally shaky when he discusses chemistry and physics, as when he says that "the ethereal or spiritual body is composed of air, light and a large amount of hydrogen."

MEDIUM FILLED WITH ETHER.

And again, "The body of the medium becomes filled with luminiferous ether until it is so distended that it cannot contain any more." Then there is an "ether body" which "is a subtle and exquisite matter known to us as vacium, not on the same plane as hydrogen." To relieve the confusion into which the minds of the scientists who were seeking light were thrown, "Imperator" explains that "vacium is known as love." "Rector," another control, but on an equally high plane of intelligence, is authority for the statement that "the spiritual ether is not composed of oxygen and hydrogen. It is composed of the finer tissues termed luminiferous ether."

"Mentor," a third control, plunges recklessly into historical and literary matters and flounders around in this style when professing to be Ulysses, speaking of Achilles: "He was the murderer who slew Hector. His intentions were not evil; it was an insane impulse." After having relieved Achilles of criminal intent Ulysses gave way to the spirit of George Eliot, who described a meeting she had with Lord Byron, who said oracularly: "You have questioned my reality. Question it no more. I am Shakspeare." That will probably account for there having been no communication received from the man who on earth posed as Shakspeare.

Dr. Hodgson gives many experiences he has had with Mrs. Piper to show that there is no continuity of memory between Mrs. Piper and her controls. "On one occasion," he says, "not long before a sitting Mrs. Piper was startled by a very near clap of thunder and 'Phinuit,' on being afterward questioned, appeared to have no knowledge of the circumstance and apparently tried to guess at what had occurred. Similarly on questioning 'Phinuit' at one of my early sittings concerning the life of Mrs. Piper, he professed ignorance on the subject, but said that he would 'find out things, about her. At another sitting he said that he had been enjoined by Mrs. Piper's relatives not to talk about her and her family (members of which at that time occasionally resorted to 'Phinuit' for information and advice). Soon afterward, however 'Phinuit' told me of incidents in connection with Mrs. Piper which I think that Mrs. Piper herself would never have mentioned to me, but it is uncertain whether he possessed this knowledge by virtue of Mrs. Piper's possessing it, or whether he acquired it by whatever supernormal means he uses with ordinary sitters or simply by conversations with Mrs. Piper's relatives."

TEST FOR MRS. PIPER.

Professor James has given the following account of a test to which he submitted Mrs. Piper more than ten years ago: "Mrs. Blodgett, of Holyoke, Mass., and her sister devised before the latter died what would have been a good test of actual spirit return. The sister, Miss H. W., wrote upon her deathbed a letter, sealed it and gave it to Mrs. B. After her death no one knew what words it contained. Mrs. B., not then knowing Mrs. Piper, intrusted to me the sealed letter and asked me to give to Mrs. Piper some article of the deceased sister's personal apparel to help her to get at its contents. This commission I performed. Mrs. P. gave correctly the full name—which even I did not know—of the writer, and finally, after a delay and ceremony which occupied several weeks on 'Phinuit's' part, dictated what purported to be a copy of the letter. This I compared with the original—of which Mrs. B. permitted me to read the seal—but the two letters had nothing in common nor were any of the numerous domestic facts alluded to in the medium's letter acknowledged by Mrs. Blodgett to be correct. Mrs. Piper was equally unsuccessful in two later attempts which she made to reproduce the contents of this document, although both times the revelation purported to come direct from its deceased writer."

PRECAUTIONS AGAINST DECEPTION.

The precautions taken by the scientific men investigating Mrs. Piper to prevent collusion and deception have been many and apparently conclusive. In England, especially, she was subjected to a surveillance that would seem to make it impossible for her to practice fraud, and there has thus far been no suggestion from any quarter that fraud has been proved.

The methods of imposture which suggested themselves to the inquirers as preliminary possibilities to be guarded against were inquiry by paid agents, inquiry by correspondence, catechism of servants or children, research in family bibles, study of photograph albums, use of directories and biographies, prowling about the house at night with skeleton keys and bribing servants to name the sister. Mrs. Piper arrived in Liverpool, England, on Nov. 19, 1889. She was twice in Cambridge, twice in London and twice in Liverpool, at dates arranged for her by the society under whose auspices she went abroad. When in London she stayed at lodgings selected by the society; when in Liverpool, in Professor Lodge's house, and when in Cambridge, at the house of Mr. Myers or Professor Sidgwick. No one of her hosts or their wives detected any suspicious act or word. Mr. Myers said: "We took great pains to avoid giving information in talk, and a more complete security is to be found in the fact that we were ourselves ignorant of many of the facts given as to our friends' relations, etc.

* * * On the whole, I believe that all observers, both in America and England, who have seen enough of Mrs. Piper in both states to be able to form a judgment will agree in affirming that many of the facts given could not have been learned by a skilled detective; that to learn of them, although possible, would have needed an expenditure of money as well as of time which it seems impossible to suppose that Mrs. Piper could have met, and that her conduct has never given any ground whatever for supposing her capable of fraud or trickery. Few persons have been so long and so carefully observed, and she has left on all observers the impression of thorough uprightness, candor and honesty."

On the other hand, there are equally high authorities who, while not denying Mrs. Piper's good faith, regard the whole thing as the cheapest kind of charlatanism. Professor Macalister thought the "whole performance an imposture and a poor one." Professor Pierce says: "'Phinuit' seemed to me to be constantly groping after indications from me to correct and direct his intelligence, and in some cases he seemed to be so directed. The sitting is a struggle for knowledge to which the sitter contributes. Professor Shaler calls "Phinuit" a "preposterous scoundrel." Professor Charles Eliot Norton thought Mrs. Piper's condition "analogous to those of an ill person dreaming a suggested dream, in which trains of dreams to which the dreamer has been accustomed are modified by the special conditions of the moment." Dr. Weir Mitchell, a thoroughly qualified observer as a physician and a man of the world, says that had he not heard Professor James' statements he would have come to the conclusion "that the whole thing was a fraud and a very stupid one."

MRS. PIPER AS A MEDIUM.

The problem of psychic research is so intimately connected with the name of Mrs. Piper that a word regarding the phenomena of her mediumship may contribute to the elucidation of the phenomena produced through her organism. She becomes entranced; a little table is drawn up to her left side, with cushions on it on which her head is supported. In this perfectly unconscious state her right hand is stretched out where a table with writing pad and pencils are placed, and her own hand writes the messages. The theory is that her hand is used as the instrument by the unseen person present, and this theory is one supported by so authoritative an array of testimony that no attempt to repudiate it will be made here. The records of the Society for Psychical Research offer such overwhelming evidence from representative names all over the world that he who runs may read. Those who have experimented with Mrs. Piper's mediumship are not seekers—nor finders—of any psychical phenomena. Her organism is apparently a species of telephonic transmitter and the communication resolves itself into a conversation of mingled speaking and writing—oral on the part of the sitter; written through the hand of Mrs. Piper on the part of those in the unseen.—Chicago Chronicle.

WALK DAY AND NIGHT.

Strange Happenings Near Glenside, Pa.

Strange, indeed, are the happenings in a house not quite two miles from Glenside Station. The house of Charles S. Stout, so the tale goes, has been visited by an evil spirit, and as a result the family is much wrought up over the affair.

On Thursday of last week a brand new umbrella was found on the lawn near the house. There was nothing strange about that, but it had hardly been taken inside the building, when, according to the family, several mysterious things happened. A picture which had been hanging on the bathroom door was found suspended on the wall in the room of Stout's twelve-year-old daughter, Florence. When Florence was alone in the kitchen there was a sound as if some one was rapping upon the window. This would cease as soon as another person came into the room. The members of the family say that they noticed these things, but paid no attention to them at first.

This was not the end of the affair, however. The picture, which shows three angels watching over an infant, has continued to act in a manner never before heard of. After its first journey it was put back in its old place. But it would not stay where it was hung. A day or so ago Mrs. Stout went into her room, and, she says, to her astonishment saw the picture hanging upon the knob of the bedstead. The next time it was fastened to the wall with tacks, but this did not hold it.

On still another occasion it was found hanging upon the knob of the door leading to the cellar, having come from the third floor, where it was supposed to have been hidden from view. It was then put into a bureau drawer and clothing placed over it. Mr. and Mrs. Stout say that they were compelled to take it out owing to the loud rapping upon the windows. Mr. and Mrs. Stout said nothing about the affair at first, but they say that its constant repetition caused them to tell several of their friends in the neighborhood. Soon the news was on every tongue. Women left their homes and called on the Stout neighbors and discussed the question with them. In business places the mystery was the chief topic of conversation. On the play grounds at the schools the children gathered in groups and whispered awesome tales about "spooks at Stout's."

The teachers heard of it, and yesterday three of them called upon Mrs. Stout. She told them that everything was just as rumored; that something was wrong, and that there had been strange "goings on" at her home. A clergyman called, and, it is related, he, too, heard the window rattle. All day yesterday people in the neighborhood who were skeptical called at Stout's to ask "Is it so that there are spirits here?" They were told that there had been peculiar happenings.

Stout came to the city yesterday, and consulted a Spiritualist, who told him that his daughter was possessed of an evil spirit. The evil spirits had been brought upon them by an enemy. According to Stout the medium stated correctly the first names of those who had caused the trouble, and also told him that they lived in the neighborhood; that the knocking upon the windows was a good sign; the moving of the picture a bad sign, and that of late the picture had ceased to move.

The child Florence was playing on the front porch a day or so ago when the front door, which Stout was positive had been securely bolted, flew open. This was repeated at another time. Since the opening of the door the picture has not changed its position, says Stout, but the knocking on the window continues at brief intervals whenever the child is alone in the kitchen.

The Stouts live in a large, modern stone house, which is back from the Church road and is surrounded by green lawns. Mr. and Mrs. Stout both state that up to this time they had never believed in witchcraft, Spiritualism, or anything of the kind, but that "seeing and hearing is believing." Some of the neighbors who would not credit the story said that the rattling on the window was caused by the wind and that somebody had moved the picture. Stout thereupon offered $50 to any one who would find the person who had moved the picture. The house has been searched from cellar to garret. Every nook and corner has been entered. Stout has watched the picture for an hour at a time, but has never succeeded in seeing it move. The others of the family have been unable to sleep at night because of their excitement over the matter. The child is not left alone at any time.

All the members of the family and many neighbors are firm in their belief that the strange things have really happened and that they are due to spirits. The first thing that a person hears on entering the neighborhood is an account of the affair. Many theories are advanced regarding the cause, but all fail to solve the mystery.—Evening Bulletin, Philadelphia, Pa.

Ghost Jars Trainmen.

Trainmen on the Colorado & Southern railroad are much excited over a strange apparition which they have encountered the past week in a dark and lonely cut half a mile south of King, a small station ten miles south of Littleton. Whatever it may be, human or supernatural, they do not know; but it has been seen by so many of the trainmen who are perfectly reliable, that there is not the slightest doubt that some uncanny object stalks along the right-of-way of the Colorado & Southern railroad. When a train approaches the cut every trainman gets under cover and with bated breath and beating heart peers out to see the awful "being."

Engineer Roesch who pulled No. 3 from Pueblo to Denver, Monday evening, October 28, saw the strange thing, and for several days he has been unable to think of anything else. The train left Pueblo on time, at 5 o'clock p. m., and had an uneventful run until the deep cut south of King was reached. While peering in the gloom ahead of the engine, Mr. Roesch was horrified to see a white apparition, tall and gaunt, suddenly rear its head on the side of the track, and move to one side with a ghostly stride. With the perspiration standing in beads on his forehead, he called the attention of the fireman to the object, and asked him if he could see anything. The fireman had seen it, and said that it must have been some one killed and that swiftness of the train had probably blown it from the roadbed.

When the train reached Littleton, an extra freight was found sidetracked when he stopped, it did likewise. The engineer was informed of what had been seen, and instructions were given the freight crew to watch for the object. When the cut was reached, sure enough the apparition was there, more awful than ever in the deepening gloom. Both the engineer and fireman refused to leave the cab, but the rear brakeman started to investigate.

When he moved toward the ghostly object, it moved away from him; and who he stopped, it did likewise. The brakeman stood this for a while, but his nerve soon deserted him, and he had to give it up. The conductor, who was coming around the end of his train, suddenly encountered the awful shape, and uttering a screech, he made for his caboose, and jumping on the platform gave the signal to go ahead. When he got inside he fell to the floor, so frightened was he.

Engineer Jack Cowley when told of the occurrence this morning, said to Engineer Roesch and Conductor Lake, in charge of Passenger No. 3, on Monday evening, that he had seen the apparition several times but had been afraid of speaking about it for fear he would be the subject of too much "joshing" from his comrades.

People living in the vicinity of the lonely cut have also seen the apparition many times, and they tell in whispers of some woman who was killed near this cut several years ago. They believe that it is the shade of the unfortunate victim unable to get away from where she lost her life.

The railroad men hardly know what to think of the strange appearance. While they pooh at it being a ghost, they admit that they are badly puzzled and feel a queer feeling every time they approach the cut.

To-night Conductor Lake will make a search for the object; and he says that if he sees it he will certainly ascertain whether it is flesh or shadow. He said this afternoon that he thought it might be a somnambulist, and had reported the matter to his superintendent who had given him orders to hold his train until he could make an investigation, should he see the white "thing" to-night.

It is described as being quite tall, with a white, shadowy covering of some kind and its head running to an apex two feet above its shoulders.—Pueblo Star Journal.

A SPIRIT PORTRAIT.

Picture of a Dead Father as He Was in Vigorous Manhood.

To the Editor:—Now that the Prayer Symposium is past, and by the way everyone who took part therein, pro or con, knew that the convention would be opened with prayer, and it was, and of course it was a "soulful" petition that was offered, and the supplication was so "harmonizing" in its effect that, if reports, public and private, are to be credited, the convention at once commenced its wire-pulling and scheming methods, delegates forgot to be true to their word, etc., etc. But after all, what a mockery the whole orthodox farce business is, especially when applied to Spiritualism. But, as first stated, now that the Symposium is over and the presidency of the N. S. A. settled, if not for All Time, at least for a twelve month, may I not crave space in your crowded columns for the reproduction of an article which appeared in one of my own city papers?

Much is said in The Progressive Thinker about spirituality and a study of the philosophy of Spiritualism, and some writers are inclined to decry the phenomena thereof, but it seems to me that there are phases of phenomena that embrace a high degree of spirituality, the witnessing of which makes one feel as if standing in the presence of an exalting spiritual power, and the study of which forms a part of the philosophy of this great subject, and the phenomena recorded in the following article is of that character, and I feel will be of interest to your many readers:

The season at Lily Dale closed auspiciously Sunday evening, August 25. Reports of the same have appeared in the columns of the Journal from time to time. The intellectual work has been well and favorably reported; however, but little has been said regarding the wonderful phenomena produced there.

Spiritualism possesses much that is unique, or peculiar to itself, particularly that of a phenomenal character, and the time has gone by when intelligent minds will scoff at the same. Indeed, what is the universe but one great realm of phenomena, for the human mind to study? This is a wonderful world in which we live, and Lily Dale has been the scene of some of the most remarkable phenomena known to the world, and with your permission, Mr. Editor, I would like to place before your readers so far as human language can portray an experience in which the writer played an interesting part. I think it is known to the people of Jamestown, at least to those who know me, that I am not given to the upholding of fraud nor to the speaking of untruths, and what I am about to relate is absolute fact and can be attested to by five other reliable witnesses.

There have been at Lily Dale during the season, and many seasons before as well, two persons familiarly known as the Bangs Sisters. These ladies, for ladies they are, are mediums for one of the very highest expressions of art, that of picturing the "human face divine," and their process of "taking pictures," baffles the keenest intellect and transcends all known methods of portraiture. The work produced through these mediums or psychics is of the highest order and the time required in which to produce a perfect likeness of a person living or dead seems incredible to one not having witnessed the phenomenon, but the conditions under which it occurs utterly preclude the possibility of deception in any way.

The portrait secured, the process thereof of which I wish to speak, was that of my father, Eliphalet Mitchell, well known in Jamestown, who passed from earth conditions just three months ago. Our party, six in number, entered a well lighted apartment. The room was thoroughly examined and nothing "uncanny" was found, nor the slightest trace of traps or wires, or paraphernalia of any kind, nothing even in the line of an artist's outfit—not a brush or pencil or chalk or paint. One of our number selected at random two pure white artist's canvases, with steinback finish, from a quantity of the same, these canvasses each being stretched on a wooden frame. The two canvases were placed the face sides lightly together and then rested in an upright position upon a simple board table (the table having been previously scrutinizingly examined) in front of a window, the canvases being about a foot from the glass and held in place by the two sisters, one on either side, the light in the room was then somewhat lessened to afford better opportunity to view the development of the picture, by the transmitted light from the window through the canvas, but the room was not dark, every object therein being discernible, the form, features and hands of the mediums, the latter simply holding the frames, being visible all the time, the light being sufficient to tell the time by the watch. I had with me a photograph of my father taken three years ago, but it was not seen by the sisters, nor had they any knowledge of its appearance. We sat about 10 minutes in eager expectancy and yet during the time engaging in pertinent conversation, when the canvas began to assume a darker hue. Gradually the shading deepened and widened, but leaving a lighter shaded center; presently a pinkish coloration appeared at the top of the canvas, gradually lowering until it gathered as the coloring of the face. At this time the picture had the appearance of a hazy cloud without detail of form or feature. With all eyes intent upon the canvas soon the outline and features of my father's face appeared and was recognized by us all, but it was not perfect, and at the mental suggestion of one of the party that the hair was not quite like "grandpa," immediately the face began fading out until only the outline was visible; soon, however, to reappear with the change in the hair made, and several times the face faded and reappeared in like manner with some change in accord with the mental desire of some one of the party, no word being spoken regarding the same, and this process utterly precludes the possibility that the picture had been previously stamped in any way upon the canvas, and yet the picture was not quite perfect.

At this point in the proceedings telegraphic raps came on the slates which were understood by the sisters and they removed the canvas from the window and laid it upon the table and the hands of all present were placed upon the frames and during this process the finishing touches were put on, including the white collar and shirt front. The picture now being practically finished the canvases were separated, one completely covered with the picture and background, the other remaining perfectly white, not a trace of color it, and as the face of the two canvases were in close contact this is a remarkable feature in itself. The portrait was then placed upright on the table in full view of all present; one of the party comparing closely the picture to the photograph mentally observed or thought, that the wrinkles in the forehead and about the eyes were not sufficiently prominent. At once a deepening of the lines referred to was observed and remarked upon by others of the party and the work was now finished.

One of our party having a knowledge of photography compared the production of the detailed portrait from the hazy cloud as before outlined, to the appearance of the image of an object on the ground glass of a camera in focusing from extremely out of focus to sharp detail, the difference being that the image as we saw it was upright and did not change in size.

The portrait is a fine representation of the form and feature of my father as he was in the vigor of mature manhood, and the time occupied from the commencement of the cloudy appearance on the canvas to the completion of the splendid portrait was just 15 minutes, and bear in mind, kind reader, that no human hands touched the canvas, save only the frames; no human fingers could get between the two canvases to work, for remember the face sides of the same were placed tightly together during the process of development. The work has been examined by critics and pronounced by them to be of high merit. It has the appearance of pastel but its exact character is unknown. I should have said we were given the privilege of taking the canvas from Jamestown had we desired.

I have been a student of the great subject of Spiritualism more than a quarter of a century and this experience I consider the crowning glory along the line of investigation. The splendid work, the straight-forward manner and the simple method of the Bangs Sisters bears no resemblance to the cheap productions and clumsy and complex maneuverings of tricksters and so-called exposers. The picture we received is only one of probably 50 or 60 made in the same manner during the season; two others of which I will speak, one of Fred Nichols of Meadville, Pa., for many years the efficient leader of the Northwestern orchestra, that has so acceptably furnished the music at Lily Dale season after season. Mr. Nichols' funeral was held the very day of the opening of the camp, and I wish that every friend of his in Jamestown could see this splendid portrait of his fine, manly face. The other one was of a young lady who had friends and relatives in this city, that of Miss Lizzie Shearman of North Collins. Her funeral was held the same day of my father's. I was called to officiate, but of course could not respond. But her portrait is a fine piece of work and true to life, and is prized above all else by the sorrowing parents. The Bangs Sisters have another phase of work perhaps as marvelous as that of which I have written but of which I will not now speak; but truly this is a wondrous age and strange it seems that people are so loth to grasp the prize within their reach. However incredulous my statement may seem it is true to fact in every particular. As a party we were not deceived, we were not hypnotized, we were not hallucinated; we were all of sane mind and in our normal state, and any person who will cry "devil" and "humbug" in the presence of such marvelous, convincing and exalting phenomenon as described above is certainly "behind the times," and I hope that many people in the city another season will try this wonderful experience for themselves. This is not an advertisement for the Bangs Sisters, they need none such, as at the Dale and at their home in Chicago they have more than they can do. But I wanted the people here to know of some of the wonders being accomplished through Spiritualism, a subject or system that has been abused, ridiculed and maligned more than any other.

Adown the ages the soul cry has come: "If a man die shall he live again?" And through Spiritualism nature is demonstrating that intelligence, skill and genius go on uninterrupted by death. The picture of father that now graces our home is one of the proofs palpable of intelligent spiritual power manifest through human agency.

That those intersted may have opportunity to see the quality of the work executed in 15 minutes and under conditions as related above, the picture will be on exhibition a few days at the clothing store of A. J. Peterson & Son, 208 Main street, and I may here say that the portrait is not a copy of the photograph spoken of, nor is it just like father as he departed this life, but it is a correct likeness of him as he was in the vigor of mature manhood.

Why Spiritualists Are Poor in Finances.

Because they value truth in preference to catering to the money power which at present moves the world to all outward appearances. They discover that truth will never die, and money will some time have to be left behind. To those Spiritualists who have not realized truth to be ahead of money, comes more mental worries than people who do not cultivate those silent forces, for in a thousand ways does the Wiser Power keep gently pushing this truth into every act, deed and thought.

Now, any one who has studied into the ways of life and struggled for an honest living realizes there is what is called in politics a ring. If you get into that ring you are helped to a position to get money. For instance, a girl friend of mine who had just recently graduated was explaining how schools were obtained. If you can succeed in getting two of the trustees to sign a paper or throw their influence for you; all the efforts the other one might do against you would be in vain, and experience in that business or profession, talent in a natural way, or any virtues another teacher might possess, would not cause you to lose that school if those two trustees were determined to have the inexperienced in that position. And I guess you will find in any business that underlying principle exists; not to the outside world, but only to those who are seeking the money; therefore it is a silent resolution in yourself as to whether you will cater to the money power or sacrifice fame and worldly gain in entering a more slow way in life, hoping and praying true principle will eventually rule.

Again, as a general rule those who are succeeding in finances and have the opportunity to float just as high as any of the society people, and who absorb their minds in money and society, do not place a real value on thoughts of truths, but enter another walk in life that is more suitable to their taste; and those who do value the wisdom and healing forces in thoughts care less for money and influence and style and society, therefore there ought to be satisfaction even in this life; but enviousness, jealousy, thoughtlessness and prejudice bar either class from entering heaven on this plane of existence. If you do evil and think evil, you suspect evil. If you think good, you will do good and see the good. Therefore it behooves us all, cultured or common people, to not censure or blame, but think the very best thoughts of people, for good thoughts bring good deeds.

Our Fall and Winter Campaign.

The Fall and Winter Campaign of The Progressive Thinker will be especially brilliant. It will be unusually attractive and instructive. It will lead you on to a higher plane. It will make you happier, wiser and better. It will blossom into something brighter, fresher, and more startling, and will be a surprise to you in a variety of ways. Among the many attractions will be the debate between the brilliant Materialist, W. F. Jamieson, and the profound and eloquent Moses Hull. It will make most excellent reading for fall and winter evenings, and we are not sure but what it will so scintillate with the friction of happy hits on both sides that lights can be dispensed with while reading it on a cloudy evening. We are sure that every Spiritualist, Freethinker and Materialist will want to read this debate, and thus become wiser and better. Tell your Spiritualist friends of this debate and request them to send to this office at least 25 cents for a three months' subscription to The Progressive Thinker. No Spiritualist can afford to be without this remarkable debate.

Twenty-five Minutes with Palmistry. By Julian Greer. A little book of 41 pages, with cloth cover, giving a short description of the lines, and also a number of illustrations. Is well worth the price, 25 cents. For sale at this office.

"NO BEGINNING."

An Excellent Work for Thinkers.

This book, "No Beginning," is by William H. Maple. The Arena says of it: "The argument is unanswerable. The book will at once appeal to the reason of every reader, and leave him more amazed than ever at the prevalence of the theory of Creation." The Two has always been a fateful number. Free Thought Ideal says: "We found it full of glittering thoughts for thinkers, and the very death warrant of Christian superstition shines upon its pages." Price 75 cents.

REINCARNATION.

A Leading Work On That Subject.

This is a newly edited and revised production of Mr. Walker's great work by News E. Wood, A. M., M. D. It is brought down to date by the addition of new matter. It has the following fourteen chapters: "Reincarnation Defined and Explained," "Evidences of Reincarnation," "Astral Pictures of Successive Incarnations," "Objections to Reincarnation," "Reincarnation Among the Ancients," "Reincarnation in the Bible," "Reincarnation in Early Christendom," "Reincarnation in the East To-day," "Esoteric Oriental Reincarnation," "Transmigration through Animals," "Death, Heaven and Hell," "Karma, the Companion Truth of Reincarnation," "Western Writers on Reincarnation," "Mr. Walker's Conclusions." As the book stands, it is the most complete, logical, clear and convincing work on the subject extant. Price, postpaid, in handsome leatherette, 50 cents. For sale at this office.

Do Not Let This Pass Unnoticed by You - THE TWO CHAMPIONS-REV. MOSES HULL AND W. F. JAMIESON - Their Debate Is Now Under Way.

READ THIS CAREFULLY

The Great Debate of the Twentieth Century, between Rev. Moses Hull, Spiritualist, and W. F. Jamieson, Materialist is now under way. In offering this wonderful attraction to our readers, we are presenting them something prepared with painstaking care, and which will become a staple article in the Literature of Spiritualism. Is it asking our readers too much to hustle a little for The Progressive Thinker, the largest Spiritual paper on earth to-day, and which combines CHEAPNESS and EXCELLENCE. While we are doing so much, why can't you do a little hustling and send in an additional subscriber; send in a trial subscription for three months, at a cost of TWENTY-FIVE CENTS? Twenty-five cents is a very small sum, yet that amount will prove acceptable as a starter. In some localities a dozen or more trial subscriptions can be obtained. Please hustle, then, at once, and aid us in the great work. If you want to send the paper to your friends for three months, we will allow you to send in a club of 7 trial subscriptions for $1.00, a little less than cost.

THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER is furnished in the United States at $1.00 per year, the postage thereon being but nominal, but when it is sent to foreign countries we are compelled to charge 50 cents extra, making the yearly subscription $1.50. Please bear that in mind.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 23, 1901.

TAKE NOTICE!

A three months' subscription to The Progressive Thinker will be sent out for 25 cents, only about 2 cents per week. Anyone who has the least interest of the cause at heart can pay that amount. You can send in a club of seven new names and $1, and the paper will be sent to them for three months as a starter. Be careful and not include in this list anyone who has been a subscriber.

Be Large.

Spiritualism goes marching on and on. Every thrust given by its enemies only arouses greater activity in the ranks; inspires the leaders with new eloquence; calls the attention of some hitherto obscure thinker to its philosophy, and great good is derived from the intended injury. If this is true why does it not work both ways and aid the church to continue calling public attention to it. The dog that is getting chewed up is the one that gets the world's sympathy. Let us care not for the thrusts; let us parry not with a wounded foe, there are many able ones for us to win the good will of by showing that we have the highest aim and broadest love and kindness even for those that, understanding not, hate us and libel us before the world. There is an eternal sometime when the unjust shall be made just and the broadness and supreme goodness shall shine to the universal whole regardless of petty personalities that seem to nag and prod the very soul at times. Be large and the world will know you are large; be kind and the world will return your kindness.

Ingersoll and Spiritualism.

Ingersoll tore down the walls of the narrow heaven of the past, the far away imaginary throne and set the hypnotized world to thinking, but left them without much hope for a future existence. Spiritualism holds out to those rendered homeless and hopeless the hand of the spirit; the love of the companion, the little babe, the mother and father, and says "You shall see them again." The parting words have not been forgotten by them any more than by the mortals left behind. It says "They have only gone to prepare a place for you," and tells you to prepare the way; that you begin over there just where you leave off here. In a great measure it lifts the veil or curtain that hangs between the two worlds and invites intercommunication between mortals and those they called dead. No wonder those who have long been blinded by the old teachings are ecstatic in their demonstrations of appreciation when the veil is pulled aside for the first time and they are shown the light of truth, the door of the future world, the reality of life everlasting. It is not to be wondered at. The wonder is that more minds are not unbalanced by the change, by the unburdening, and the beautiful certainty established in place of the horrible uncertainty. Ingersoll has done a good work, and left the finishing to Spiritualism.

Better Tell the Truth.

Rev. C. A. Blanchard, president of Wheaton College, is reported to have said a few Sundays ago in his sermon, that the pulpit is enslaved to Mammon; that the minister is the tool of Wealth, and is obliged to preach to suit the whims and caprice of the rich men who pay their salary. "The pulpit dares not express its honest convictions," he said. "Crooking the pregnant hinges of the knee, it meekly bows to the coterie of wealthy men who foot the bills. I have hesitated to say things I knew should be said, and I know a majority of you have had the same experience."

That is a confession in a high place, but it is said an honest one is good for the soul. In doctrinal matters if the preachers would declare their honest convictions, just as they express themselves confidentially in private conversation, and there is scarcely a creed in Christendom which would not go by the board in no time. The pulpit fears the pews, and the pews are reluctant to break with the pulpit, so each plays a false game to the ruin of each. It won't always be so. Trust our word for that.

"Longley's Beautiful Songs." Vol. 2. Sweet songs and music for home and social meetings. For sale at this office. Price 15 cents.

More Relics of Buddha.

Now news comes from the Orient telling of the unearthing in Nepal, a country of northern Hindustan, occupying the southern slope of the Himalayas, of a tope containing relics of Gautama, the Wise, usually known as Buddha. This tope was 85 feet in diameter at the base, and, like all others of its kind, was circular and arched, forming a dome-like structure. This was built of concentric layers of huge burned bricks more than a foot in length and breadth. Such a length of time had passed since its construction no one knew its age. It was entirely covered with debris, forming a large mound. After digging through eighteen feet of solid brickwork, a large slab was exposed, which proved to be the top of a coffer, box shaped, of sandstone beautifully carved, within which were found five vases. All were of soapstone save one which was carved out of rock crystal, in which, says the account, was a marvelous collection of gold stars, pearls, beryls, topazes and other jewels.

As Buddha was cremated at his death, about 400 years before our era, it is probable one of these vases contained the ashes of the great teacher.

Smaller topes have been opened, in which were vases and relics. One 39 feet in diameter, built of rough stones without mortar, probably erected during the reign of Asoka, 250 years before our era, was opened in 1822. A relic-box was found therein of white sandstone about 10 inches square. In this were four caskets containing small portions of burnt human bones. Another tope was opened in 1851, by Major Cunningham, in which relics of missionaries sent out by Asoka to doctrinize the East, were found. Eighty thousand of those missionaries were sent to all countries then known, and some of their sacred books were preserved in these wonderful monuments, one of which, and probably the oldest, is just discovered as narrated.

Rhys Davids, LL. D., who wrote the article entitled Buddhism in the Encyclopedia Britannica, Vol. 4, p. 438, and who is unquestioned authority on Buddhism, having written and published an elaborate work on the subject, in 1875, says of Lamaism, the Thibetian branch of Buddhism:

"Its shaven priests, its bells and rosaries, its images and holy water, its popes and bishops, its abbots and monks of many grades, its processions and feast-days, its confessional and purgatory, and its worship of the double Virgin, so strongly resemble Romanism, that the first Catholic missionaries thought it must be an imitation by the devil of the religion of Christ."

It is too bad that we have no relic of the accredited founder of Christianity save two old shirts, by way of distinction called coats, one of which is admitted by Catholics to be a fraud, his swaddling clothes, and a wrist-bone of his grandmother. The wars of the Crusades, with the sacrifice of six millions of lives, it is claimed, was waged to rescue the holy sepulchre from the Saracens; but, sad to relate, the dear Lord, taking the Gospels for authority, never rested in it but a part of two nights. Had it been found by the Crusaders it would have been a splendid relic.

One Case in Thousands.

"Mother, if I were you I wouldn't read that book," said a college student to his maternal ancestor the other day. The parents were rather liberal in thought, but had refrained from trying to indoctrinate their son in their own faith, and he had absorbed the bigotry of the dominant religion while at school. The book was one of Mr. Tenney's, advertised in these columns, entitled "The Earth Not Created." The young man was applying in a mild way that spirit of Catholicism which prohibits the faithful from reading certain prohibited books, because their tendency is to make heretics. The authorized English version of the Bible is one of those prohibited books.

Instead of teaching people to read, and exercise reason with good common sense in regard to what they read, rejecting the false and accepting the true, the policy of the church has been and is, to taboo knowledge, and keep churchmen in leading strings, slaves to old-time opinions, whose origin began in barbarism.

It was but little more than fifty years ago when Spiritualism began its inroads on the old faith. Its members, frequently expelled from the church for enlarging their faith, once free from its restraint, began to read and think for themselves. A few years later that bold, fearless, and eloquent Col. Ingersoll, began his iconoclastic work. His good humor, well-turned periods, fund of anecdote, terrible invective and hits at orthodoxy, very frequently copied by the secular press, set the world to thinking. The "Index Prohibiterium" lost its efficacy, and people whose lives had been governed by the idea, "Mother, I wouldn't read that book," have commenced reading anything that shows up the fallacy of prevailing creeds.

The young man referred to will complete his collegiate education, all the time restrained by preceptors and class-mates, and will not dare think outside of established lines. Susceptible to external impressions he may become psychologized and led away into the church; but as the years advance, and he mingles more and more with the world the influence wears off. Perchance he will take up some book which exposes the fallacy of his schoolday teaching. He begins for the first to reason on the subject. He learns how fear and force have been employed as proscluting agents; then, like millions of other advanced thinkers, he will break away from the church, mortified that he had not the manliness to investigate for himself, and chagrined that he was so thoughtless as to try and prevent his well-informed mother from acquainting herself with one of the best established principles in natural philosophy, that "Time had no beginning, and can have no ending; that matter itself is indestructible, and must exist, ever subject to change, while eternity endures."

A Plea for the Disgruntled.

A fine plea for greater toleration of thought is entered by Forest S. Green in the Chicago Record-Herald. His views are worthy the judicial consideration of Spiritualists, as well as others, when he says:

As I read the varied contributions to your "Battle Ground of Modern Thought," I am reminded that Marcus Aurelius said something to the effect that "it is all a matter of opinion." The mind with a new idea must not only bring abundant proofs, but must also club its way through a double line of bigots—the church bigots (in whatever country), whose interpretation of scripture may be disturbed by the new theory, and the "scientific" bigots, who never discover anything new themselves, who must always have a precedent, and all of whose beliefs and education are from 10 to 100 years old.

The fact is that we must answer "I don't know" to many questions. This is true of the commonest things in life as well as of religious and economic subjects, and the quicker we all recognize it the better. It ill becomes any of us to have unchangeable opinions. We should hold our minds open for the reception of new evidence on all subjects, and change our opinions when it seems necessary, even though it "hurts." This is the way to make progress. Some people eagerly welcome new ideas in architecture, transportation, etc., but show signs of apoplexy at a suggested change of mind on religion or philosophy.

I have heard many generally sensible persons say: "What was good enough for my mother is good enough for me." When I was a boy I thought my mother's church had the choicest kind of "salvation." I was often puzzled about the others, but consoled myself with the idea that their members might squeeze through somehow. Twenty or thirty years ago one might have listened to fifty-two different preachers during the year and learned that there were as many different brands of "salvation," none genuine without "our" trade mark. On the other hand, one would suppose from the fierce criticisms of churches that all the bigots are in the churches. Why, thousands and thousands of bigots—and hypocrites, too—are not church members at all.

As for myself, I long ago drifted away from "orthodox" moorings, because, for one thing, the many varieties of "orthodoxy" bewildered me; I concluded to follow what seemed to me to be truth, no matter where it should lead. It finally seemed to me that reincarnation, as so sympathetically and clearly explained by Annie Besant, offered me an avenue for progress, and I followed that. Now, one must not be an "orthodox" reincarnationist, because orthodoxy means mental ossification. This year—and for several years—it has offered me what I think is the best guess about man and God. But if I find another and better-looking guess—which I will admit now seems improbable—I shall look into it. While the Vedanta philosophy is the only consoling and consistent theory I ever found, I don't think people are foolish who don't accept it. There can be many reasons for their nonacceptance of it. I shall allow them much more time in this matter than it took for me.

So, brethren, let us not "roast" each other so hard for not believing in our guesses on many subjects. Let us not be so "dead sure" about everything. This applies to Theosophists as well as to others. Let us examine the other fellow's argument—if we can find time after earning a living and keeping the trusts going. It is sometimes tiresome to watch the reformers tearing down the pike of history and hear their frantic shouts: "We are the whole thing; we can fix it if you give us a chance." Republicans, Democrats, Populists, Anarchists, Socialists, Theosophists, Catholics, Protestants, Mohammedans, Buddhists—all are talking and gesticulating (and nearly all the talkers have some ax to grind).

Is it any wonder that folks get bewildered? When honest men and women with leisure and education differ about "truth," what are we to do who have to work most of the time for a bare living?

Brethren, let us be tolerant. It will take us all a long time to show one another the "reason why!"

Without special reference to Theosophy or any other specific cult or belief, there is an open field for application of these principles, wherein they may be exercised and cultivated to excellent advantage. One issue that may be taken as a corollary to the tenor of his views, is this: The status of the critics, the dissatisfied—the much-decried "disgruntled," if you please—as necessary factors in the initiation and advancement of reforms, whether in modes of belief, or along lines moral, political, social or religious.

In each and all these fields it is the disgruntled, the dissatisfied, the critics, who stir up the minds of the people to think, and who work the thinking till it culminates in action, in change, in progress, in reform.

It is the disgruntled who become dissatisfied with medieval theological statements and creeds, and like Theodore Parker, Minot J. Savage and others, break loose from the thraldom of venerated dogmas and stand forth in the strength of free, unshackled thought.

The disgruntled are the ones who probe old errors, and puncture new fallacies and fads of Folly's begetting.

The disgruntled prod the laggards onward, ply the lash to the backs of rascals, point the finger of just scorn at the despoilers of innocence and the trespassers against justice and right, and fear not to flay the betrayers of the people and the people's Cause, whether clothed in judicial ermine, in priestly and clerical robes, or senatorial togas. They prune the excrescences that deface the fair fame of society.

But for the disgruntled, creeds and beliefs would never change, from generation to generation, world without end. Political, religious, and social ideas would become a dead, stagnant, moveless ocean, covered with the scum of miasmic desuetude.

George Washington, Thomas Jefferson, Thomas Paine, Abraham Lincoln, were among the disgruntled of their day and time, and they helped the world onward because they were dissatisfied and desired better things.

The world's reformers, of all time, were and are classified among the disgruntled.

Yes, the disgruntled are the inciters of improvement, the pioneers of progress. But for them, the world would relapse into indifference, become inane, non-progressive, and sink into a state of petrified, if not putrefied conservatism, without thought or desire of advancement.

But for the disgruntled, the whole human race would become fixed in a condition of arrested development.

The disgruntled are the leaders—they are the men, and the women, who urgently put their shoulders to the wheels of progression, and lift and push mankind onward toward their best ideals of truth and life.

The disgruntled are not satisfied with what is; they want something better—and still better—ever better!

Even were they occupying what to others might seem a heaven, they would still reach out for something better, something desirable of additional good, above and beyond their present attainments.

This unsatisfied mental condition, conjoined with moral and humanitarian impulse, is the motor of human progress toward all high and noble ideals of enlightenment and spiritual growth.

With these thoughts in mind, let us view kindly and appreciatively the disgruntled—even the disgruntled Spiritualist writer and critic—for the world has need of such; they are veritable factors of progress, and as such we should kindly regard them. They alone will save the N. S. A. from actual death and place it in its proper relations to the great mass of Spiritualists.

The Drivelings of a Mossback.

The advanced thought in the Christian pulpit was shown in these columns last week, by extracts from a sermon in a Congregational pulpit, by Rev. Snyder. But it must not be supposed the Jaspers are all dead. If any one has grown too hopeful, we commend to his consideration extracts from an address delivered by Rev. W. R. Newell, of Chicago, to a Detroit audience, on the 13th ult. The Free Press of that city says of the sermon:

"It was one of the old-fashioned discourses which seemed to bring the lurid flames of Milton's hell curling up around the unregenerate; and a creepy feeling to run up and down the spine of many."

Rev. Newell said:

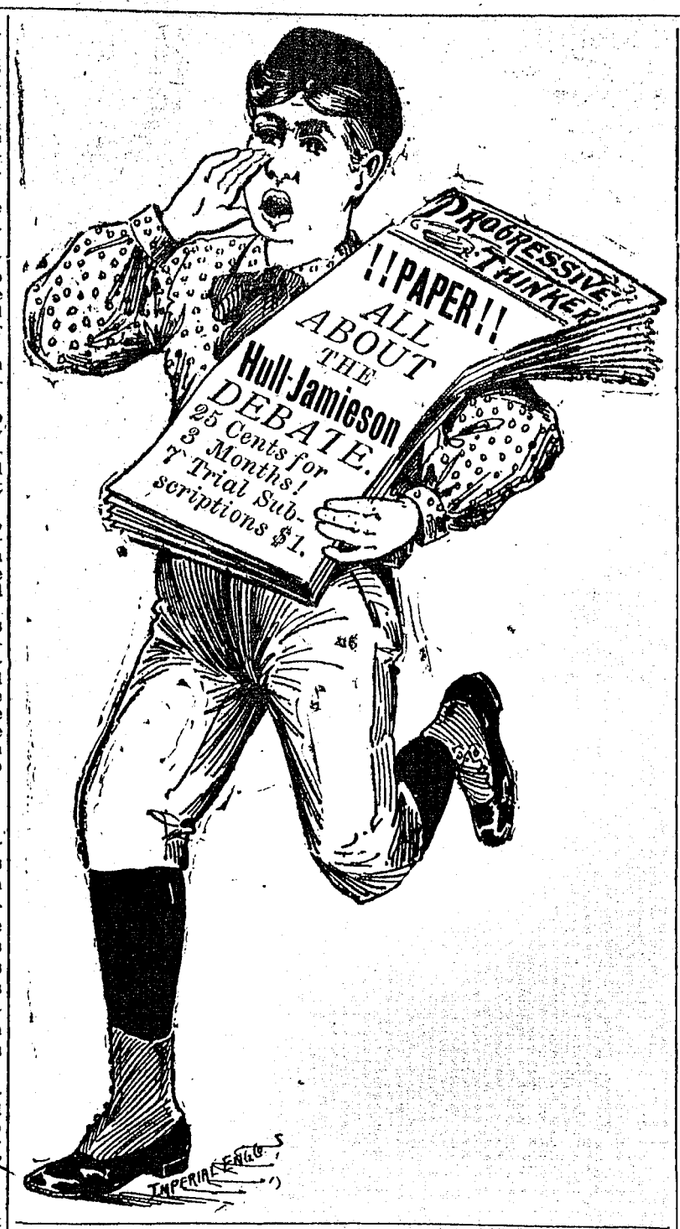
"I am convinced, after going about among Christians here and in England, that the majority of them are deluded and are trusting in something besides the blood of Christ. If you ask them whether they are saved they say 'Yes, I am a church member.' They are trusting in themselves, as the Jews trusted, because they thought themselves the chosen people of God, and their city was destroyed. I talked to an old woman the other day. She said: 'Yes, I think I am a Christian. I am doing the best I can.' The answer showed she was lost. She was trusting in her own works. When a sinner thinks he can make up for sin by good works he is trying to bribe God. There are people in this room to-night who have never given the subject of salvation fifteen minutes of consecutive thought. In a few minutes their life may be snuffed out, and their life will just begin—in heaven or—in hell.

"It is an awful thing to say, but I have not a particle of doubt that some of those before me who are professing Christians will spend eternity in hell. Christ had twelve disciples, and one of them is in Hades in the center of the earth to-night, waiting the judgment day.

"The Bible says in the last days mockers shall come. Did you never hear mockers stand in the pulpits and tell of the glorious opening of the twentieth century. They evolute beautifully; but I wish to say that there has never been an age since Noah's flood, when there has been so much high-handed sin as there is now. I am willing to meet that statement when I stand before Christ.

"Statistics show crime is increasing with fearful rapidity. Each year there are between fifteen and sixteen hundred murders in the United States. Each murder, God says, defiles the land, and the murder can only be expiated through the death of the murderer. In this State of Michigan the people have cast off the law of God."

The speaker, says the Free Press, also scored those who deny the existence of a literal hell, and used the destruction of Sodom to prove his point. The center of the earth, he thinks, is stored with material with which to consume the world and its inhabitants. The first nineteen chapters of Revelation portray the times just ahead of us.



"Christ might come to-night," said Newell. "In that day gross darkness shall cover the earth. It will be the reign of the beast—the anti-Christ, who is to be a real man. The Christian Scientists are getting ready to worship the devil. Already two temples have been erected in Paris where the devil is conspicuously worshiped. I do not doubt he is worshiped in every large city in America. I know he is in Chicago. The Spiritualists also are preparing the way for it."

We apprehend Rev. Newell did not inquire into the religious faith of the great criminals of the country. Had he done so he would have found almost the last man of them hold to the orthodox faith, and generally are members of the church. They believe in the atoning blood of Jesus, and if not shot down while engaged in crime, they are sure of being forgiven, and will gain heaven and an eternal reward for believing.

Spiritualists cut no figure in our criminal courts. Their gravest offences are misdemeanors only, trivial acts such as healing the sick without license, doing good on Sunday, or may be, serving as mediums between mortals and immortals. The great crimes are left for the Christian clergy and their dupes to monopolize.

INSTRUCTIVE.

The Progressive Thinker never lags behind the times in instructive literature, and rest assured it will be at the front with an unusually instructive quality of brain food for the Fall and Winter Campaign. IN IGNORANCE.

Those Who Take No Spiritualist Paper Away Behind the Times.

To the Editor:—With a prospect of doing a little good by trying to spread the light, I herewith enclose $1.00 from my own pocket, hoping that possibly some of the persons whose names I send may become permanent subscribers.

Your premium book, "Wanderer in the Spirit Lands," has been read and re-read, and is now loaned out doing missionary work. It is surely a wonder, both in actual cost and quality, as The Progressive Thinker and the book cost only $1.25, giving so much for so little in actual cost to the reader. It does seem a great pity that so many Spiritualists continue to keep themselves so much in ignorance of our beautiful philosophy by taking no Spiritualistic paper whatever, but wait! wait! wait! until they get ready for the bier, after which, having woke up in the Spiritual World, find out for the first time in their true life that their enslavement to material affairs [to the exclusion of all else] was only a millstone about their necks.

Long may The Progressive Thinker wave.

To the Spiritualists of Illinois.

There was never a cause so good that it would survive neglect.

Before the Indian Summer days are past your State Association finds itself confronted by numerous calls for work, which are steadily increasing. At the threshold of winter we wish to say to you that the extent and effectiveness of our campaign rests with you and not with us. Consider the territory we are responsible for—over one hundred populous counties reaching from the Wisconsin border to Cairo and from the Indiana line to the Mississippi river. Members of our executive board can carry only a small part of the burden themselves. They are willing, alert and doing what they can without financial reward but from faith in the foundation principles of Spiritualism. We ought to have four, or six, missionaries at work in the state, not only Sundays, but every week day, all winter long. This means expense. Are there 300 or 500 Spiritualists in Illinois who will take out honorary memberships in the State Association at one dollar each? How many will give a sum amounting to less than two cents a week for fifty-two weeks to aid in spreading our gospel? Where are the able ones who are willing to send in donations of still larger sums? We need men and women to travel regular circuits along our great railroad arteries to the west, the north and the south, who shall pay regular visits to every old society, strengthen the weak, establish the new and preach the gospel of glad tidings at every opportunity.

They must be men and women who can make grammatical use of the English language, will be enterprising and tactful and absolutely untainted by deliberate trickery in their mediumship. One of the greatest curses to the cause in the interior points of Illinois is the visit from self-styled "Madames," "Professors," "Doctors" and "Reverends," who change their names and companions with every new locality, but fleece everywhere. Brethren, stop snoring—rouse from lethargy—send in your contributions—find some work to do yourselves that no one else will do. All at once—NOW.

A Wise Proposition.

If the failure of the British arms in South Africa comes from the nation's remissness in prayer, as the Archbishop of York lately alleged, then why not adopt the Truth Seeker's proposition; let both armies retire from the field, and let the chaplains advance to the firing line, then pop away with their most stalwart words at God. When done let him render his verdict. The plan will be as much superior to human arbitration as an orthodox God is superior to finite man.

Strenuous Effort to Save a Soul.

The following is from the Chicago Journal:

"At a religious revival of negroes in Mississippi one negro killed another because the latter would not go to the mourner's bench. The murderer was what is called an 'exhorter' at the revival. While the excitement was at high pitch he used strenuous efforts to bring the unredeemed to the mourner's bench. He begged and implored one negro to go up and be saved, but the man remained obstinate, whereupon the exhorter slew him with an ax."

CHANGE INEVITABLE.

It Must Come by Evolution or Revolution.

"Weighed in the balance hero dust
Is vile and vulgar clay."

Long before I saw and heard Ingersoll or read any of his lectures, I had heard of him in such a way as to give the impression that he was a very bad man. And this because I had heard him not denounced by orthodox people, but because I had heard him damned with injudicious praise by those who, ignorant of his real character and the object of his efforts, supposed him to be the champion of all that is vulgar, ignoble, unamiable, hopeless in the human character. I saw the man, I heard him speak, and never was a false impression more suddenly and utterly removed.

If I had been as ignorant of McKinley's record and life it would be hard to overcome a prejudice against him aroused by the indiscriminate and injudicious praise of editors, orators and clergymen, as well as the offensive show of lamentation, insincere as it is loud, by the mammon worshipers who in the violent death of the President only see a blow aimed at their idol, the golden calf; and who are as unappreciative of what was tender, true and noble in his character, as they are deaf to the necessities and blind to the virtues of Lazarus at the gates.

For centuries our race has gone into the remotest corners of the earth, paving their path with swords, whiskey bottles, calico and beads, to tell the heathen that the gods they worshiped were not gods at all. Little they recked of the feeling of desolation that swept the simple but sincere worshiper when he found that his god and the god of his fathers was really impotent to protect his votaries or avenge insult and defiance to himself and his altars. Yet as sure as the pious missionary of our race gave that bitter cup to the weaker savage, so surely must he either in this life or another drink it himself and know this, neither are his gods really gods at all—that his own ideals are faulty—that his own conception of the Divine is untrue—that the feet of his heroes are of clay.

History and archaeological research make known that a thousand civilizations which in many points compare favorably with our own flourished long ago. In the days of their vigor, but more in the early days of their decline, great men whose greatness rested upon the stability of their institutions social, religious, financial, no doubt labored to convince the multitude that their system was eternal. In the day of Roman triumph the great Roman sang:

"When the coliseum falls Rome shall fall,
And when Rome falls, the world."

This has been the boast and threat of every preceding civilization, as it is of ours to-day. Rome and the Coliseum fell long ago, as did the institutions of other great systems. Just as surely is our doomed unless our institutions prove flexible enough to sustain purer, simpler, better ideals—to cherish and defend a more brotherly relation, more just financial conditions.

Taken comprehensively our civilization is higher than any with which history deals, but it, like the good young man of scripture, lacks at least "one thing." So change is inevitable for us, as it was for our fathers and their precious systems. We have our choice—evolution or revolution.

There is not in all the land from Dan to Beersheba a priest time-server enough in praying "thy kingdom come," to mean the perpetuation of things as they are now on earth; there is not in any Christian church from Rome to Zion a worshiper who is dull and unspiritual enough to conceive and hope for a heavenly life in any world where customs and institutions such as ours are permanent, good though they may be compared with those of preceding civilizations; and the sad thing about all this pompous, aggressive, vindictive and somewhat insincere glorification of McKinley is that he is made the scapegoat of the nation's sins, represented in conventional eulogies as the typical defender of things as they are to be permanent—the advocate and friend and champion of Dives in the case of Lazarus versus Dives.

War may be inevitable between nations partially civilized. Brutal punishment and even death sentence may be at least apologized for in present conditions, but to a man of peace who loves to contemplate the time when there shall be no more war and swords shall be made into ploughshares, the greatest sign of progress was noticed in the sudden and sweeping reaction of the American nation from the warlike spirit that convulsed the people for nine days after the return of Admiral Dewey, the spasmodic and dying effort to revive the old shout, "Saul has slain his thousands, but David his tens of thousands." (But even in that unenlightened age David thought himself unworthy to build the temple because he had been a man of blood.)

You may look for a reaction from the present excitement which gives the unscrupulous an opportunity to pervert the truth and confound anarchy with social reform. Principles will not die if Czolgosz kills McKinley, nor will they die if Czolgosz is slain. But if the departed president is cognizant of things on earth to-day he would acknowledge with humiliation and sorrow the cry of his nation for revenge against one or a few men. And if, as some Catholics think, his soul be in a purgatorial state, nothing that could be done on this side would help to release it as an abandonment of the idea that his character stands for the perpetuation without reform of the ideals and principles embodied in existing institutions. Surrounded by influences that corrupt or at least repress any but the strongest character, his life is luminous, but "Sparta hath many as noble sons as he."

The most common expression heard among the illiterate here was, "Czolgosz should be skinned alive." The wounded president said, "Don't let them hurt him." In dying he said, "It is God's way; his will be done." Point out the concurrence in "God's way and will" in the cry for revenge that went up from the millions at his death.

THE HOME CIRCLE

THE ONLY TRUE AND PERFECT WAY TO THE HIGHER SPIRITUAL ATTAINMENTS AND UNFOLDMENTS.

LEADING THROUGH THE AVENUES OF KNOWLEDGE AND THE HIGHLANDS OF GOODNESS.

I.

Every morning and evening through some of the most fashionable of the West End streets of St. Louis, Mo., as stated in the Republic, past stately houses, where the rich live in ease and affluence, forgetful of the struggles and sorrows of the "other" and greater half, a woman, clothed as a beggar, yet with the unmistakable stamp of refinement in every feature, wends her way.

There is nothing remarkable in this fact alone, yet behind this woman's beggarly attire and sad, sweet face lies a strange story of a woman's faith betrayed, love scorned, revenge and then remorse.

Years ago in Ireland two lovers pledged their troth with love as true and faith as deep as the sea which soon was to roll between them.

Mary Shiels was as rosy and blithsome a lass as one would meet in a day's journey and Michael Galligan was as strong, warm-hearted an Irishman as one would wish to grasp by the hand. It was the old, old story; the youth to seek fortune in the land of promise, to prove worthy of the bright-eyed girl by his side and then they would go to housekeeping in a little cot all their own.

Mary's parents were above the Irish peasant. She had received a good education in a Dublin convent. Her father was a merchant in a small way in Dublin. Galligan was a horny-handed son of the soil. Mary had been his teacher, and although he could read and write, he had made more progress with her heart than she had with his head. Mary's parents opposed the match, and so the parting, with tears and sobs and vows.

II.

Years passed. The lovers corresponded, but the success which Michael predicted would soon follow his advent in the new country, still delayed, and Mary waited and hoped. Then one day her father died. Her mother had gone several years before. She wrote to Michael, telling him of her trouble, and of her desire to come to him. She waited many weary weeks for an answer, but none came. Then, fearing her lover was ill, perhaps dead, but never doubting him, she disposed of her effects and, with what little money she had, came to America.

On the way over she made the acquaintance of a fellow countryman just returning to America from a visit to the old country. From him she learned her erstwhile lover's address. Michael had left New York and gone to St. Louis. That explained why he had not written. He had not received her last letter, and the day she arrived in New York found her leaving for the great West in search of her lover.

Fate was not so kind to her in St. Louis. Many days were passed in the weary search in a strange city, and then, one day she found him. It had been better, perhaps, had she not. With a heart full of love, trust and hope, she came to his door one day and was greeted by—his wife. Mary's whilom lover was the father of a large family.

There was a scene, angry words were exchanged, and poor Mary sobbed as if her heart would break. She left the house, vowing revenge on all its inmates, and cursing the lover who had proved so false.

III.

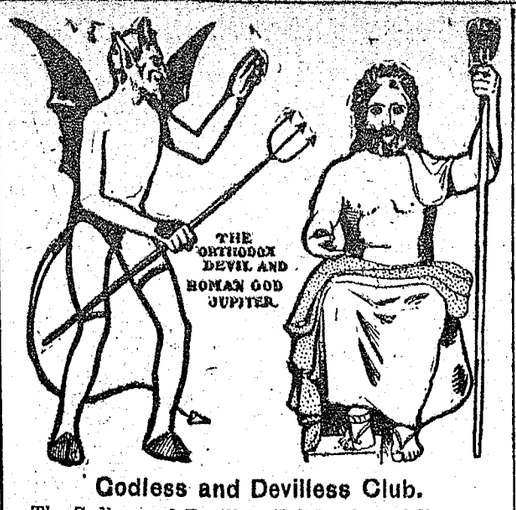
What to do in a strange city? The problem of a livelihood confronted her and must be solved. She obtained, after awhile, a position as cook and housemaid, and later on became a seamstress. Fortune at last seemed to smile on her. She was quick, neat and tasteful, and after ten years of labor had saved a little competency of $1,800.

But she never forgot. Michael's wife was taken ill, and, after a long sickness, died. Ill luck dogged his footsteps. His children fell ill one after another; he could find no work, and yet they all must live, someway, somehow. Many a time Mary Shiels passed his door, hugging to her heart the knowledge of her own snug little bank account, and knowing also that many times Michael and his children were in need of food. Then one day Michael's little girl died, and there was no money to pay for the little coffin, and Michael came to Mary for help. But there was no help for him there; her heart was hardened, and the little girl was buried by the city.

Another year passed. The cloud seemed never to lift from Michael, and one day there was a brief chronicle in the city papers of a suicide, "despondent and out of work." It was Michael Galligan.

And Mary Shiels? The money she had toiled so hard to save, the money that meant her revenge, the money whose flaunting had been her pride before Michael's eager eyes, the money that had been deposited in the little savings bank, was lost when so many institutions went under in the panic of '93.

IV.



For a long time Mary Shiels' life was despaired of. When she recovered all her pride and bitterness had melted. She sought out Michael's remaining child, all that was left of the ill fated, once happy family, took it with her and started out once more bravely to make her way.

A few months after a relative in the old country died, leaving her several thousand dollars, enough to keep her, with her few wants, all her life; but she still toils on, caring for Michael's child, and devoting the income from her little fortune to the care of others less fortunate than herself. Every evening she makes a pilgrimage to a church, her basket on her arm, going from there to carry comfort and material help to those who need it, and every morning she can be seen wending her way on the same errand, a familiar and blessed messenger of peace and comfort to many a weary soul.

V.

The above incidents illustrate the beauty, grandeur and goodness that will finally come uppermost in every living soul. Suffering ofttimes brings repentance, softens the asperities of life, makes people charitable, induces them to look within and then up towards the angel world, and finally to become humanitarians. Just so long as any man, woman or child is calling for assistance in the struggle of life, just so long will humanitarianism find an ample field for its labor. Every one who can, should follow the example of Mary Shiels, and assist some one whose burdens are too great to be borne alone. The higher spiritual attainments can only become a part of one's nature when the seeker after the same travels along the Highlands of Goodness and the Planes of Knowledge, ever willing and anxious to assist some one in the struggle of life who is less fortunate than self.

J. R. F.

Godless and Devilless Club.

The Godless and Devilless Club has been fully organized, and at the present time is doing a most excellent work. It has no God to quarrel over; no Devil to fear; no hell of fire and brimstone, and no baptismal fonts. The object of the Club is to perfectly purify the whole world from the deleterious and dangerous effects of the multitudinous religious cults and sects that now inflict the earth plane. This country is not only grievously suffering from the presence of the various religious sects that have taken deep root in our soil, but the Godly cults from India, Persia and Egypt have agents here to disseminate their "truths" and attract adherents. These different religions all conflict with each other, the tendency being to formulate a religious hash that is neither palatable nor healthy; and which renders confusion more confused. The cross-firing is awful to contemplate. They do not as a rule cross swords with each other; they do not use firearms in their various hot encounters; they do not apply dynamite to the opposing ranks, nor do they use cannon in attempts to batter each other out of existence. They do, however, send forth bitter opposing thoughts, one against the other.

Our sect is right; yours is wrong.

Our sect is nearer God than yours, hence your salvation is not assured.

We worship God right; you do it wrong.

Our God is a person sitting on a throne, and all other Gods are non-entities—have no existence only in the fertile imaginations of their devotees.

Thus the conflict goes on in multifarious ways until a stifling gloom and atmosphere have settled over the world, and certain progressive minds are striving for relief therefrom, and have formed the Godless and Devilless Club with which they propose finally to redeem the world from the poisonous effects of priestcraft.

This Club is as far ahead of the various religious sects and cults as the teachings of Flammarion on Astronomy are superior to the prattling of a parrot, or the quack of a duck, or the braying of an ass. Catholicism, when placed beside it, dwindles into a sapient dwarf, and Islamism into insignificance.

The Godless and Devilless Club leads in all that is grand, beautiful, holy and sublime. It has no God to love, no Devil to hate, hence it can love humanity supremely and hate wrong-doing in all of its various departments without concentrating the same on an imaginary being.

The great advantage that will be derived from the existence and energetic action of the Godless and Devilless Club will certainly prove an inestimable boon to the world, and millions will rise up eventually and bless it.

Just think of the extreme absurdity of two chaplains in opposing armies praying for victory against each other. For instance, name the God of the Boers, Jimmy God, and the God of the English, Benny God, in order to distinguish them from each other. Then take the God of the Mohammedan and call it Allah God, and that of the Chinese, Josh God, and you have the two so named that you can distinguish them, and at the same time make the scheme appear supremely ridiculous.

The world has been almost ruined with too much God and too much Devil and too little common sense. To believe in the existence of a God is certainly a waste of intrinsic energy, while to believe in the existence of the Devil is decidedly foolish.

The world can not be fully redeemed until the love bestowed upon imaginary Gods is concentrated on suffering humanity—those suffering from hunger, destitution and sickness. A beautiful incident occurred at the last meeting of the Godless and Devilless Club. An old man, tottering on the verge of the grave, had been furnished a home by one of the members, and subsequently elected an honorary member of the club. Last Thursday evening he came to the club as usual, leaning on his staff. He had seen happy days; he had had many years of prosperity; he had a loving wife and children, but all had succumbed to the yellow fever scourge, and he was left alone—disconsolate. Soon reverses came, and he was left penniless, and after years of unfortunate struggle, he drifted to the embraces of the Godless and Devilless Club in Chicago, signing his name as Geo. B. Hastings.

Mr. Hastings, now old, decrepit, and careworn, was gradually nearing the last depot—the grave, yet he was extremely cheerful, notwithstanding the trying ordeal through which he had passed. His heart was extremely sympathetic, and his soul buoyant with those sublime emotions that rendered the Garden of his Soul an attractive place for the angels of heaven to reflect on sublunary scenes. He had prayed in the South, at his own home in Memphis, Tenn., for the recovery of his dear wife and children. His petition to the Ruler of the Universe was solemnly pathetic; every word he uttered went forth with tear-stains upon it, and as they ascended heavenward, they seemed to have impressed upon them the groans and anguish of an agonized soul, and if a God had heard them and even if he possessed a heart of stone, they would have caused a sympathetic chord in his nature to vibrate tenderly. He prayed and prayed for his wife and two children, yet his prayers only met a mocking response. It was summer time. The atmosphere was the fount into which flowers, vines and shrubbery poured their own distilled perfumes to gladden the senses and homes of mortals, yet connected therewith were the germs of yellow fever, cold, devilish, malignant, hateful, affording a strange contrast with the summer's tropical beauties, and gradually destroying the precious lives of his dear wife and children. Alas! his prayer was futile—the yellow fever germs preyed upon their victims until the deadly work was accomplished.

He gazed upon his dead wife and children, his sadness too deep for utterance, and he then resolved on a new deal. The fruits of his prayer were before him. The pestilential breath of yellow fever germs—"God's germs" he said they were—"like demon's had devastated and rendered desolate the home circle." His voice had ceased to be tremulous with those divine emotions of affection that had sent a hallowed baptismal influence on those he loved, and his eyes were as a desert—no tears there. His features seemed no longer vibrant with love, but were aglow with something akin to maniacal firmness, that, like a storm-cloud, betokened a change in his nature. There seemed to be a war of thoughts in his mind—some towards a God; others turning from him because the yellow fever germs were the objects of his creation, and as he sadly thought and thought, and philosophized, he looked upon God—he could not help doing so—as responsible for the death of his wife and children. "Yes," he said, "God killed them;" "God murdered them!" Rising from his seat, he continued: "I have walked with God, if one all my life, and here is the ruin of a once happy home! There is my darling wife! There on the cot are my two idolized children. They are full of God's yellow fever germs, still eating their bodies. Beautiful works of God, are they not? Lovely emanations from a divine source, are they? Worthy to be praised as illustrating the noble handiwork of Divine Providence, these yellow fever germs!" Then with the intensity of his emotions burning in his soul, everything became dark before him, and he fell to the floor unconscious.

In the excitement that followed, the Club adjourned, to meet in two weeks, the proceedings of which will be reported for The Progressive Thinker by the HIGH SCRIBE.

A KICK,

Administered by Another of the "Disgruntled."

In common with the many observing Spiritualists of our country, I watched with more than ordinary interest the proceedings of our recent meeting of the N. S. A., and while no important change can now be made, it is in order, perhaps, to pass an opinion upon the merits of the work accomplished, and the probable outcome thereof.

It was not to be expected, of course, that a "perfect attainment" would follow in any line of action. The interests at stake are too diversified and scattered, and the opinions we may form of the work accomplished will depend largely upon our point of observation, and knowledge of what actually occurred. Diversity of opinion is no sign of weakness, but rather evidence of life and strength.

Personally, I was inclined to favor the retention of the former officers, or most of them, another term, in order that present plans might be perfected by those familiar with the matter in hand.

Another year there should be a change—but even then it may be well to retain a portion of the present officials. But, however much we may differ upon these points, there is one upon which we will all agree, or if we do not now, we will in time to come, viz., that in selecting a point so far east for the next convention, a most serious mistake has been made, and unless corrected, so far as the National officers can do so, the results will work a permanent injury to the N. S. A., and what is of vastly more importance, a great hindrance to the cause it represents. Why so egregious a blunder could have been made by the delegates to the recent convention is beyond my comprehension. What would our eastern friends think, or how would they feel, had the western delegates, had they happened to have held a majority of the votes cast, taken the convention to Los Angeles, Cal., San Francisco, or even Seattle, thus compelling eastern delegates to cross the entire continent in order to obtain a hearing?

Washington, D. C., was too far east, and to move to the extreme northeast, looks like a desire to narrow, rather than to broaden the scope of the N. S. A. Allow me to suggest that the Bermuda Islands are not very far from our eastern coast; and then there is Halifax, Nova Scotia. Shall we all "go to Halifax" next year?

I can think of but one parallel, and that is found in our national halls of legislation, where so many of our Congressmen are to be found who have never been west of Chicago, and "govern themselves accordingly." I am in no sense prejudiced against the east. Boston was my former home, but if the N. S. A. is to become national in its character, as its name implies, and as we sincerely hope it may, it must at once recognize the fact that there are thousands of our people west of the Mississippi river. It may be true that a majority of the delegates were from New England, and that the state organizations doing the most effective work are east; and this will continue to be the case, to the end of time, as long as the present policy is in vogue.

In this portion of the vineyard we do not care to deal in proxies. We want an active, living representation and must have it. We are accustomed to long distances, and don't mind a little trip of 2,500 miles to Chicago, Milwaukee, or St. Louis; but when you insist on a trip to New England, we are of the opinion that you don't want us with you overly much. We had rather use the funds in establishing libraries.

Now the National officers may be able, the coming year, to do something towards counteracting this evidently mistaken action; and if, another year, the convention is not called to some more central point (which I sincerely hope will be done), I very sincerely hope a very "unanimous kick" will be registered by the Spiritualists west of the Mississippi. In closing, allow me to call attention to the cogent advice to the young man, needing a change, and say to the N. S. A., "Go west, young man; go west."

Man's Aural Self.

By Charles Dawbarn, of California.

CHAPTER ELEVEN.

Human Immortality.

The writer has been spending his customary hour sitting in the evening silence in the quietude of his own chamber. Throughout his physical form all is harmony. Not an echo reaches brain from any organ demanding attention. The outer world is making no sign, and he realizes that vibrations from his inner center are proclaiming that his manhood far outreaches mortal form. At such an hour, and amid such conditions, Ego pulsates thoughts from his inner life that seek interpretation from Homo as they fall gently on his mortal brain. The training of his childhood never taught him their meaning, so this voice from the silence must find slow interpretation from repeated experiences and mutual contact.

Nothing consciously moves upon the surface, yet intelligence is in activity, pulsating from center to center, and flashing from the inner life. Much of it is, alas! but echo from an unlearned speech; yet ever and anon the rhythm is translatable into thought of earth life. Thus the writer realizes that, for the hour, he is in contact with his inner self, and realizing his own immortality. Not the immortality of mortal form, as vainly sought by beguiled children of earth, but the immortality of Ego, whose destruction would mean that Cosmos was dissolving into nothingness. So there is energy, infinitely tremulous, impressing itself at this hour upon mortal center. That silence in mortal form should permit a voice from the inner center is a revelation of deep import to humanity. It tells a tale, and asserts a truth that man has been long seeking in other channels. Homo has never believed that his passing form was the whole of him. But ignorant of his own inner center, its voice occasionally breaking upon a sensitive ear, has been called God, or at least has been attributed to divine inspiration. He has been told that he must accept human immortality because God has said so in divine revelation. And upon his faith has upgrown a complex system of theology, wielded by priestcraft, which has shaped society to its ends.

Skepticism at last undermined much of the old faith, and threatened a retreat to a mere belief in the sensuous life of mortal manhood, and a denial of a future. Ere the battle was won there appeared the cloudy and confused returns of spirit Homo, called Modern Spiritualism, with just enough of light to demonstrate that Homo was still alive; but with that ray of light came a dark mixture of contradictions, limitations, and self deceptions that for the most part destroyed its value to humanity.

Man lived; but where and how? Answers to the right; answers to the left; answers from above; answers from below; amidst terrible confusion and contradiction by one spirit of the most solemn teachings of another.

Science demands the repetition of phenomena in another laboratory, and with different instruments. Applying this universal rule we call upon the returning spirit to tell his tale through another instrument, and to a different audience. The result is, too often, a general contradiction of his previous teachings. The celebrated guides of the late Stainton Moses, after satisfactory identification through the renowned Mrs. Piper, are preaching entirely new doctrines from old texts. Once again the existence of the inner manhood pertaining to every mortal Homo must be the key to the mystery. Let us learn the lesson.

Homo the mortal represents but one center of every rounded manhood. Ego may be the presiding intelligence in Homo's brain, but away yonder, out in the aura, is a grander center, where Ego reigns with powers hitherto unknown to mortal man. Still Ego is but a single unit, whose powers must blend with those of other units ere creative energy can be developed. But Egos come, and Egos go. They gather their experience and depart, as the physiologist has long proved to the student of mortal form. That means that Homo is only a blended nation of units. All his experiences are national, or we may say personal, but never individual. His memories are all civic; and his actions are for weal or woe to the united body, and not to the individual citizen. As a nation Homo holds other nations to responsibility. He cannot do otherwise, for the Ego unit eludes him every time. It is London warring against Paris; or Berlin with New York. As centers they rise and fall; as individuals their units simply scatter. Such is mortal manhood. That of the aura must be precisely the same, but amidst very different conditions. For the aura is but a continued blending of the units that were in mortal form, each with its own independent energy, substance and intelligence. The units will come and go, precisely as with lesser Ego. It is an aural Homo, whose presiding Ego of to-day may be seeking experiences elsewhere in Cosmos to-morrow.

It is hard to realize that the only affections and experiences men can realize, at least in earth life, are those of form. It is form that we love, and with whom we hold our dearest associations. The memories of form are necessarily civic or national, and never those of Ego, whose stay was probably, at most, but a few months or years. Therefore it does not follow that, because Homo has an aural existence, the same Ego shall be director at each center at the same time. That aural manifestation of intelligence and energy is as much a complete personality as that contained in the mortal form. Its intelligence and energy working together in substance evolve mind. Whether it has a brain, or, like form in lower and higher life, knows without reason, we may not discover in earth life. But when we proceed to make closer comparison we observe that mortal form, with all its energies, disintegrates. It dissolves; disappears. As a nationality it is gone. A question then demands prompt answer. Who has its records which we call its memories?

We have discovered that Nature does not keep cumbrous folios in form that sooner or later will be deserted by fleeing units. Every sensation is itself a record of intelligence, acting upon substance by energy, which produces certain vibrations. That is the record—the only record. Repeat the vibration and you have the memory, apparently through eternity. If the nationality were limited to mortal form that would practically be the philosophy of its entire experiences. But aura must now be taken into account. Aura is receiving impressions from mortal mind at every instant. We see a stranger to whom we have never been introduced. We have never even taken him by the hand, yet his aura, coming in contact with ours, tells the tale of his form life to our form life. Brain contacts with brain through aura. We like and dislike, trust and distrust, without any personal visible contact. We all know that some mortal forms are so sensitive that their personality can reach out into facts, and even names, supposed to be hidden in the most sacred privacy of human life. We certainly need no greater proof that mortal brain is expressing Homo's daily experience out into aura, at least so far as aura can repeat and record its vibrations.

It has never occurred to science to ask the whither of the outpassing unit. That it leaves the mortal form of Homo is the tale of physiology. But where does it go? We see now that it travels inward into the invisible aura. It is real as ever, but vibrating amid conditions impossible to normal sense. And each of the arriving units will bring his own experience, and not that of his fellows. Repeat the vibrations and yonder unit may tell you of heart life. Another and another can echo experiences of various organs within the mortal form. Others, infused with greater intelligence, are bearers of despatches from mortal brain center inward. They have recorded much of national experience as well as that of their own, because such was the province of brain. At the inner center units blend once again into a brain, or its equivalent, capable of directing the energies and intelligence of the aural form.

Aura thus represents the mortal man and something more. Its present individual experiences with other aural forms are necessarily as real as those of Homo mortal with his brother man.

Now we want to mark a distinction in order that we may comprehend a difference. Ego unit is an individual, immortal and eternal in his own right. When unit blends with unit we call the resulting form a personality. This personality is a very different conception from that of individuality, which, we contend, is an attribute of the unit, and not of the form. We know that mortal form is a personality that cannot last longer than its units work harmoniously together. Exactly the same law must apply to aura. It is form, although it is not in shape of mortal Homo. It is composed of units that have experienced mortal life, and are now passing inwards to work under supervision of Ego's grander center. Somewhat of mortal memories are thus carried to and recorded in the inner life, but they are of little moment, like the records of childhood to the developed man. That aura exists after mortal form disappears has gained scientific recognition, under the name of spirit return. Homo in his mortal form disappears. In his own aura he remains as a demonstrated fact. One center disappears, the other remains. The further outreaching of Homo into new and yet more interior centers we leave for future examination. But we find ourselves asking what has become of the experiences of Homo the mortal after he has lost his form? How far is it possible for aural Homo as a nationality to make connection with nationalities still in mortal life?

We here perceive that any such intercourse will still be that of one nation with another, even though one shall be intangible to its fellow. The advanced thinker has been accustomed to realize in the light of spirit experiences that Spirit George Washington and mortal Queen Victoria might possibly make connection. But his thought has been of the immortal President and the mortal Queen as two eternal Egos living amidst different and still physical conditions. When he once realizes that Ego of to-day, in any form, may have gone to-morrow, he has a different problem facing him.

Suppose England were suddenly submerged and to disappear as a factor in mortal life. Could the United States still find means to exchange the old greetings, and recall the old memories, without awakening to life any of the old statesmen who had played the part of citizens deeply interested in their country's welfare? Herein we have a phase of spirit return exactly parallel to that of Homo spirit striving to open communication with Homo mortal. We must force ourselves to realize that spirit return is always a greeting from one nationality to another, and never from Ego to Ego. Ego will be mouthpiece in either case for a passing hour, but his tale of unit life and experience remains perforce untold. It is the experiences of form he is seeking, and therefore the experiences of form are all he brings, whether it be that of the mortal or that of the spirit. It will thus be seen that our present task demands a closer analysis of aura than we have yet attempted.

EYESIGHT RESTORED.

A Wonderful Discovery Which Cures All Afflictions of the Eye Without the Knife.

If you have any affliction of the eyes, be it granulated lids, cataracts, cross eyes or even blindness, you can positively be cured, no matter how hopeless the case may seem, or how many have pronounced it incurable, there is hope for you in a mild medicine method originated by Dr. F. Geo. Curts, whereby you can cure yourself at home. Wm. M. McDowell, Hill City, Graham county, Kan., was cured of blindness, as was Mrs. M. Dugan, 815 Locust street, Dubuque, Iowa; Mrs. C. A. Robinson, Oneada, Kansas, permanently cured of granulated lids. The sixteen-year-old daughter of S. T. Robinson, of Corning, Iowa, was born with cataracts on both eyes; was at school for the blind. Cured in four months. If you are in any way afflicted with eye troubles write to-day and you will receive absolutely free a book giving in detail and with illustrations, the manner in which this eminent scientist has perfected so many seemingly hopeless cures. Dr. F. Geo. Curts, 427 Shukert Bldg., Kansas City, Mo.

THE SPIRITUAL SIGNIFICANCE.

A VERY IMPORTANT WORK.

The Spiritual Significance is by Lilian Whiting, author of "The World Beautiful," "After Her Death," "Kate Field, A Record," "A Study of Elizabeth Barrett Browning," Cloth, $1.00.

Miss Whiting finds the title of her new book in these lines from "Aurora Leigh:"

"If a man could feel
Not one, but every day, feast, fast, and working-day,
The spiritual significance burn through
The hieroglyphic of material shows,
Henceforward he would paint the globe with wings."

The aim of this book is to reveal the curiously close correspondence between the developments of modern science and spiritual laws; to note that new forces, as discovered and applied in wireless telegraphy, are simply laws of an unseen realm into which humanity is rapidly advancing and thus gaining a new environment. From this evolutionary progress, as illustrated by physical science the author of "The World Beautiful" continues the same argument presented in those volumes in a plea that the future life is the continuation and development of our present life in all its faculties and powers, and that the present may be ennobled by the constant sense of the Divine Presence, and a truer knowledge of the nature of man and his relations to God tend to a higher morality and increasing happiness. The book is characterized by the same essential style and qualities that have insured for "The World Beautiful" volumes an almost world-wide popularity.

OTHER BOOKS BY LILIAN WHITING:

Kate Field, A Record. Price $2.

A Study of Elizabeth Barrett Browning. Price $1.25.

The World Beautiful. Three Series. Each $1.

From Dreamland Sent, and Other Poems. $1. These books are for sale at this office.

LISBETH.

An Interesting Story of Two Worlds.

Elevating, Fascinating, Instructive Throughout.

This work by Carrie E. S. Twing is exceptionally interesting. She well says: "These characters which have brought out the highest and lowest in different religious beliefs, have moved me, not I them." The whole book is interesting, fascinating, and instructive. Price $1.00.

STARNOS.

By Dr. Della E. Davis. A rosary of pearls, culled from the works of Andrew Jackson Davis. Intended for the light and solace of every sorrowing and stricken heart. Price 50 cents. For sale at this office.

STRIKE OF A SEX.

By George N. Miller. Dealing with the population question. Paper, 25 cents. For sale at this office.

Discovery of a Lost Trail

BY CHARLES B. NEWCOMB,

Author of "All's Right with the World." Cloth 270 pages. Mr. Newcomb made a distinct success with "All's Right with the World," which continues in the front rank of the Metaphysical books that are now so popular. The great number who have been cheered and strengthened by him will welcome another book by this wise teacher whose words of help are doing so much to make the world better by making men and women better able to understand and enjoy it.

"Discovery of a Lost Trail"

is a simple study of that strange and beautiful thing called life, but grand in its scholarly simplicity. It will be in demand by many who have not previously read metaphysical writings. Price $1.50. For sale at this office.

INVISIBLE HELPERS

A Very Excellent and Comprehensive Work.

One from the Theosophical Standpoint.

This work, "Invisible Helpers," written by C. W. Leadbeater, the remarkable English psychic (whose lectures have graced the columns of The Progressive Thinker), is certainly very interesting and suggestive throughout. It treats of the "Universal Belief in the Invisible Helpers," the "Angel Story," "Work Among the Dead," "What Lies Beyond." The work is neatly bound in cloth, and the price is 55 cents.

..GENERAL SURVEY..

THE SPIRITUALISTIC FIELD—ITS WORKERS, DOINGS, ETC., THE WORLD OVER.

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best subserved thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet we wish it distinctly understood that our space is inadequate to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that The Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy, to insure insertion in the paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that, they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require. Every item sent to us for publication, should contain the full name and address of the writer. We desire to know the source of every item that appears. This rule will be strictly adhered to.

Keep copies of your poems sent to this office, for they will not be returned if we have not space to use them.

Bear in mind that all notices for this page are cut down to suit the space we have to occupy when received.

Take due notice, that all items for this page must be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer. It will not do to say that Secretary or Correspondent writes so and so, without giving the full name and address of the writer. The items of those who do not comply with this request will be cast into the waste basket.

The Philadelphia Inquirer has the following from Connellsville, Pa.: "Paul Zincho, a Slav, last night walked from the second-story window of his home in his sleep, and the twenty-foot fall caused his death. Before dying Zincho said he had a pleasant dream of taking a walk through a delightful park, when the thud of falling awakened him."

D. W. Hull, president of the State Spiritualist Association of Kansas, is arranging a series of appointments in the Eastern part of Kansas, including Beloit, Cawker City, Neodesha, and Kansas City, Mo., and would like to correspond with reference to lecturing and organizing local societies in other localities in Eastern Kansas. Address him at Norton, Kansas.

S. A. Wynkoop speaks favorably of the work of Josephine Ropp in and near Kirklin, Ind. She is a trumpet medium. Bright Star, a little Indian girl, speaks independent from the trumpet.

The papers condemn M. de Lanssan, the French minister of marine, Paris, France, for his order abolishing compulsory attendance at mass on men-of-war. Some time ago M. de Lanssan forbade the draping of naval flags with crepe on Good Friday. His action, however, fills the radicals, socialists, and anti-clericals with joy.

The Cleveland (Ohio) Press has the following from Marion, Ohio: "Engineer John Schindler, who runs an Erie train between Huntington, Ind., and this city, had orders, Friday night, to meet a freight train at Westminster and let it pass him there. He was hurrying to be on time, knowing that if he was a moment late a collision might occur. Just before he reached the switch he slowed down to let a brakeman go ahead and throw the switch. He was impatient, for around a turn, off in the distance, he could see the glare of the headlight on the freight train. As he was chafing at the deliberation of the brakeman, he says he suddenly heard the sound of the switch being turned, looked ahead, and saw that the track was clear for him to move upon the siding. He says no man turned it, and he thinks it was a kind-hearted spook. He ran his train onto the siding and the freight dashed past."

Mr. Bitters, in his paper, Rochester, Ind., says: "So few people seem to be familiar with the life of Joan of Arc, partly because the schools do not teach that part of the history of France and the ministry do not refer to her because of the mysterious work she accomplished. Rev. Mr. Moore, in his discourse last night, proved that had it not been for the generalship of this peasant girl, by which she commanded the entire French army and defeated the British in every battle, America could not have been assisted by the Republic of France and Gen. Lafayette, and without their assistance America could not have gained her independence."

Mrs. Lucy L. Meikel writes as follows of the death of her mother, at Shelbyville, Ind.: "She was a lover of her weekly paper, The Progressive Thinker, and also of her religion. She was a Spiritualist from start to finish. While my heart is sad in her absence, my grief is not deep like others who do not understand death as we Spiritualists do. It is only a birth into a new, better and higher life, and I know, if I give my dear parents and child a chance to return to me in spirit, they will do so."

The Chicago Chronicle says: "Rudolph Votava, 16 years old, paid a fortune teller 50 cents to reveal his future to him. Rudolph was told that he would be arrested within a few hours and sent to prison for five years. Rudolph did not believe all that was told him, but to his surprise, Detectives Alex and Walsh met him on Twenty-second street Sunday evening and Rudolph discovered that the predictions made by the clairvoyant had come true. The boy was taken to the Canalport avenue station and locked up. A month ago he escaped from the Desplaines street police station, where he was under arrest on charges of having stolen brass. The lad is now accused of having broken into the plumbing shop of George Eck, 220 Archer avenue, in company with Emil Benus and Thomas Tetik. Plumbing supplies and other goods to the value of $200 were stolen. It is said the boys admit their guilt."

The Indianapolis (Ind.) News has the following from Anderson, Ind.: "A suit directed by the estate of the late Mrs. Amelia Colby-Luther, of Muncie, against Mrs. Lydia Marks, of Muncie, has been filed in the Madison Circuit Court, on a change of venue from the Delaware Circuit Court. The suit is to recover or set aside a deed said to have been executed by the late Mrs. Luther in favor of Mrs. Marks. It is alleged in the complaint that Mrs. Marks, representing herself as a Spiritualist medium, had undue influence over Mrs. Luther, who for several years was one of the most prominent members of the Indiana Association of Spiritualists. Mrs. Luther owned considerable residence property in Muncie. It is also alleged that Mrs. Luther was living with her daughter, Mrs. Ollie Powell, of Muncie, when Mrs. Marks claimed that a spirit came and advised her to notify Mrs. Luther that she should change her place of residence, and suggested that she live with Mrs. Marks, the medium. The spirit was said to be known as 'Naomi,' and had control over Mrs. Luther, who went to the home of Mrs. Marks, gave her a deed to her property and died. Prior to her residence in Muncie, Mrs. Luther lived, for several years, at Crown Point. The suit is one that will involve the Indiana Association of Spiritualists as a witness. Mrs. Luther's cottage at the camp has been designated as the Luther Memorial, and is in the charge and keeping of the Ladies' Auxiliary of the State Association of Spiritualists."

L. Murphy writes: "A large and appreciative audience listened to a lecture by Dr. P. M. Harmon in the Church of the Spirit Communion, Kenwood Hall, 4308 Cottage Grove avenue, Sunday evening, November 10. The Doctor gave a fine talk, and many said, 'Well, that surely is true Spiritualism.' When learned men talk that way, who would not be interested? His lecture was excellent. Come and hear him. Spirit messages by H. F. Coates were well received. Conference at 3 p. m.; lectures at 8 p. m."

The Baltimore (Md.) World has the following from Ettricks, Va.: "The mysterious murder of Watchman W. T. Westmoreland, at the Pocahontas Cotton Mills here, is still being investigated, and has recently been invested with deeper interest because of the connection of supernatural incidents and the consultation of an occult science to discover the assassins. Westmoreland was foully murdered in the dark while on duty at the Pocahontas Mills a year ago the 13th of October. The friends of their victim still have hope of the apprehension of the murderers. This hope has been brightly rekindled from an unexpected source and in an unusual way. This encouragement is due to dreams, which are very remarkable to say the least. Two different persons living in that immediate neighborhood have, at various times, dreamed of seeing Mr. Westmoreland on the identical spot where he was killed and talked with him about the shooting, and to each one he said there were four persons who lived in Petersburg implicated in the murder, though only one did the fatal firing. Some of Mr. Westmoreland's relatives, it is reported, have consulted a clairvoyant, who said there were four of the murderers, and fully described each."

Wm. Munt, of 92 High street, Brookline, Mass., sends the following: "I would like you to publish a receipt for piles, and that is: White flour in a flat tin pan, and put in the oven until it is a dark brown. Use as a powder for bleeding piles and those that protrude. You will find in the course of a week they will be dried up and back in their place. It is better than all the salves in the market, and yet so simple and harmless. I hope some sufferer may be benefitted by it. I was told of it by a colored gentleman, and it beats them all."

A correspondent writes: "The Brotherhood of Light lodges forming Jehovih's kingdom on earth, appoint EsDay, (March 31, 1848) as the day when the angels of heaven were made known to mortals, and they are commanded (see Oahspe, chap. xvi, page 10), 'to remember this day and keep it holy to the end of the world, for, without books, and without argument, I have proven unto you the continued life of man.' These brotherhoods are found in Chicago, Detroit and other places, and new lodges are being formed. The 'Missing Link in Modern Spiritualism,' now offered from the office of The Progressive Thinker for one dollar per copy, is a complete history of the beginning of the converse of the living with the dead in this country. Do not fail to secure a copy while they last."

Henry H. Warner, lecturer and medium, will serve the Church of the Soul of South Bend, Ind., during November and December, and is open for week evening engagements in vicinity. His address is 515 South Michigan street, South Bend, Ind. The Church of the Soul is chartered by the N. S. A., and is doing good work. They have moved into a new hall in the Torpp block on South Main street, directly opposite the postoffice and the congregations are rapidly increasing in numbers. Mr. Warner's lectures are good and the general comment by the secular press is very favorable.

S. A. Chapman writes: "Mrs. Sarah E. Bromwell, 3310½ Rhodes avenue, president of the National Sunlight Center Club, entertained with a musical and grab bag party for the benefit of same. The president called the meeting to order, and it was requested by the executive board that action should be taken to build an Institute, and a committee was appointed to prepare specifications and drawings for same. Mrs. Bromwell headed the list with five thousand dollars, payable when twenty thousand additional is secured. Seventeen new members were added to the roll of membership. The meeting adjourned to December 12, with best wishes for the success of the Institute. Its objects are Social, Educational, Charitable, Patriotic and Religious."

Mrs. Thos. Barker writes from Bondville, Ill.: "I have been a reader of your valuable paper only six months, and I want to say that it has proved to me a wonderful educator on the subject of immortality. It has helped me in searching for and finding truths, spirit return and communion. I know not what good spirits brought Mrs. Georgia Gladys Cooley to me with The Progressive Thinker, but I wish to return their kindness by sending it to a number of friends."

Mrs. Lizzie F. Baker writes from Baker's Corners, Ind.: "We have for a week past had with us Mrs. Maggie Vestal, of Chesterfield, Ind., a medium for trumpet and independent voices, and who gives light or dark seances as preferred. She has given good satisfaction generally, converting several persons to the beautiful truths of Spiritualism. We have taken The Progressive Thinker for a number of years and think it a grand, good exponent of Spiritualism, as in perusing its columns, we are brought in touch with the various bright lights along the line of work for truth and the uplifting of mortals to a higher plane of life. I have all the eight premium books, which I greatly prize."

Correspondent writes: "The Psychical Research Society held its usual meeting at Lakeside Hall, corner Indiana avenue and 31st street, Sunday. The afternoon was devoted to conference, where all interested in Spiritualism participated. Dr. Freedman, the Australian healer, made a few remarks on 'The Needs of the Hour,' and by request he sang 'Only a Thin Veil Between Us.' There is a good outlook for this society on account of the free Healing. All attending these meetings will receive a free copy of The Progressive Thinker."

D. V. Emmons writes: "Mrs. Marian Carpenter, of Detroit, Mich., and E. E. Carpenter gave us a lecture and tests at Galesburg, Mich., the 8th. She spoke nearly one hour and held the large audience spellbound. The tests were many, both by Mrs. Carpenter and husband, giving full names, dates and many other incidents connected with those from the other side of life."

Mrs. Dr. Edwards writes from Minneapolis, Minn.: "I shall remain in Minneapolis all winter. When I came here in August I only intended remaining a few weeks. I commenced holding meetings every Sunday afternoon and evening at the A. O. U. W. Hall. They were well attended. People here are much interested in Spiritualism. I now hold meetings Sunday, Tuesday and Thursday evenings and circles for phenomena Friday evenings. These are all well attended, and with readings and slate writings during the day I have been very busy. The people seem to be especially interested in slate-writing phenomena. At the Hall the slates are usually about 12 in number, and have been passed around to the audience for inspection, and then placed on top of the table, the medium not touching them, merely holding her hands above them. On several occasions when opened, on every slate was a message, with the name of the recipient; also the names in full in most instances, of the ascended loved ones. All interested in spirit communion are cordially invited to the meetings. The philosophy and phenomena of Spiritualism are demonstrated, and the continuity of life in the beyond proven. My address is No. 6 South 13th street."

Carrie F. Weatherford writes from San Antonio, Texas: "I have lectured for two Sundays for the Spiritualists of tree-embowered, quaint old San Antonio. The interest here is poor owing to previous malfeasance of workers who should have been true. As is usual a few Spiritualists stand at the wheel and many others, though their lives are lightened by the truth which Spiritualism brings, remain on the outside sharing none of the burdens. A wonderful case of development here is that of W. H. Vanriper. For sixteen years this gentleman has held positions of public trust and then in the midst of a busy life his hands began to bring health to others. Insanity and obsession, those terrors of the medical profession, yield to his treatments like magic. Another wonderful development here is of Mrs. Maggie Olive Jordan. One year ago she knew little of these truths and nothing whatever of any phase of journalism. To-day she is the author of three chaste volumes which have had no trouble in finding publishers in London and New York. Not even a college graduate, a young woman and utterly without experience, she yet has achieved, under the inspiration of her spirit guides a most remarkable success, and 'God's Smiles and a Glimpse Into His Face,' 'Ways of the World,' and 'Beautiful Thoughts' are each well worth the attention of readers. I go from here to Galveston for a few weeks."

Thos. Locke, president, writes encouragingly from Philadelphia, Pa.: "The Philadelphia Spiritualists Society commenced its meetings on the first Sunday in September, with Mrs. Minnie Brown, one of our members. She occupied the platform the entire month to the satisfaction of all who attended the services. Her spirit descriptions were so convincing and accurate that they brought joy and hope to many sorrowing souls, and were instrumental in increasing our audiences at each service. We take great pleasure in recommending her to any society that may need her. For the month of October we were especially favored in having that wonderful psychic, Mrs. May S. Pepper, of Providence, Rhode Island. I am proud to say that it was one of the most successful months that we have ever enjoyed. During her entire engagement the hall was crowded to overflowing and hundreds were turned away for want of room to accommodate them. She attracted a large number of strangers who had never attended a spiritual meeting, and gave many of them such convincing proof of immortality and a continuity of life that they have since connected themselves with our society. We have with us this month Mr. Geo. W. Kates and his good wife. They are doing a grand work for the cause and too much cannot be said in their praise. There has never been a time in the history of our society when the people have manifested so much interest in Spiritualism as at present. I am pleased to notice that our audiences are made up of some of the most intelligent people in the city who are anxious to learn more about our grand philosophy. I feel very much encouraged at the outlook of Spiritualism for the future. I know that some of our workers take a pessimistic view of the matter, but I think that the difficulty is owing largely to bad management in our local societies. I feel that in the near future we shall see the good effects of a National organization. Then let us work to bring about that result."

E. W. Sprague and wife, missionaries for the N. S. A., are now at work in Ohio and Indiana. They are meeting with splendid success. Parties wishing their services as speakers and platform test mediums and wishing to organize societies for the study and advancement of the truths of Spiritualism, should write them at once. Parties in Ohio, please address Alliance, Ohio. People from elsewhere, address Rochester, Ind. Their home address is 618 Newland avenue, Jamestown, N. Y. Mail will be forwarded to them from any of these places.

J. A. Parr writes approvingly of the good work done by Harry J. Moore at Frankfort, Ind. He says: "As Mr. Moore has no Sundays open for engagements, we shall try and arrange a series of meetings to take place the last week of November. Surely such lectures as Mr. Moore is capable of delivering will command the attention and respect of the public. Mrs. Alice Gehring is still with us and by her work and also that of Mr. Jessup we have been able to count about five hundred Spiritualists in and about Frankfort."

Hatfield Pettibone writes: "I am located for the present at 2011 Pine street, St. Louis, Mo. I am fast recovering my health, and I trust before many days to have the use of my hands. I know my friends will be glad to hear of my progress."

Correspondent writes from Indianapolis, that over 400 were out to the evening service Sunday, Nov. 10, to listen to the discourse by Rev. J. O. M. Hewitt, and tests by Miss Kopp. The house was packed and people were standing in the halls that lead to the audience room, and many went away because they could not get in.

Edwin Wilder writes as follows to Andrew B. Spinney, M. D.: "I wish to thank you for your contribution to the Prayer Symposium, your plea for the medium, although uneducated, who in the early days accomplished much for our cause and for the phenomena, without which we should have no cause and no need or demand for the pulpiteer or platform speaker. Where would astronomy be without the stars? Geology without the earth's phenomena? Our weather bureau, without wind and storm? The liberal pulpits in our country can do preaching enough. It is the evidence of the continuity of life that thinking people want; evidence of immortality and its attendant manifestations is that for which the world hungers. Why not push Mr. Francis for a symposium by the same contributors, on Phenomena, Its Place and Value? I think our talking would-be leaders need a call down and shown their place. They, in my opinion, have done more to give a quietus and bring coma into our societies than all things else. All good and true things have been, and ever will be counterfeited. No one cares to counterfeit a thing without value. Please hit again, and hit hard, in the same place."

Correspondent writes: "Dr. Louis Schlesinger is in Arkansas City, Kans., exciting a great deal of interest with his tests."

A. Markley writes from Topeka, Kansas: "I desire to say through the columns of The Progressive Thinker, that Spiritualism is not dead in Topeka, Kansas. The Church of Spiritualism is moving along with Emma Chaland as president, and Laura B. Payne as speaker. Mrs. Payne is developing as a platform speaker, and is in demand at a number of places, not only in Kansas but in Missouri, Iowa and Nebraska. She had a call by a society in or near Boston. She spoke at six or eight camp-meetings during the past season. This is the home of Mrs. L. A. Mabee, a forcible speaker. She, too, has been busily engaged in the work all summer and fall; is home now taking a needed rest. Inez Wagner, of our city, has done a grand work through her different phases of mediumship. Her trumpet seances are of a superior order and very satisfactory."

Correspondent writes: "A. A. Shelby, the well-known test and materializing medium, would like a few more engagements in Eastern and Western Pennsylvania. Terms reasonable. Address him at No. 103 East 6th street, Wilmington, Del."

A CALL

For the Annual Executive Meeting of the Illinois Equal Suffrage Association.

Believing that "Governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed," and, that it is our sacred duty to aid in securing "the blessings of life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness" for all (which blessings inhere in the basic principles of equality of opportunity and an inclusive humanitarianism) members of the Illinois Equal Suffrage Association are hereby called to convene in executive session for the discussion of plans for effective action for the promotion of such principles.

The growing sentiment in favor of the enfranchisement of women citizens of the United States, resultant from the marked decrease of crime in the four states where equality of civil right and responsibilities have been secured by women, (notably in Wyoming) is manifest in the special suffrage departments of many organizations, and a special feature of this session will be reports from such co-workers.

Members, resident in remote parts of the state who may be unable to attend this executive session in person, are urged to send written replies to and suggestions upon the following questions:

1. Are the citizens of Illinois, resident in your district, ready to work for the election of representatives to our next Legislature who will agree to take action as to woman's constitutional right to vote for Presidential electors, or in relation to some other form of woman suffrage?

2. Are the people of your district ready to petition for a "Child and Home" department in our Government, through whose agency the constitutions of child labor, the sanitary and other interests of home, may properly be made subjects for the consideration of the Federal Cabinet, the holder of such portfolio to be a woman.

3. How can we co-operate with the teachers in our public schools, in securing the instruction of all children concerning the foundation principles of justice, mercy, truth and love. And how can we best unite with the patriotic citizens who are asking for the use of our public school buildings, when not needed for school purposes, as centers of instruction for the people?

Public sessions, to which all friends are cordially invited, will be held Friday, December 6, 1901, at 2 p. m. and 8 p. m., in the parlors of the Woman's Club, Evanston, Ill. Executive session, Saturday, December 7, at 10 a. m., 1412 Judson avenue.

Among the speakers will be Rev. and Mrs. H. W. Thomas, Rev. Olympia Brown, Mrs. Catharine Waugh McCulloch, Mr. C. O. Boring, and others.

ELIZABETH M. B. HARBERT, President.
S. GRACE NICHOLS, Sec'y.

In the World Celestial.

Is a wonderful book, being the personal experiences of a man whose dead sweetheart, after appearing to him many times etherealized, materialized, and through trance mediums, has him put into a hypnotic trance by spirit scientists, and held in that condition for ten days, which time he spends with her in the Celestial Sphere, and then returns to earth with perfect recollection of what he saw and heard in that realm of the so-called dead. He tells his wonderful story to his friend who gives it to the world in his best style. This friend is Dr. T. A. Bland, the well-known author, scientist and reformer.

This book has a brilliant introduction by that distinguished preacher, Rev. H. W. Thomas, D. D., President of the American Congress of Liberal Religions, who gives it the weight of his unqualified endorsement.

Everybody will be charmed with it, for it is not only a great spiritual book, but a most beautiful love romance of two worlds.

It is printed in elegant style, bound in cloth and gold, and has full page portrait of the angel heroine from a spirit painting, a most lovely picture. Price, $1.00. Sent postpaid on receipt of price. Address the author, Dr. T. A. Bland, 161 South Hoyne avenue, Chicago, Ill.

FREE EXPRESSION.

An Honest Opinion on the Subject of Trickery.

The subject of fraud mediumship is touched upon now and then by our press and platform, but it is usually handled carefully and with gloves on lest the party expressing himself get the name of being a "fraud hunter."

To earn for yourself this name in the ranks of Spiritualism is an awful thing, since all the mediums and mediums' friends in the world will turn against you and that would be a terrible catastrophe.

Now, just why the genuine mediums should object to having the frauds exposed is something I can't understand nor do I believe it is true that they do. It is reasonable to suppose that in this as in everything else only the guilty dodge when the missile of condemnation is hurled.

The atmosphere has been somewhat blue in this place for the past two or three weeks, because the writer discovered fraud in the work of a certain medium and told her about it.

I did not go to others and talk, but told her what I had seen and begged her to keep her work free from deception in every respect. She got angry, told her mediumistic friends about it, denounced me as a fraud hunter and a spy for the N. S. A. (by the way, the frauds hate the N. S. A.), said they would down me and that I would be sorry I ever expressed such a thought. The news seems to have been speedily telegraphed from medium to medium in and around this place as soon as danger was sensed and word has gone round to beware of a certain individual, viz., Laura B. Payne, as she is a "fraud hunter."

Of course in their attempt to shield themselves they are fast hurling epithets and accusations of envy, jealousy, etc., as if any one would be envious of ignorance and fraud.

The danger signal has been sounded and the whole camp is up in arms. So far as my being a fraud hunter is concerned, I have never looked for it, even being, I think now, too credulous as to what was given me as spiritual phenomena, and it was by accident that I discovered fraud in this case, but having seen what I was sure was the most brazen fraud, I watched subsequently to be sure I had not been mistaken. I know I am not, and have said nothing to take back.

Every excuse is made for those who practice fraud, and it is said that once in a while even the best mediums will mix in a little deception with their demonstrations. This may be true but when a medium is fraudulent a part of the time one never knows where the fraud leaves off and the genuine begins. If any one thinks, as has been told, that my motive in watching was other than good, they simply do not know me, that is all.

I am satisfied of the truth of any statements I have made in regard to the circumstances referred to, but am not trying to convince anyone else of the fact. But I have this to say: I will not shield fraud, especially fraud in the fair name of Spiritualism, though the whole world turn against me. Furthermore, if the majority of Spiritualists are going to close their eyes and refuse to see fraud, or when they do see it keep quiet and let it go on, it is only a matter of a few years until Spiritualism will be a synonym for fraud and cunning.

The holy temple of the Highest will be turned into a place of money grabbers and merchandise, while from the altar of the blessed sanctuary of spirit communion will rise not the sweet incense of purity and love, but the stench of lies and deceit.

The proven facts of Spiritualism can never be controverted, and it as a truth must ever exist, but it will be perpetuated under other names than that of Spiritualism if under this name all sorts of fraud are allowed to be carried on.

Truly may it be said they have desecrated the temple of Spiritualism and "turned it into a den of thieves." O, I loathe the thought of practicing for fame or money or for any purpose whatever, fraud in the name of our dear departed, by taking advantage of human love and credulity.

I know that to even ask that a medium sit under test conditions is in many instances sufficient to brand you as an enemy to the cause, they say (in reality only to frauds) and I know that I have already said enough in this article to condemn me, but I just place my hand in the hand Divine that always leads those to victory who are in the right and walk forth to do my duty.

I believe in the power of right to conquer wrong, and believing thus I say let come what will I shall be true to myself, true to the cause of right, and true to God (Good).

I am not afraid, and if all the frauds sailing under the fair white flag of Spiritualism, with all their attendant train of devils should assail me, I know they cannot touch me, for I stand on the mountain of right while they grovel in the dark valley of wrong.

Those who take up the subject of fraud in the ranks of Spiritualism, and stand boldly for its denunciation, may be so few that they will appear lonesome, but when to their number is added the Infinite spirit of right and the holy angels of light this feeble minority swells to a grand majority.

Spiritualism furnishes the richest field for fraud; for what will not a sorrowing mother give to hear from her child, or a husband to hear from wife, child from parent, etc? Thus the heart's deepest, purest emotions are taken advantage of for gain and notoriety.

Such mediumship is a travesty, not only on the sacred office of mediumship, but on human love and the tenderest ties that bind human hearts. It is an insult to intelligence and a malodor in the nostrils of decency and honor. It is hell vomiting its venom over humanity and turning its serpents loose to wind themselves about the unsuspecting and to madly sting those who would banish them.

I say let fraud mediumship be denounced. Let every Spiritualist press and platform proclaim against it, let the thousands of honest Spiritualists throughout the wide domain of Spiritualism raise one tremendous voice against it until it will no more dare show its fiendish face.

When Spiritualism is purged of its frauds and vampires, then will it grow strong as a cause and be enabled to maintain itself as an organization, and not until then.

I dislike to call attention to such unpleasant subjects as this, but deem it a necessity under existing conditions. I have observed fraud more times and in more places than one during my last year's work in the field, and have felt like saying what I have said here, and so have said it and await serenely my condemnation therefor.

The Illinois State Association.

A successful meeting of enduring benefit closed here Sunday evening, the 10th inst., with a large audience present. The Illinois State Association was represented by President and Mrs. Warne, Secretary Johnson, and its resident trustee, Bro. Orrin Merritt. Friends were present from Cortland, Kirkland, Sycamore, DeKalb and Rockford. Brother Wilber Hammond of the latter place aided on the closing evening. Spirit messages by Mrs. Warne or Miss Johnson, or by both, added to the interest of each session. The first one given at the initial meeting, Saturday evening, came through Mrs. Warne to one of two gentlemenly appearing Mormon elders, who have been trying to find proselytes in this vicinity. He frankly acknowledged recognition of the personality described, and manifested genuine interest in the demonstrations. Miss Johnson made many friends by her tests, even those of us previously acquainted with her not knowing, until this meeting of her talent for public work of that kind.

The only disappointment came on Sunday morning, by the failure of two additional workers, who had been announced to arrive, but Mrs. Warne came to the rescue with a most impressive inspirational address. At its close Brother Wm. Wylde, one of our best known townsmen, allowed a Russian-speaking control to come through him. This was a revelation to some of his old friends, as only a few knew of his having such power. When he had finished, a most happy surprise awaited everyone present as Mrs. Warne, under influence, gave the English interpretation of what had just been spoken, and it was truly uplifting in character. We felt that we had, in degree, an illustration of the power of speaking in strange tongues which occurred at Pentecost, with this variation, that then the auditors heard their own languages spoken, while with us the speaker and the interpreter were total strangers to each other, and to the tongue in which the utterance came.

We were cheered by the meeting and proud of the methods of our state workers—Illinois Spiritualists of every city, town and hamlet ought to join hands with our state association, which never flinches under fire and makes so creditable a presentation of our cause Union will give us great impetus. The moral effect of general enrollment under a common banner will carry respectful attention into social, religious and legislative circles.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected. ASPHODEL BLOOMS.

I am now able to inform the subscribers to this long-delayed book of poems, that it will be ready by December 25. It will be beautifully bound, with six full-page, half-tone illustrations, and an elegant gift book for the holidays. The price is $1 postpaid; 75 cents to subscribers. The original announcement, that to subscribers it would be sent, with Mediumship and Its Laws, for $1 postpaid, holds good for all orders sent before December 1. I wish further to thank the numerous friends whose aid so generously given, has enabled me to publish the several works by the subscription plan, and yet more grateful am I for the fraternal words of cheer they have so freely given. It is impossible for me to write a personal response to all, but I assure them that it is not for want of desire to do so.

Student: "Studies in the Outlying Fields of Psychic Science" has been out of print for some time, but a new edition is now prepared, and those who have been disappointed in obtaining it, can now be supplied.

M. M., Doles, Ga.: Q. How was President McKinley received in the spirit world—and his condition?

A. President McKinley became by his intense concentration of thought on the great problems of state which were presented for his solution, exceedingly sensitive to the thoughts of a circle of spirits who were distinguished for their labors in earth life, and by these he was welcomed to his new life. They well knew that the catastrophe would come, and hence were prepared. Otherwise he was received as those less distinguished, by his relatives and friends. For a time he was dazed and did not comprehend; as one in a dream, so strange, so unexpected, so filled with regrets. Yet he soon awoke to a full realization, but not to go away. Heaven to him was by his wife, and will be, perhaps until she enters into his plane of life.—[A spirit message.]

Helene Johnson: Q. Is there any Christian denomination in the United States which forbids its members becoming citizens and voting? I heard this astonishing statement made, but cannot accept it.

A. It is truly astonishing, yet true. The church is the Reformed Presbyterian, an offshoot of the Presbyterian. Its members join it because of their exceeding delicacy of feeling toward God. They object to becoming citizens of this great Republic, because it does not recognize God in its Constitution. This Constitution is hence an immoral document and an insult to God Almighty, by not mentioning him as the source of authority, which it gives to the people. Hence to join this church, one must renounce allegiance to his country, and if he vote he will be at once expelled in disgrace. One of the leading churches of this kind is in Boston, but wherever located they are a blot on the fair page of the intelligence of the present. The preachers are ignorant, the members densely so. Men have a right in this free land to believe as they please; subscribe to any creed or to none, but it is an open question if they have a right to organize under a belief which, if put in practice, would as effectually destroy the government, as the most red anarchist could wish.

Marshall Dervitt: Q. Has one person the power to arouse such evil death-dealing influences against the life and property of another? If so, how is that power produced, and why, if known, can it not be averted?

A. These questions are called out by the recent story, which has been extensively published, of Dr. Fred C. Lemberger, of Louisville, Ky. He attended a child having diphtheria, and insisted in placarding the house. The mother was offended, and gave him the "black curse." He pretended not to care for this curse, yet it evidently annoyed him. He consulted a medium, and then received specifications of what the curse would be. She told him that his horse would die, his colt would die, his dogs would die, and by the ninth day he would be taken.

This all came true. The horse and colt and the dogs sickened and died, and on the evening of the ninth day, while playing cards at his club, the Doctor fell dead from heart failure.

The power of suggestion fully accounts for the death of the doctor. Naturally, superstitious, the vehemence with which the woman pronounced her curse and the apparent confirmation by the death of his animals led directly to to fulfilling of the prophecy.

There can be no "spell" or "curse" that will simply as an influence affect animals. If this be admitted, we at once go back to the reign of witchcraft and the black art, and are lost in delusive fog. We leave reason and science behind, and acknowledge that there are irresponsible forces which may at any time, directed by our enemies, blast and ruin. The history of all such cases shows that the "curse" was followed by active means to bring its accomplishment. Prophecy usually works its own fulfilling. Hence it is that courts of law look with suspicion on those who predict disaster, especially to enemies, holding that if fulfilled it is circumstantial evidence of the guilt of the predicter.

In the case under consideration the report of the newspapers is by no means clear, and the relation between the woman who pronounced the curse and the medium is not stated. At any event the prediction of the medium was widely published, and possibly suggested to the woman the means for revenge.

However, if we are to explain a mysterious occurrence we are bound by the fundamental rules of correct reasoning, to first apply the causes nearest at hand, and only call in the more remote when we find these inadequate. In other words, we must take physical means before spiritual; the known before the less demonstrable. Hence to my understanding the case of Dr. Lemberger does not require "evil influences," or "spells," cast by vindictive hate, but rather an unscrupulous, revengeful person.

E. L. A., Washington, D. C.: Q. Will, as has been advocated, fasting help a person to gain weight and in improving the health physically and mentally?

A. Fasting always reduces the weight. As the waste of the body is supplied by the food, if the food is not sufficient then the previously stored material, especially the fats, supply deficiency. No one ever increased in weight by any other process than assimilation of food. When the digestion has been impaired by too gross eating, or there is a superabundance of flesh, fasting is the best of all remedies to restore health. Then with keener appetite, and thorough digestion there may be rapid increase of weight.

It has been claimed with truth by eminent physiologists and writers on health, that the majority of people eat too much. The organs of the body become thereby sluggish in action and the brain and nervous system fail in the higher efforts. The mind suffers with the body, and the gross feeder becomes a gross thinker, or fails to think. In all such cases a spare diet will restore the normal tone to the system. Rich meats, pastry and condiments which influence the appetite should be discarded for plain bread, fruits and vegetables, with hunger as the only condiment. Then there will be no danger of eating too much.

Such a course is preferable to fasting for a time and then returning to the rich and overabundant foods which caused the trouble.

A Cruel and Heartless Perversion of the Truth.

To the Editor:—Knowing you are for truth and justice, I take the liberty of asking you through the columns of your paper, to help me right a grievous, and I might say, a criminal wrong to a lady friend whom I have known all her life.

She attended Rev. G. V. Cordingley's services, 40 Randolph street, Chicago, Sunday, Nov. 10, and in order to receive a psychometric reading, placed upon the table a gold pin; the design being cat-tail flags and a firefly. His delineation of her character was as follows:

"You are of a very positive nature. God pity the man who would ever marry you! You will cut your way through life, not with a cat-tail flag, but with a cat-o'-nine-tails.

"You are very extravagant, and would use all your husband's money in lavish display, but would never part with a cent of your own, or do a kind act.

"Your mother is in spirit life, died of dropsy," etc., etc.

To the first charges I will say I never knew a more negative person, and her amiability among her hosts of friends is proverbial. She has always been a self-sacrificing person, to make others happy her aim, herself the last consideration in all things. Had she been as thoughtful of herself regarding money matters as she has been of others, she would be in a very different financial condition at the present time.

Both she and I have been investigators for years, and I believe it a great injury to the cause that such spirits are allowed to grossly slander in a public place a timid, sensitive and defenseless woman. As my friend is prostrated by that cruel onslaught, I ask that this letter be published, in order to save other innocent parties from being similarly treated.

The lady's mother is alive and well as usual.

This lady is married to a well-known Chicago business man, and their domestic relations are harmonious.

THE BEAUTIFUL SOUVENIR VOLUME,

By A. LEAH UNDERHILL,
(Of the Fox Family.)

The Missing Link in Modern Spiritualism.

Thirty-three chapters, 477 pages, superbly printed, and bound in colors and gold, 15 illustrations, 5 steel engraved portraits of the celebrated Fox Family, a full page engraving of the old house at Hydesville, which to this day, by the act of its wealthy and respected owner, Artemas Hyde, Esq., bears the inscription, "Here Spiritualism Originated in 1848."

A complete history of the initiation of the movement known as Modern Spiritualism, from the epochal period which dates from March 31, 1848. Since that day, starting from a small country village in western New York, Spiritualism has made its way against tremendous obstacles around the civilized globe.

Only a limited number of copies of this rare book, now out of print, are to be had, and these can be obtained only at this office. Those who remit at once will receive a copy, post paid, at the GREATLY REDUCED PRICE OF $1.

Note.—By failure in 1885 to complete contract with the author, a large portion of the edition was left unbound, and so remained for a number of years, when they were rescued and bound at additional cost, hence this valuable contribution to the cause of Spiritualism was not properly presented to the Spiritualistic public, and a host of investigators have not had the opportunity of securing a copy until the present time. Do not fail to send for a copy at once. J. R. FRANCIS,

FEELING THE SOLVENT OF LIFE'S PROBLEMS.

"If you examine the minds of the people generally, you will find there is not an established that has received its origin in an established fact which is derived from a knowledge of themselves or of anything around them.

"What materials are these ideas which constitute the minds of the people? Are they philosophical facts and conceptions founded on truth? Not a bit. Their ideas consist of nothing but erroneous conceptions, absurd fables, odious lies, grand misconceptions, base prejudices and crazy hallucinations." (W. H. Reed, in Rending the Vail, p. 272.)

The above was written by an eminent thinker before I had written anything on that subject, and which I had not seen. This statement had its rise in his own observation and experience. But few writers are willing to sacrifice their reputation in order to express their convictions, even when they have reached the conclusions not in accordance with public sentiment.

If the reader will examine the first paragraph, he will be convinced of the verity of the author's statement. In the entire range of human interests that are now established, there is not a single one that has truth for its foundation. They are all based on absurdities whose foundation had its rise in erroneous conceptions. These misconceptions had their origin in desires which ignorance and superstition rendered them incapable of being rightly directed, which the intensity of feeling and impatience of ambitious men could not repress. Their feelings outstripped their knowledge, and something must be substituted for it. They could not recognize the relation between cause and effect, because facts were not regarded as factors in the solution of the problems, and mere speculation was resorted to. The interests upon which they were founded being unjust, they had only to be set forth to grow in strength and acceptance by the prestige and authority of the rulers. They were not questioned, because no grounds for questioning were even conceivable. Reverence for authority and established custom crystallized into law, and fear of disobedience, were sufficient to hold the masses in subjection and enable the rulers to profit by these interests.

In modern times attempts are being made to counteract the tendency of these interests; but not having a knowledge of human nature nor of the relations they sustain to their fellow beings and external things, those making such attempts are unable to succeed, since they accept the errors upon which these interests are founded. In speaking of the antagonistic relation of labor and capital, A. P. Stokes, a prominent writer on political economy, says: "A thorough treatise on the relations of labor and capital would require the greatest intellect many years of special and devoted study." One might devote a lifetime without success, because the true factors in the solution are not recognized. However, they are simpler than any political economist has ever conceived. Existing theories of political economy have no basis of truth. That which to right reason is unjust, is to right reason absurd. That the theory of existing land tenures is unjust no one can successfully deny; therefore it is absurd. The control of the volume of currency in circulation by private corporations is unjust, because it enables them to reap profits to which they have no just claim; therefore it is absurd. The ownership of public utilities by individuals or private corporations is unjust, because by means of such ownership they are able to charge for their service all that the traffic will bear. The control of elections by politicians in securing what are known as "the spoils of office," which is the object of all political movements, is unjust and therefore absurd. Those theories being accepted, the solution of the labor problem is impossible of solution.

The same writer continues: "Christian philosophy combined with penal laws can curb the exorbitant and dangerous power of the few." Since Christian philosophy(?) combined with penal laws has been in operation for centuries, why is it that this exorbitant and dangerous power of the few has not been curbed?

The forces (selfish feelings) that gave rise to this power are still operating; and unless the writer can show that they have been eliminated, or at least brought under control, his assertion has no force.

Again he says: "The great body of the workingmen of this country can be free from industrial oppression when they cease selling their votes to political bosses." His solution of the problem goes no further than "can curb" and "can be free"—based on absurdities. The conditions that would make "can" possible, are entirely ignored by this writer, as well as all others that I have seen. They all may struggle with the problem as long as they live, without coming any nearer to a solution than they were when they started. The factors which they ignore are free and equal access to all the bounties of Nature, a free and adequate volume of money in circulation, issued by the government in legal tender paper money, the control of the public service by the people, the election of all public servants by the free suffrages of the people. But these factors would be of no avail so long as prevailing sentiment exists. The love of justice and humanity must prevail.

It is evident to all who think on this subject that "a good government must be founded on good and just principles. These principles must be established facts, derived from a knowledge of man's true nature and the nature of things by which he is surrounded. When the mind of a people consists of principles of Nature, they are capable of constructing and establishing good government of such principles, and then the government established will be more or less perfect." (W. H. Reed, in R. V.)

Instead of Christian philosophy, which is not established even among so-called Christians, we are left to find out what that philosophy is. That it is not what Jesus taught is evident from the fact that "Christians" cannot agree as to what he did teach. That philosophy has for its basis two distinct elements, both of which "Christians" ignore. One is: "Therefore, all things whatsoever you would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them." This is the basis of ethics—the true relation of man to his fellow beings. It is founded on justice; and when this law is obeyed there will be no more ethical problems to solve. There will be no struggles for individual supremacy.

"He that exalteth himself shall be abased," said Jesus; and to emphasize this, he washed the apostles' feet as a token of Christian humility. He instituted no church nor performed any religious ceremonies; he recognized no Sabbath. He dwelt among the lowly, and despised the riches of the high-born. He demanded of his disciples good deeds, as is seen in his answer to the lawyer who asked him what he should do to inherit eternal life. He pointed to the Good Samaritan and said: "Go thou and do likewise."

The philosophy(?) of modern theology is far different from this. The most arrogant dignitaries, the most ambitious in the pursuit of wealth, power and fame, are among the so-called Christians; yet Jesus said that such could in nowise enter into the kingdom of heaven. The entire ecclesiastical plan is for the achievement of ecclesiastical power, supported by wealth and authority. The divine teaching of the humble Nazarene is entirely ignored; and yet Mr. Stokes calls this Christian philosophy!

But this is not enough; it must be combined with penal laws. Penal laws have been in operation since "the memory of man runneth not to the contrary;" and it seems certain that were there any efficacy in them, it would appear. There is no moral element in punishment. It appeals to purely selfish feelings, and only the weak and cowardly are restrained. Prisons are schools of vice. Punishment engenders the worst feelings and discourages all kindly feelings. So much for "Christian philosophy and penal laws to curb exorbitant and dangerous power."

The other element of Jesus' teaching has reference to man's religious nature. "Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth, where moth doth corrupt and thieves break through and steal; but lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth doth corrupt nor thieves break through and steal; for where your treasure is, there will be your heart also."

This richness of life is the religious element. It is clearly shown in Matt. 25:31 and sequel; "Come ye blessed of my Father; inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world; for I was an hungered and ye gave me meat," etc. This religion is founded on love and holds all selfish and sensuous desires under the control and sanction of the moral sentiments and spiritual aspirations; and a righteous concern for the well being of others. The oppression, cruelty, tyranny and hatred manifested among so-called Christians, is indubitable proof that "Christian philosophy" of modern times is no part of what Jesus taught and practiced, but the reverse of it. It will be observed that all these adverse conditions have their rise in feeling.

It is evident that the solution of life's problems is impossible so long as existing conditions remain; and it is incumbent on all who love their fellow men to seek the means by which justice may rule, by which love may abide and liberty be enjoyed by all. We must seek the means on principles that have not yet been recognized, but must be the basis upon which the solution of these problems are founded.

To deal successfully with anything, we must know the nature of it. The problems here involved are dealings with the elements of human nature. The factors which must be employed are within the individual. Since human conduct is a series of activities having their rise in feelings, they must have for their cause a force. Now what is that force? This we must recognize and comprehend. The commonly accepted theory is, that knowledge is that force. For centuries men have accepted the saying of Bacon that "knowledge is power." This acceptance is without any foundation in fact; and moreover, it is productive of great evil. It is not only misleading, but it prevents the solution of the problems sought. This accounts for the fact that while physical science has made rapid progress, ethical science has not kept pace with it. The reason is obvious: that class of feelings that prompts to the pursuit of subsistence and that other class that prompts to the pursuit of more sensuous enjoyment, determine the conduct of the individual, social and national life. These feelings hold supremacy over the moral sentiments and spiritual aspirations.

The motive power that gives rise to human conduct has never been considered as the cause of it. Instead, that consideration has been given to knowledge which is the cognition of the means and method of their application by which the feelings are to be gratified. Thus the underlying factor (the feelings) has been ignored, and the attention is given to the ways and means devised for their gratification.

It will be observed that causes are invisible. In their analysis (so far as we can go) nothing of causes can be known, only by their effects. I drop my pencil on the paper, and ask what made it fall. The boy answers, "Because you let go of it." This satisfies him, but not the man, and he answers, "The force of gravity." All further questions elicit no further answers, because the final answer is beyond human comprehension. Could we reach a higher step, there would be "Alps on Alps arise," to all eternity. But there are proximate causes that are revealed by their effects by an inductive process. These causes are or may be so well known that we can adapt our methods in utilizing them in the gratification of our feelings. But the feelings themselves, being spontaneous, and requiring no voluntary effort to bring them into activity, escape our attention, and our efforts being concentrated on the ways and means for the gratification of feeling, the latter receive no attention. The special consideration is what to do, and how to do it; we do not think of the feelings.

The means deal with the conceptions of external things; the accuracy of the conceptions and the proper application of the means are essential to success. These we call knowledge, and our whole efforts are given to the devising and application of them in securing the object of our endeavors—the satisfaction of our desires, the gratification of our feelings—enjoyment, happiness.

The germs of the feelings are innate and to some extent developed in the new-born child; but as life advances the exercise of the senses develops the feelings as well as the intellect; but the attention being all given to the conception of means and their application, the result is the acceptance of Bacon's saying, "Knowledge is power." To deal successfully with anything, we must deal with its cause. This is why we deal so successfully in matters of physical science; and so unsuccessfully in matters of mental sciences (so-called). In the latter we ignore the cause. The architect, the engineer, the chemist, knows and deals successfully with the cause of his respective undertaking. Not so with the politician, the political economist, the moralist, or the religionist. He ignores causes, and supports as best he can the dogma he accepts.

All life is feeling; it is the basic element of sentient being; all other considerations are subservient to it. Blot feeling out, we are nothing. Then how important—how essential it is to recognize and understand it! The feelings determine and control our lives—wisely if we employ the right means, which requires a right knowledge of ourselves to secure the end of our efforts; unwisely if we misconceive the cause, inevitably resulting in failure, pain, misery.

The feelings act independently of each other, or in harmony as a whole; each has its appropriate stimulus, that is, to arouse it into exercise; for it is by exercise that the feelings grow, are developed, unfolded. In this we see the reason of the great diversity of character. We inherit the germs of the feelings and their predisposition to activity, as is seen in the love of hunting and fishing, which was the dominant feeling in our ancestors. We see it in the dominance of selfish and sensuous desires which was supreme in our ancestors and still persists in us. These feelings were needful to their subsistence and enjoyment; and under proper control, also to ours. Ignorance gives rise to fear, and the manifestation of powers beyond their comprehension aroused in them a desire to placate the being to whom they ascribed these powers. Hence, the religious superstitions that have brought into requisition the vast machinery of ecclesiasticism and its attendant evils.

It is said we are the creatures of environment. This conception is only apparent. Environments are stimuli to which certain feelings respond. Thus they are exercised, grow, develop. In our early ancestors their environments and mental status demanded the method of subsistence by hunting and fishing, and the desire for game and fish was uppermost in their minds; and as a result the love of these pursuits was largely developed. War was a prominent vocation, and the war spirit persists in our day. The love of military display and heroic valor is a prominent characteristic of our people, because this feeling was strong and active in our ancestors.

Feelings that have not had their appropriate stimuli, remain in their germinal state or are but imperfectly developed, and those that have had the most exercise have become the stronger and dominate the weaker feelings. This is the reason of the imperfection of character so prevalent in the world. The characteristics of the Turk are not found in Ireland, nor the tenets of the Buddhists among the Norwegians. In each certain feelings have been persistently exercised, the germ of which found no response in the environments of the others. This exposition explains the origin of the feelings and their functions in the economy of life, and their modification by appropriate stimuli in the solution of life's problems.

One of the greatest difficulties in the advancement of mental science is the non-recognition of the fact that feeling gives rise to the sense of reality without any regard whatever to the character of the feeling. A feeling founded on a fallacy is to him who has it, as clear, vivid and real as any reality, however well founded on truth it may be.

This is a great fact that is not even suspected so far as I know. So long as it is ignored, there is but little hope of peace on earth and good will among men. What one feels to be true, is true to him; for "As a man thinketh in his heart, so he is." The phrase "in his heart," means how he feels. The scriptural meaning of "heart" is feeling. This word appears repeatedly in the scriptures with always the same meaning.

It is strange that this great fact has not been recognized. Its recognition, it seems to me, would open up to the vista of human insight much light, and serve to clear away many obstacles that are barriers to human progress. The golden truth, "Know thyself," is not yet appreciated. To him who truly appreciates it, he would discover the riches it expresses, but to all others, it passes as the idle wind which they respect not.

The two great vital forces in man are the nutritive and nervous forces. These are transferable from one locality in the body to another by the feelings. When I was a youth, I was very fond of hunting. I always noticed that when I approached game, my mouth became very dry. The salivary and other secretions were arrested, and no doubt all the nutritive functions were in like manner arrested. One sitting down to a meal with a good appetite, on receiving a telegram containing very bad news, will lose his appetite. Sudden fright sometimes induces involuntary discharges, and intense feeling often causes fainting, and sometimes even the sight of blood.

What is called "Suggestive Therapeutics" may have its rise in this transfer of feeling; and what is called "the power of thought" is the arousing of another feeling that relieves the former, and apparently gives new life. The failing and drooping spirit that pervaded Napoleon's troops in their retreat from Moscow, is a notable instance of the power of the transfer of feeling. When their decimated ranks were falling from exhaustion and starvation, news came that they were near a place where food and shelter were at hand. All at once they were inspired with new vigor and increased their pace until they reached the place of relief.

Intense feeling often gives rise to physical strength that is beyond one's normal capacity. A woman lying sick on a bed, noticed her child playing near an uncurbed well. In an instant she saw the child fall into it. She instantly sprang from her bed, jumped into the well, seized the child and climbed out of it. Although the well was only eight feet deep, she could not have reached the top in her ordinary state of feeling, even in health.

It is the keen and impressive sense of reality to which feeling gives rise; and when permanent, as in settled opinion, which is usual, such opinion appears so real as to exclude all other sense of reality; and all other conceptions are felt to be fallacies. Argument, reason, and even actual demonstration has no effect. Such feelings become a part of one's mentality, and cannot be surrendered. We have evidence of this in the martyrs who were willing to sacrifice their lives to the conviction of realities they felt.

From the above considerations we have arrived at the following conclusions:

1. In all the interests of life, there is not one founded on a principle of truth, and in consequence the true interests of life are not realized.

2. The means of the realization of these interests are defeated by the acceptance and employment of false and absurd conceptions which exclude the true.

3. The knowledge of the relation between cause and effect is essential in the solution of life's problems. This relation of feeling and conduct has not been recognized and understood.

4. Absolute causes are beyond human conception; we can deal only with proximate causes and adapt the appropriate means to the ends sought.

5. The germs of feeling are innate, subject to development by exercise.

6 All sentient life is feeling; the basic element of our being. Without feeling life is nothing.

7. Feeling is hereditary, or rather the predisposition to it.

8. Feeling gives rise to the sense of reality without any regard to the verity or fallacy that gives rise to the feeling.

9. The vital forces may be transferred from one part of the body to another by the feelings, thus giving rise to different sensations.

10. The feelings being part of the mentality, modified by means of varying environment, cannot be changed by argument, reason, nor even by demonstration. M. J. SAVAGE.

IS YOUR EYESIGHT FAILING

Have You Ever Heard of Actina, the World's Greatest Remedy for Cataracts, Pterygiums and Other Diseases of the Eye?

It's a Perfect Electric Battery That Prevents Blindness.....

Restores Eyesight.... No Cutting, No Drugging, No Risk.....

There is no need to go blind or wear spectacles. No need to drug or have the knife used on the eyes, no matter what form of Disease you have, when you can obtain an "Actina." It cures by absorption—Cataracts, Pterygiums, etc.

"ACTINA" is a marvel of the twentieth century, for by its use the Blind See, Deaf Hear and Catarrh is impossible. Actina is an absolute certainty in the cure of Cataracts, Pterygiums, Granulated Lids, Glaucoma, Amaurosis, Myopia, Presbyopia, Common Sore Eyes or Weakened Vision from any cause. No animal except man wears spectacles. There need not be a spectacle used on the streets of the world and rarely to read with. Street-glasses abandoned. Actina also cures Neuralgia, Headache, Colds, Sore Throat, Bronchitis and Weak Lungs. Actina is not a snuff or lotion, but a Perfect Electric Pocket Battery, usable at all times and in all places, by young or old. The one instrument will cure a whole family of any of the above forms of disease.

CATARRH AND ALL FORMS OF DISEASE OF THE HEAD CURED without the curse of drugs or unnatural butcheries. Call on us or write us about your case and be assured that your eyes may be restored to a perfect condition after all the oculists have failed. "ACTINA" is sent on approval, postpaid.

Prof. Wilson's Magneto-Conservative Appliances

Cure Paralysis, Rheumatism and all Chronic Forms of Disease. These appliances are as puzzling to physicians as is the wonder-working Actina.

RENDING THE VAIL

A Most Remarkable Book Concerning the Existence of Man, and All Things, and All Being

It Was Written by Materialized Forms at the House of J. H. Pratt, Spring Hill, Kansas, William W. Aber Being the Medium.

"Rending the Vail" is pronounced by Col. R. T. Van Horn, of Kansas City, Mo., as a most remarkable work. That Col. Van Horn is fully competent to judge, we will say that he has been a member of congress for four sessions, an editor of a leading daily, and a profound thinker along scientific lines. He says:

"The principal contributors to the book are four in number: Dr. W. H. Reed, who is called the chemical control of the medium; William Denton, Thomas Paine and Michael Faraday. There are numerous others giving a few incidental and mostly personal messages or dissertations on scientific, philosophic, religious, theologic and occult topics—from world-building, the origin of life, or religions, of scientific discovery, and the laws of cosmos or nature—in fact the entire field of human thought. The limitation seemed to be only that of the spectators to ask questions.

"In addition to this mass of messages, there are in the book about sixty illustrations—44 of them portraits. These were drawn by a form standing out in the room at a desk, the form or personality to be sketched at the doorway of the cabinet and the finished picture handed to one of the circle and filed away by the secretary.

"What will attract the attention of even the non-Spiritualist reader is that the topics treated by Prof. Denton, Thomas Paine and Prof. Faraday, are in kind, in thought and style with those to which their active lives in this world were devoted—in literary character as different here as in their works extant on our book-shelves.

"The Spiritualist press and its contributors are just now discussing a number of questions as to the nature of spirit, of spirit return; the want of agreement between those returning as to conditions in their present world; the limitations—that the organism of the medium imposes upon communication, and various kindred questions. All these are treated, some of them very fully, but all rationally understandable. Also phenomena, inspiration and such, to many, knotty subjects, are freely and fully discussed.

"The work is not written by the medium nor by any one connected with the society or circle. All was delivered by personalities distinct from either, written down by the secretary as spoken, or if in writing, filed away. At the next meeting the minutes in full were read, corrected, or criticised by those present and by the authors, and when approved by both laid away for the book.

"The work is unique in the history of spirit communication. Swedenborg, Andrew Jackson Davis, and Maria King wrote under inspiration. Newbrough wrote Oahspe automatically by typewriter. "Rending the Vail" was written and spoken by full-form personalities and is printed as given. One remarkable thing about the writing may not be amiss here. As high as 1,200 words a minute were written by actual timing by the watch.

"It is but just to the secretary to say that his work has been admirably done—not only faithfully and efficiently, but with excellent taste. There are no dogmatic parentheses, no interpolations or ipse dixits of the scribe. He simply states that "a form purporting to be" So-and-So, "appeared and delivered the following"—stating whether it was oral or in writing.

"In reading the book, and I have read it all, this modest, self-retiring, literal rendering of these extraordinary happenings by the secretary has been a source of constant admiration. It adds character to the book and inspires constant confidence in the integrity that from the first page to the last enhances the respect and interest of the reader."

This remarkable book, "Rending the Vail," is for sale at the office of The Progressive Thinker. Price, $2. It is a large volume of 500 pages.

LIFE BEYOND DEATH

Being a Review of

The World's Beliefs on the Subject, a Consideration of Present Conditions of Thought and Feeling,

Leading to the Question as o Whether It Can Be Demonstrated as a Fact.—To Which Is Added an Appendix Containing Some Hints as to Personal Experiences and Opinions.

BY MINOT J. SAVAGE, D. D.

8vo, Cloth, 342 Pages.

After a review of the beliefs held in the past concerning life beyond death, Dr. Savage takes up the present conditions of belief and considers the agnostic reaction from the extreme "other-worldliness" which it replaced, which was in turn followed by the Spiritualistic reaction against agnosticism. He points out the doubts concerning the doctrine of immortality held by the churches and the weakness of the traditional creeds and the loosening of their hold upon the people. He then considers the probabilities of a future life, probabilities which, as he admits, fall short of demonstration. The volume includes a consideration of the work of the Society for Psychical Research and also an appendix giving some of the author's own personal experiences in this line. Dr. Savage holds, as a provisional hypothesis, that continued existence is demonstrated, and that there have been at least some well authenticated communications from persons in the other life. The chief contents of the volume are as follows:

Primitive Ideas—Ethnic Beliefs—The Old Testament and Immortality—Paul's Doctrine of Death and the Other Life—Jesus and Immortality—The Other World and the Middle Ages—Protestant Belief Concerning Death and the Life Beyond—The Agnostic Reaction—The Spiritualistic Reaction—The World's Condition and Needs as to Belief in Immortality—Probabilities Which Fall Short of Demonstration—The Society for Psychical Research and the Immortal Life—Possible Conditions of Another Life—Some Hints as to Personal Experiences and Opinions.

DR. G. E. WATKINS,

The Noted Chronist,

Will on October 15, open his new Boston office, at 1087 Boylston street, where he will be pleased to meet all who may call between the hours of 10 a. m. and 2 p. m. The wonderful work in healing the sick that Dr. Watkins is accomplishing is indeed most astounding; his patients live to testify to his wonderful powers as a healer. For the last year his work has been most wonderful. He says himself that his cures this year have been more than ever before in numbers, as he confined himself to only 30 new patients a month. Dr. Watkins attends personally to each case, and therefore he can do better work than if he had a great many assistants; no staff of visible helpers are in his office to annoy and suggest this and that. He knows what is the trouble with each patient, and knows the right specific to give. He prepares and puts up all of his medicine, and has no help in his medical treatments that is visible help. Write him to-day, and by return mail you will receive the diagnose. No charge made for diagnosing your case. Send age, sex and leading sympton. C. E. BATH, M'gr.

? ARE YOU SICK ?

—IF SO—

Does Your Doctor Understand Your Case?

Are You Getting Better?

If you are not getting better write today to Dr. C. E. WATKINS, Boston, Mass., and write him just your condition financially, and he will make his price for treatment within your reach. He is treating a great many cases free; others he charges a light fee.

He makes no charge whatever for Diagnosis.

If You Are Sick

Why not write him today, and no matter who has failed to help you, to consult him COSTS NOTHING.

Try DR. WATKINS.

Let him diagnose your case, and then it will help you to decide who knows best what is the matter with you. Send all letters to 1087 Boylston St., Boston, Mass.

LOST AND FOUND.

A Successful Search for a Soul.

"Lost—A Soul. The finder will be blessed compatible with the gratification it affords the owner."

Being asked whether I believed in a soul, I answered in the negative. But upon being informed that I possessed one, only that I had not yet found it, I concluded that to possess a thing and not being able to find it, the same must have got astray, had been stolen or was lost. Thus I inserted the aforenamed "ad" in my Life's Journal to await results.

My first experiences which led to reflection on this subject and a cue to the lost article was through a quarrel with another unfortunate like myself.

I was accused of an insinuation which I had never made to my recollection. Trying to think what it might have been, I was sorely puzzled.

My heart was naturally stirred up by the accusation, and my whole consciousness was centered there for the moment. I tried to deny the allegation, but could not pronounce it. Suddenly a thought shot up from my interior being, entering the brain from thence and explained the whole matter.

I had been reminded from the heart of what I had done. My friend was relatively in the right, but had been informed wrongly. Peace was restored.

Now, what puzzled me was the fact of being reminded of the truth from the heart-center instead of the brain. What power was located there that could store up thought—could memorize—could think of me?

I am sure the thought coursed upward—not downward from the brain to the heart. Then I recalled similar events. I had been variously reminded of forgotten duties in the same way.

I asked my first-named companion about it, and he told me very passively that that had been my soul speaking, and if I didn't believe now that I had a soul, I should offer him a theory by which the heart could be made to do our thinking for us, knowing that it had no brain matter.

I made a few suggestions, even employing a little sophistry in so doing, but I seemed to doubt myself.

Then it occurred to me that the feeling of doubt which came in conjunction with the suggestion was a counteracting influence arising from the heart region.

What doubted, was the next question. It certainly was an intelligent impulse that seemed to be controlling my reason—one reasoning power counteracting the other, and almost putting me to shame for my sophistry.

Shame, did I say? Why we might down-face a wrong, but as soon as it touches the heart, we feel sorry. Why is that? The heart-consciousness appears to be a moralizer as well as reminder. Perhaps there is a better man stored within it.

That reminds me of the thing called conscience—also an emotion, impulse or intelligent action of the heart; or soul, if it must be.

I was beginning to believe that I had something down there that was better or higher that I was. Term it what you please, I had found a fact worth studying—a conscious or intelligent life-principle that punished me when wrong, that put me to shame, moralized with me, and, best of all, kept a record of my doings.

That was more than my brain could do. Of course, I could earn a livelihood with the latter; and even that was difficult, considering the many deceptions that one has to circumvent. But many people do not see through these deceptions. I did. I don't know what told me so, but I know it. I suppose I had some of the so-called "woman's wit" about me. But what is that, anyhow? To know and not see is something queer, isn't it? I wonder if the soul has something to do with it? If it can tell me when I am deceiving myself, perhaps it can warn me against others' deception. I've heard people say they knew such things intuitively. I wonder if that is a soul-sense? Probably it is. If the soul can talk it must have sense.

I wondered if intuition was a sense or faculty that could see, feel or hear?

People told me they knew of such things by intuition—they knew what others were saying about them. As I had never heard of a thought being seen or felt, I supposed the soul had a sort of long-ranged hearing apparatus.

I had seen things in my mind's eye that had proved themselves correct. I had also had correct dreams. Perhaps the soul also has the power of vision. But it was strange that all this should have occurred to me after I had found my soul. Was it trying to convert me to a belief in its existence? Or was there a better harmony between us since this discovery? Is that what is called soul communion? If it is, we are always in good company, even when alone. I now say "we," for are not I and my soul one? I hope so; and hope I will never lose it again.

Hope must be another soul-sense for I feel a movement down there; and it makes me think I have found a good friend, who never lets you despair.

If hope is a sense, then fear must be, and a very beneficent one; for an unaccountable fear struck me in presence of an individual on one occasion, and I made haste to get out of his way. I afterwards found out that he was an escaped lunatic that attacked every one with violence who answered his question, "Who am I?" Of course, every one would innocently reply, "I don't know," and that made him violent. My soul feared danger of which I knew not, and, fortunately could impart it to me.

Fear is a good sense to possess under such circumstances; perhaps one of the best, when it makes us fear to do wrong. "In God we trust" might find a good companion in the sentence, "We fear to sin;" for what one fears he really avoids. Resisting temptation undoubtedly has saved more souls than simply trusting in God. The assassin may do the latter; yet it would have been far better for him had he done the former. Cowardice, therefore, is not fear in this sense. Nor is bravery or courage the antithesis of fear; for the most courageous may possess fear, and yet trust in God.

The honest man never fears God. He doesn't need to. He can trust in him. The dishonest one fears him, because he senses danger—the danger of something going wrong with him because he is in the wrong himself. He, too, has a soul, even if he denies it for convenience sake. But that does not allay the sense of conscience. His fear has degenerated into cowardice. The man who fears God must be a coward, and one who fears wrong is the courageous man; for it is that fear which makes him brave enough to trust in God blindly. He will not be led into trouble as a punishment for wrong-doing. An honest God is an honest man's creation. He can afford to trust him. The dishonest one mistrusts him; thus his cowardice.

Perhaps I am swerving from my subject, but I had to stop for a little soul communion by the way. It is such a delightful indulgence that I can't resist the temptation. But it will insist in manifesting once it has been introduced to us, and my fear now is that the soul is going to take the helm some day and run me—just reversing the order of things as they used to be. But why should I object, if it knows so much more than my other half—is so much wiser in all things? Why, it even tells me what to write, and saves me a lot of brain-work. Now, isn't that splendid, as a lady would say? Well, I love the ladies. They all have souls. Since I've known my own soul, I recognize it in other folks. Some, however, don't seem to have any, but all women have—God bless them! And what would we do for love, if it wasn't for them? Have you ever loved? Where did you feel it? In your head or heels? I know you will say in your heart; for that is the only place you could sense love. And if you hadn't a soul there, you couldn't do it, either. That alone ought to convince you. It didn't me, however, until my attention was called to it in this way; and I hope it will convince you now. I am only trying to make you as happy as I am in this conviction. There is nothing to equal it. It is just like having someone to love all the time. My soul and I are good companions—or, I should say my brain and soul are now in harmonious relationship with each other, and therefore the communion. I have found a companion worth associating with, and now advertising the following:

Found.—A Soul. No reward granted, for it was through my own exertion that I found it. I advise all to do likewise. ARTHUR F. MILTON.

PASSED TO SPIRIT LIFE.

Passed to spirit life, from her home in Wonewoc, Wis., October 25, 1901, Mrs. Mary Fisk, aged 65 years. She leaves a husband and three sons and many friends who will long cherish her memory for the good deeds done to those around her. She was an earnest Spiritualist for many years. Services were conducted by Mrs. Edna Ford Pierce. MRS. A. H. WHITNEY.

Passed to spirit life, from Bangor, Mich., Mrs. Lucina N. Flint, aged 87 years. Mrs. Flint was a pioneer Spiritualist. She and her husband, Elisha Flint, became acquainted with the truth of our cause at the very dawn of the movement in 1848. For forty-eight years Mrs. Flint has lived in Edwardsburgh, Mich., from which place her companion passed to the higher life, twenty years ago. She was a loving wife, a true friend and neighbor. She is survived by one brother in a family of eleven, and by an adopted daughter, Mrs. Ellen L. Noyes, of Edwardsburgh. The writer conducted the services at her home in Edwardsburgh, Sunday, Nov. 10, which were attended by a large number of friends and neighbors. HENRY H. WARNER.

Mr. James A. McMillan, of Dalton, Muskegon county, Mich., passed to the higher life, November 5, aged 81 years. Though in his early life a member of the Presbyterian church, Mr. McMillan perceived its errors in mature years, and at once became a Spiritualist, and remained such to the end, with a large grasp of its great benefident facts and principles, and a clear understanding of the phenomena which illustrate them. The funeral discourse was delivered by George B. Holmes, of Grand Rapids, Mich. H.

Passed to spirit life, at Columbus, O., Nov. 4, 1901, Asa W. Towsley, aged 9 years. Master Towsley was a lyceum member of the West Side Spiritualist Church. He was loved and respected by all who knew him. The writer was called to officiate at the funeral. The lyceum children were the pall bearers. FRANK T. RIPLEY.

Passed to spirit life, Nov. 13, 1901, Miss Josie Williamson. Funeral Friday, Nov. 15, at 10 a. m., at the residence of her sister, Mrs. Hock, 15 So. Elizabeth street. Interment at Rosehill. A joint service was conducted by Rev. Dr. Thomas and Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, each speaking in a most impressive and effective manner of the beautiful Christian life of the departed one, which was not broken nor blighted by the death of the mortal body; but unfolded and fitted into a brighter, higher, better, sweeter and more endearing continuity of life. Surely no words could be spoken more truthful, instructive, and comforting to the bereaved. The death of the mortal body took place soon after the midnight hour, and after the body had been laid away in the casket, just before the next midnight hour, her materialized form was plainly seen in an upper chamber, in a beautiful halo of light, and was heard to speak words of comfort to her sister and brother, asking them to be happy. DR. G. A. BISHOP.

Marguerite, the only daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Chas. Utz, passed to spirit life, from the home of her grand parents, Mr. and Mrs. G. Utz, Fulton, Ill., Nov. 10, 1901. She was less than two years old and could speak the English and German language, being unusually bright and intelligent. The parents are avowed Spiritualists. Address by Mrs. J. M. Harvey, Maquoketa, Ia. H. P. H.

TO SPIRITUALISTS.

The Progressive Thinker in its issue of October 26, very kindly printed the address delivered by the undersigned at the N. S. A. annual convention in Washington. Following out a suggestion made to me, I have sent a great many copies of the address to Spiritualists who in turn have passed them out to Liberalists and members of churches. The reports thus far show that the address is going to be an excellent missionary document. Hoping this is true, I have, therefore, concluded to reproduce the address in pamphlet form, and will send to any Spiritualist, without charge, as many copies as he thinks he could use. Please address me at Lima, Ohio. JAMES B. TOWNSEND.

"Wedding Chimes," By Delpha Pearl Hughes. A tasty, beautiful and appropriate wedding souvenir. Contains marriage ceremony, marriage certificate, etc., with choice matter in poetry and prose. Specially designed for the use of the Spiritualist and Liberal ministry.

CURED BY A MIGHTY POWER!

A System of Psychic, Hygienic, and Medical Treatment which Banishes Chronic Diseases.

DESPAIR NOT, THERE IS STILL HOPE FOR YOU.

DR. J. M. PEEBLES.

DR. PEEBLES, the Grand Old Man of Battle Creek, Michigan, so well known throughout the world as an authority on Psychic Phenomena and the application of the Psychic Science in Curing Disease has, with a corps of able assistants, so perfected a system of curing chronic and "incurable" cases that almost every disease known to man yields promptly and permanently when placed in their hands. Do not despair if other physicians and methods have failed in your case for they have on file thousands of letters from patients telling of their wonderful recovery under their care after years of unsuccessful treatment from the best physicians of the world. Geo. H. Weeks, of Cleveland, O., sends heartfelt thanks for restoration to health after suffering from nervous prostration and insomnia for years, he says he now enjoys excellent health and restful sleep every night. Mrs J. A. Rust, of Itasca, Minn. cured of uric acid poisoning in two months' treatment writes, "I am better than in years and each day brings new health and strength. I will refer all sufferers to you." Mary A. Earl, Crawford, Mich., suffering from pronounced female difficulties and kidney disease says: "I took your treatment three months and it has been a success in my case. I am indeed grateful to you for my recovery." C. E. Davis, Woodman, N. H., who suffered all the miseries of a dyspeptic writes that as a result of Dr. Peebles' treatment, he had not missed a meal since last March. D. W. Bridgman, of Del Norte, Col., writing Sept 30, after a three months' course, "When I began treatment with Dr. Peebles' Institute of Health I was a cripple, unable to walk but little with a cane. Now I am able to walk with ease, some days ten or fifteen miles. My general health is excellent. I can hardly find words to express my gratitude as previously I had tried everything I could hear of and got no relief. Mrs. Isaac Varney, Dover, N. H., a sufferer from spinal trouble and nerve exhaustion, writes she would not go back to the state of health she was in before taking this treatment for all the world. Solomon Fried, of Vanderbilt, California, cured of neuralgia and catarrh, says, "I am well and a thousand times obliged to you." If you are in poor health, no matter if you have suffered for years and your case has been pronounced incurable, just write the Doctor a plain, truthful letter, and they will carefully consider the same, giving you a complete diagnosis of your case stating just what may be expected from a course of treatment with them. All sufferers are invited to write them for they wish to prove to all the sick and afflicted that there are no Incurable Diseases, for as the Doctors say: "Every symptom or condition has its cause and when the cause is discovered its removal is easy." They have proven the truth of this statement time and again by diagnosing and curing thousands of cases not understood or cured by the regular practicing physician. They will not only tell you your exact condition but will also give you special advice in your case and valuable literature explaining their wonderful system of home treatment which has cured thousands and thousands numbered among the incurable. It matters not how far distant you live from them their methods will restore you. In perfecting this grand system of treatment the members of this Institute spent over half a century in close study and investigation into all forms of chronic diseases in leading medical institutions of the world; also three journeys have been made around the world to gain along these lines and to add the experiences of the most noted authorities of every land until at last they discovered and perfected a system of Psychic and Home Treatment to such a degree that no matter how far away you may live from them, you may take the treatment and be cured (in the same as if you were to spend hundreds of dollars in going to some sanitarium or to Battle Creek for the Doctor's personal treatment. It is an ideal home treatment that all may take in the privacy of their own homes without the knowledge of anyone. Thousands have taken it and been cured and you can do likewise. The Greatest Discovery of the age in Psychic Treatment. Investigate it and be healed. No matter where you live, for this is positively a home treatment, or what your disease may be or how many have termed it incurable write the Doctors for a complete diagnosis of your case and get their literature explaining fully the wonders of their treatment and also for Dr. Peebles' essay "The Psychic Science in the Art of Healing" explaining fully the wonders of this grand science and Psychic treatment, the greatest power known to man for the relief of suffering and cure of disease. Sit down and WRITE TO-DAY.

It Costs You Absolutely Nothing.

No matter what your trouble is.

There Is Hope for You

In this GRAND SCIENCE!

ENCYCLOPEDIA ... OF ... BIBLICAL SPIRITUALISM ... OR ... A CONCORDANCE

To the principal passages of the Old and New Testament Scriptures which prove or imply Spiritualism;

Together with a brief history of the origin of many of the important books of the Bible.

BY MOSES HULL.

Much that is in this book appeared in an abridged form in a series of nine full pages of THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER. These articles were prepared at the call of hundreds of Spiritualists who felt the need of some kind of document for ready reference. They only seemed to whet the appetite for more; hence the publication of this work.

The author, Moses Hull, has written many volumes on Spiritualistic and other themes and each one is full of careful study on the subject chosen. Mr. Hull, in his introduction of this work says:

"Hoping that this book will serve to lead the people out of the wilderness of doubt and despair; and that when Spiritualism shall have wrested the Bible from its 'sanctified' enemies, it will not 'spike' it, but will use it to batter down the walls of Christian superstition and ignorance, I send it out on its errand of enlightenment with the humble prayer that it will prove a divine benediction to every reader."

THE ENCYCLOPEDIA OF BIBLICAL SPIRITUALISM contains 685 pages, beautifully printed on good paper, contains a full-page portrait of the author, and is handsomely bound in cloth. Every Spiritualist should have this work.

SPIRITUALISM—Progress, the Universal Law of Nature; Thought, the Solvent of Her Problems.—SPIRITUALISM

VOL. 25. CHICAGO, ILL., NOV. 30, 1901. NO. 627.

MRS. PIPER, THE PSYCHIC RESEARCH SOCIETY, AND SPIRIT COMMUNION.

A Discourse through Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, November 3, 1901.

"Now, brethren, concerning Spiritual gifts I would not have you ignorant."

"The most stupendous fact of the 19th century is the fact of Spiritualism if it is true." So said the Rev. Minot J. Savage.

One in India has said: "All truth is eternal; it is only the shadow of time that makes falsehood."

Thirty-five years ago, or more, the Dialectical Society of England, by their report was adverse to psychic phenomena, hypnotism or mesmerism, and every occult manifestation. Bnt a minority report, however, was made, in which Sir William Crookes, then Professor Crookes, Dr. Alfred Russell Wallace and others emphatically asserted the existence of certain phenomena, not only in connection with psychology—mesmerism or hypnotism—but in connection with Modern Spiritualism.

After thirty-five years, Dr. Alfred Russell Wallace said, at the International Conference of Spiritualists in London, in 1898: "I have no reason to change my mind on the subject of Spiritualism. What I believed and knew to be true thirty-five years ago I also know to be true to-day."

After this report the Psychical Research Society of England was formed for the investigation of psychic phenomena. It then announced its determination not to investigate the phenomena of Spiritualism or have anything to do with mediums. But it would endeavor to find out the sources of haunted houses, and various other mysterious phenomena that have filled the world from time immemorial. The exclusion at the beginning of the Spiritualistic phenomena prevented the Psychic Research Society of England from giving the world any enlightenment on those subjects. However, a few of the members made an effort to investigate psychic phenomena. Some time afterward some members of that society considered the investigation of Spiritualism worthy, since Mr. Wallace, Mr. Crookes and others had found it was true many years before.

About a decade of years or so afterward the American Psychic Research Society was formed for the express purpose of investigating the phenomena of Spiritualism and kindred subjects. There were very few scientific men in this society. There were very many liberal clergymen, many men and women of research of well known liberal views, but there were no more than one or two avowed Spiritualists among them. The two Psychic Research Societies finally blended, and Prof. James, of Harvard, Dr. Hodgson, the English representative of the American Psychic Research Society, and Prof. Hyslop, all of whose names you well know, and perhaps half a dozen other well known men connected themselves with the Psychic Research Society. They published their investigations of the last nine years, drawing conclusions that some thought would interest and startle the world, at last accepting—with more or less mental reservation—the facts and, therefore, the conclusions concerning the intercommunion between the two states of existence; establishing the fact of the phenomena of Spiritualism: First, by taking the stand that there are mysterious occult forces and manifestations in existence not usually known in the scientific world. Next, by individually, not collectively, ascribing the phenomena witnessed by them to invisible or unseen agencies.

One of the mediums discovered by the Professors of Harvard and other colleges interested in this research was a Mrs. Piper, living in Cambridge. This "psychic" or "sensitive," as they called her, was the instrument through which their investigations were pursued. Other mediums were rejected, or investigations through their instrumentalities were pursued very slightingly. We know of several instances where Professors of Columbia College, interested in psychic research, were invited to the private house of a prominent Spiritualist of New York City, now deceased, where they witnessed Spiritualistic phenomena, not through the instrumentality of Mrs. Piper, but through another medium. The phenomena witnessed there gave the most conclusive evidence of an outside power, as announced by them.

We also know that Dr. Hodgson had the opportunity of witnessing ordinary slate writing phenomena through the mediumship of Dr. Henry Slade, which he declined, giving as his reason to this same gentleman afterwards, to whose house he was invited to witness the writing; that he had received a letter written automatically through the hand of a friend, telling him that independent slate writing was a fraud. "Well," said the gentleman above alluded to, "do you place that before me as the method in which you investigate these phenomena? Do you want me to understand that you accept automatic writing through the hand of a friend as scientific evidence that the slate writing in the presence of Dr. Henry Slade was not true?" Of course Dr. Hodgson had no answer. It was beyond any shadow of a doubt that he accepted the message written automatically through the hand of his friend as coming from an authoritative source.

Mrs. Piper has been the—medium, we say—"psychic" through whom these investigations of the Psychic Research Society have been pursued for the period of nine years. Before that time Mrs. Piper was an humble medium, giving messages to people from their departed friends. Convincing many, as she herself affirmed, that they received those messages from their departed friends, giving them much comfort and consolation. After she became engaged to give manifestations to the Psychic Research Society she ceased to give messages to other people, reserving herself and her powers exclusively for this investigation.

You know, to some considerable extent, the result by what has appeared from time to time in the various articles published in the public press: That the consensus of opinion of all was, that Mrs. Piper was honest, that her powers were outside of her own ability to control, that the manifestations were not of such a nature as she could herself create. Several of these gentlemen have arrived at the conclusion that separate indentities of individuals, having once lived upon the earth, were the source and cause of the manifestations, and have so announced. Some of them having reasonable doubts concerning the personal identity of the communicating intelligences. Others are fully convinced of, and have testified to the facts occurring in the presence of Mrs. Piper. That she, herself, was not only unconscious of what she did, but of the essential source of the manifestations.

Many people in the world of liberal thought have supposed that this investigation of the Psychic Research Society would establish beyond the shadow of a doubt whether there is any truth in the Spiritualistic or kindred phenomena; whether there were any facts to be relied upon as demonstrating spirit existence, and the intercommunication between the two states. In fact, the very enthusiastic secretary of the American Psychic Research Society said to your speaker: "Why! the whole world will be compelled to admit immortality by the evidence of the Psychic Research Society." Your speaker said to him: "Did the whole world admit it when Mr. Crookes, Mr. Wallace, Mr. Flammarion and a score of other scientific men investigated the phenomena just as carefully and announced their acceptance of the facts of spirit phenomena, and of the conclusions that they arrived at from those facts?" "Oh, no! Their investigation was not so thorough." "Why not? Mr. Crookes had a medium in his own house for three years, surrounding her with the very best of conditions, and in his own family made these investigations, and published the results to the world. And these facts have never been controverted. What other facts except added facts can the Psychic Research Society offer?"

More testimony of the same kind is valuable because it not only adds to the sum total of the evidence in the world, but it adds to the enlightenment of the gentlemen interested; and the one great thing in this psychic research investigation is, that these gentlemen have become enlightened, and because—with all due deference to the Psychic Research Society—it is not always that scientific gentlemen are capable of being enlightened in the domain of that with which they are not familiar.

A man who has made a life-long study of astronomy is not supposed to be the most capable one to determine the value of an experiment in chemistry. We have yet to learn that professors in universities are any better capable of observing ordinary facts in life than other intelligent human beings. Even expert testimony in courts of justice is often most fallacious. It is found that in matters pertaining to the welfare and intelligence of the whole human race, that the most intelligent of the human race have never followed any especial line of study, any particular branch of investigation, but, on the other hand, are open to the evidence that is general and universal.

It was admitted by Mr. Crookes, Mr. Wallace and Mr. Varley that there was no scientific value to any knowledge of chemistry that one could have in the investigation of these phenomena. It was also admitted by Mr. Varley, who was an electrician (one of the electricians connected with the laying of the Atlantic cable), that there was no electrical power employed in the manifestations of Modern Spiritualism. Mr. Crookes and Mr. Varley experimented in the presence of their medium with an electrometer, and the electromenter gave no indication that any electrical force was employed by the invisible agencies in producing the phenomena of Spiritualism. Various other things were discovered and proven, and Mr. Crookes arrived at the conclusion that no other than the source claimed for the phenomena could possibly be that source. Mr. Wallace had just as conclusive evidence in similar incidents. If Dr. Hodgson has arrived at the conclusion that the phenomena are the result of invisible intelligences communicating, that is precisely what occurred in connection with Mr. Crookes, Mr. Wallace and others.

Now if the Psychic Research Society were to demonstrate beyond the possibility of a doubt that which millions of human beings already know, it would only be valuable to those who did not know it before. Certainly it could not make any more valuable the facts and the knowledge that these millions of people had before.

Spiritualism as a movement, did not depend upon the Psychic Research Society. Mrs. Piper's mediumship, or occult powers, did not depend upon the Psychic Research Society. They came to her previously to her engagement by that society. They found her, as a society, in the possession of these gifts; the gifts were not regulated by them; the gifts were not the result of their investigations, but came, a priori, from a source which the Psychic Research Society did not know, and manifested in the presence of these gentlemen, who condescendingly vouchsafed to investigate what had been a comfort to the mourner. To establish the existence of spirit life beyond the change called death, to bind up the broken hearted was nothing to those scientific men. They wanted to begin at the other end; they wanted to begin with the facts, the external facts and work their way to the cause if they could.

Mrs. Piper for nine years, therefore, was held by them for the purpose of this investigation, with the results already stated at the end of that time. Other mediums, the general phenomena of Spiritualism, and the great movement of Spiritualism that is in the world had been entirely ignored by them. They arrived at conclusions, and published those conclusions with more or less certainty accepting the facts as established.

Now the interesting part of this is, that if they had taken the trouble to speak about those mourners having been comforted, and the evidence they had of personal identity they could have arrived at the same conclusion in the beginning that they arrived at after witnessing so many facts: The conclusion that an outside influence produced the manifestations given in the presence of Mrs. Piper. Mrs. Piper is said to have made a "confession." She does not say that she is a fraud; she does not say that she, herself, was aware of making the manifestations. She merely says she was tired of being dominated by a power outside of herself, and at being dominated by the Psychic Research Society. Perhaps they were tired of her before she was of them. That does not matter. Then Mrs. Piper proceeds to give her own opinion concerning the causes of the manifestations given through her. Which scientific graduate led her into an opinion of her own? Was the thought borrowed from Dr. Hodgson or was some other idea dominating her when she was in an unconscious state and gave the manifestations? Those gentlemen ought to know what influence was dominating her. That is all there is of it. If the members of the Psychic Research Society predicate their testimony, not upon what Mrs. Piper said or did, but upon what came through her, they are just as sure of the facts as they were before; and undoubtedly they will say so, if there is any value in their investigation. But the curious psychological study is, that Mrs. Piper gives as the source of the manifestations that which must require more proof to establish its existence than the fact of spirit communion.

This "subliminal" consciousness that people who love new words are so fond of glibly quoting, has yet to be established. The intercommunion between mind and mind has long been known. That which is called telepathy (psychological sympathy) has been known for years as have Mesmerism and Psychology, now called hypnotism, and was established by Mesmer more than a century ago. But the psychological statement is: If Mrs. Piper was honest; if Mrs. Piper did not make these manifestations, why should her "subliminal self" tell a falsehood? From whence did her "subliminal self" inherit falsehood? Why an intelligence, purporting to have lived upon the earth, and revealing a personal identity, should communicate through her as the result of her "subliminal self," she herself being truthful! This is a terrible revealment. If people's "subliminal selves" are to tell falsehoods, are to claim to be departed spirits, are to give evidence of the identity of departed spirits, and they themselves are honest, then undoubtedly the "subliminal self" is a thing to be avoided. Just think of what might become of an ordinary individual, honest, upright, sincere, if way down deep there is this "subliminal self," that will lie, cheat, assume to be departed friends and able to establish their identity! Lucifer, himself, is nothing to what a human being might be capable of.

All this weak statement is called a "confession," and is expected to startle, or jar, or affect in some way the great psychical facts that are going on in the world to-day. Perhaps Mrs. Piper is human, like some other people, and is aware that the Psychic Research Society may be investigating through some other "sensitive," and she wishes, for the time being, to throw a cloud of doubt on all these investigations.

She does not say whether it is herself as Mrs. Piper or whether it is her "subliminal self" that has made this statement which appears in the public press. It does not seem to have come from an illiterate, uneducated woman. Perhaps the reporter might have supplied some of the ideas or words. We know that newspaper articles are not always reliable, or even sworn statements. We understand very well, however, that Mrs. Piper is either driven to the statement that this "subliminal self" is capable of impersonating departed spirits, giving evidence of personal identity and making a statement of falsehood for other reasons than to advance the theory of "subliminal self," or that what she has been reported as saying is not true. In either case her testimony is invalidated. She has thrown doubt on herself as a witness.

All the conclusion we can arrive at is, that Mrs. Piper, having been a good medium, was employed too long by the Psychic Research Society; that the psychological conditions were worn out, and evidently, we will say. We do not wonder; when a gift comes unsummoned, manifesting a certain power for a certain purpose, and that gift is utilized for some other purpose not intended primarily, and when that other purpose is not the binding up of broken hearts, not consolation to those seeking consolation, not a comfort to the mourner, but the satisfaction of professors of colleges and scientific men, we do not wonder that the "psychic" becomes weary and that the conditions of the manifestations cease to be satisfactory to one or both.

Perhaps the value of this movement is in the fact, that it came unsummoned, that its manifestations are among the lowly as well as the exalted, that while scientific men may investigate it, it does not conform to their conditions or their terms, it makes them conform to its terms, just as astronomy, chemistry and every other pursuit does. Does any man bring the stars down to investigate them, excepting by that which enables sight to also confirm his mathematics? No man expects the laboratory to do other than respond to the laws of chemistry in nature. Spiritual subjects must be governed by spiritual laws, and that investigator who would be true and sincere must place himself in harmony with those laws; and while every test, as far as tests can be applied, of the honesty of the medium is concerned—(that subject of honesty should be beyond the question and the distrust of it), there should simply be the fact emanating from this source, and the scientific man should endeavor to adapt himself to the methods of the facts. We presume the Psychic Research Society did so, as far as it was in their power, not knowing and not understanding spiritual laws.

But the ethical problem connected with this is, that there can be no purely scientific investigation of spiritual manifestations. Mr. Wallace, Mr. Crookes, Mr. Varley, Prof. Mapes, Prof. Hare all agreed that these manifestations were in a realm that science has not penetrated, are in conformance to laws or intentions with which science is unfamiliar. And after applying all scientific tests Mr. Crookes said that he was totally unable to explain in any domain of science the results of his investigations, and he was constrained to accept the one fact of spirit communion.

If the Psychic Research Society was wiped out of existence, if Mrs. Piper had never been, the manifestations in the world are adequate to satisfy the most obdurate and caviling minds. The spiritual power because of spiritual intuition, premonition and vision, all that belongs to that realm invisible, is now impinging upon the thinking human life, and more and more the human mind is becoming quickened and entering into the inheritance of this spiritual and intuitive realm. Therefore science must make haste or she will be too late to record that which is already known.

As said before most of the human family has a creed. Spiritualists are not governed by "belief." As a class Spiritualists are not in the realm or region of believers; theirs is not the religion of "faith," unless you take the revised edition of the New Testament with Paul's definition of faith. Theirs is knowledge; it is a knowledge that is twofold; knowledge that appeals to the external judgment and knowledge, also, that comes from within, if you choose the a priori argument, knowledge by intuition, Spiritualists have this. If you choose that of manifestation and demonstration, proving the intuitions true Spiritualists have this and both. In the great realm of phenomena there may be those who assume that all the manifestations may be produced by prestidigitators and tricksters. The facts of Spiritualism preclude the possibility of any such explanation. There are no imitations of that which does not exist; there is no coin counterfeited that is not in existence. It would be folly for a counterfeiter to place upon any money market the imitation of a bank note when no such bank existed. Therefore, that which is known in this realm has been known for the last fifty years and constitutes a sum total a thousand times greater than the evidence upon which the Psychic Research Society, in its isolated case of Mrs. Piper, has based the conclusions that it has arrived at.

Spirit communion bears its own testimony. Messages proving the identity of those who have passed from the earth have been given in millions of cases. If you are across the ocean and receive a message by cable, it is the nature of the message that determines its authorship. If it be by certain signs, signals or characters which can come only from the source it claims, you know it. If you are in your business office and receive a telegram there are certain ways by which you know the identity of the one giving you the telegraphic message. The whole world is not busy sending false telegrams or cablegrams. In the spirit realms the laws of entity and identity are the same, your spirit friends, making due allowance for interrupted and disturbed psychological conditions, can give proof of their identity as well as your friends in foreign lands, and they do this; each message forms a portion of the great evidences of Spiritualism that roll themselves up into the grand testimony concerning spirit life.

The one little weak piping of this Mrs. Piper will make no difference in this great wave of testimony. What it will do, will be to probably enlarge the research of those professors who have been so narrow as to confine themselves to one "psychic" instrument and make them realize that there are "more things in heaven and earth than are dreamed of" in their present philosophy, and that this movement is creeping into and through all departments of life.

Spiritual truth being admitted, spirit life being admitted, all that the spirit realm can do, availing itself of the difficult conditions of human life, is to impress upon human minds, and stamp upon the human intellect, and as far as possible control physical substance, to make you know that fact. We do not wonder that there was weariness and almost stultification in Mrs. Piper. Everything responds to the demand, the demand for comfort, for consolation, for evidence is from hearts that are hungry, that are lonely, that require the evidence that their dead still live and can come and talk to them. So when any medium, developed by the unseen world to give such evidence to human life, is taken possession of by any set of men or society in order that the facts may be investigated, not from the standpoint of the great human need, but as a butterfly, as a bug or any other thing would be investigated, it ceases to fulfill the object for which it was intended.

If there is that which is beyond science, and there is the great realm of super-consciousness in human existence, that realm can take possession of science, can make science its hand-maiden. But the realm of the spirit is not to be ignored; intuition, perception of the spirit, spiritual gifts, all belong to that domain, and can no more be classified and postulated than can the wellsprings of human life. Science must go to the foundations of spiritual truth.

The manifestations and spiritual communion will go on enlivening hearts, chasing away the shadows, giving comfort to the mourner, upbuilding in human existence the great superstructure of immortality, even without Mrs. Piper and the Psychic Research Society. They may come into this temple already in existence, where the great, and the wise, and the good, where prophets, seers and sages have stood forever. Of which Tennyson wrote:

"How pure in heart and sound in head,
With what divine affections bold
Must be the man whose thoughts would hold
An hour's communion with the dead!"

Did they go with such thoughts? were they inspired by such aspirations? Or as Longfellow pictured in that beautiful hymn that you sing:

"Then the forms of the departed
Enter at the open door,
The beloved, the true hearted
Come to visit me once more."

Be sure that it is the realm by the too often "unfrequented door" where, perhaps, the briars and thorns of material life have overgrown it, where, perhaps, the dull, uninspired intellects have cast a cloud. That unfrequented door is the gateway to the immortal realm, and Spiritualism has thrown it wide open, has given to you the message, has revealed to you the knowledge, that if you are not coming in by this open door, then you may seek it by such devious ways and paths as are offered by the Psychic Research Society. But even then you will stand by the gateway and behold that all those whom you have denied have been waiting for you in that unseen yet palpable realm.

Here and now the voices of the spirits plead to you from out that inner realm which you have so long neglected, and ask you to seek and you shall surely find this knowledge of life immortal.

The Resurrection Bone.

Throughout the middle ages it was believed that there exists in man a bone imponderable; incorruptible, incombustible, the necessary nucleus of the resurrection body. Belief in a resurrection of the physical body, despite St. Paul's Epistle to the Corinthians, had been incorporated into the formula made many centuries after his time and called the Apostles' Creed, and was held throughout Christendom, "always, everywhere, and by all." This hypothetical bone was therefore held in great veneration, and many anatomists sought to discover it; but Vesalius, revealing so much else, did not find it, and was therefore suspected of a want of proper faith. He contented himself with saying that he left the question regarding the existence of such a bone to the theologians. He could not lie, he did not wish to fight the Inquisition, and thus he fell under suspicion. The strength of this theological point may be judged from the fact that no less eminent a surgeon than Riolan consulted the executioner to find out whether, when he burned a criminal, all the parts were consumed; and only then was the answer received which fatally undermined this superstition. Still, in 1689 we find it still lingering in France, creating an energetic opposition in the church to dissection. Even as late as the eighteenth century, Bernouilli having shown that the living human body constantly undergoes a series of changes, so that all its particles are renewed in a given number of years, so much ill feeling was drawn upon him, especially from the theologians, who saw in this statement danger to the doctrine of the resurrection of the body, that for the sake of peace he struck out his argument on this subject from his works.—Popular Science Monthly.

FRIENDLY ADVICE.

With an Account of Personal Experience.

To the Editor:—At this progressive age the progressive people of the progressive countries of the world are becoming more enlightened each year on the subject of life here and hereafter, and the angel world is determined, it seems, to lift from creedal bondage myriads of the inhabitants of earth, their loved ones, who still persist in holding to orthodox teachings, or obeying priestly dictates throughout the civilized countries of the world.

Since the advent of the rappings at Hydesville, the Fox sisters being the chosen instruments, mediumship has developed all over the country and the cause of truth rapidly spread from America to European countries. From the tiny rap came audible voices, independent letter and slate writing, materialization in full form; clairvoyance, clairaudience, the controlling of a mortal's brain, through whose instrumentality lectures that were grand, enlightening and inspiring have time and again been delivered. Portrait painting and many other phases of mediumship too numerous to mention have developed since the first tiny raps at Hydesville.

Yet with all of these phenomena and inspirations having been witnessed or listened to by level-headed people, men and women of sound and well-balanced minds, and the facts heralded to the world through both the Spiritualist and secular press, many intelligent people, as a result of early and erroneous teaching, still refuse to devote a little of their time to investigate the truth of these wonderful phenomena and the source from which they come, and which, as well, the spirit world brought about for the purpose of enlightening the inhabitants of earth, putting them on the right road, to teach them how to live while here, and to prepare them for the future or higher life.

While some of the manifestations the writer has witnessed in the seance-room were, to his mind, not genuine spirit manifestations, he has seen enough of the genuine, under strict test conditions as well, that demonstrated to him that while there is a counterfeit there is also a genuine, and with your permission, Mr. Editor, I will mention a few of my experiences in my investigations of spirit presence, control and manifestations. But before doing so it might be well for me to mention something of my early training. My mother, father and large circle of relations were, with one exception, members of some one of the various orthodox churches, therefore I of course had to go to Sunday-school and attend church, but young as I was, to me, there was something lacking in the Christian religion, something that did not fill the bill for me. As time rolled on I had an opportunity to attend a seance while in the city of Louisville, Ky. At this seance, which was a trumpet seance, I received undeniable evidence of spirit presence and communion, and as a result new thoughts, new ideas, in fact, a new world was opened up to me. This transpired back in the year 1874 between Christmas and New Year.

Since that winter and wintry night, for I remember distinctly that it was quite cold, I have witnessed manifestations in the seance-room that were so strong and convincing that no reasonable and reasoning mind could for a moment doubt the truth of spirit return and manifestation, manifestation in not one way alone but in many ways, such as our spirit friends talking and being distinctly heard through the use of a trumpet to magnify sound, also independently, without the use of a trumpet; materialization of hands, also in full form; automatic and independent slate and letter writing, portraits of departed loved ones being drawn or painted between closed slates while I held the slates in my own hands, never letting them get away from me, in broad daylight and under conditions that precluded any possibility of fraud. Each message was personal and characteristic of the spirit friend or relation who gave it. The slate-writing proof was had through the mediumship of Mr. P. L. O. Keeler. Through automatic writing, F. Corden White being the medium, I have received page after page of loving messages directed to myself and other loved ones. Through sitting with D. A. Herrick, also with Charles J. Barnes and other good trumpet mediums, I have talked many a time with my father, mother and other members of our family. As a result of attending seances held by Mrs. M. Kemp, Mrs. Effie Moss and others, I have met face to face and conversed with a number of my arisen dear ones, five of whom came to me at one and the same time at a seance held by Mrs. Kemp, of Cleveland, Ohio, and three out of the five came out of the cabinet into the middle of the room with me under a good light, and were plainly seen by the ladies and gentlemen present. What more could or should a sane mind ask for to prove continuity of life and spirit presence and communion with loved ones of earth?

That which Spiritualism has done for me, can likewise be done for you, reader. First, if you are not a Spiritualist, subscribe for some one of the papers published in the interests of Spiritualism, and there is none better than The Progressive Thinker, then read it since you will find much good information and many grand truths and elevating thoughts contained therein. Attend lectures and seances and as a result your spirit friends will be with you and the door to eternal wisdom will open unto you, bringing with it light, joy and knowledge to be found in no other religion. "Seek and ye shall find." "Knock and the door will open unto you." E. R. KIDD.

DISPUTANTS:

REV. MOSES HULL,

President New York State Spiritualists' Association, Headquarters, Buffalo, N. Y.

—AND—

W. F. JAMIESON,

Secretary National Liberal League, Headquarters, Cincinnati, Ohio.

PROPOSITION:

Resolved, That the phenomena and philosophy of Modern Spiritualism prove that departed spirits can communicate with mankind.

MR. JAMIESON'S SECOND SPEECH.

According to my friend's argument, devils, witches, satyrs, mermaids, vampires, are all reasonable beliefs and are proofs of Spiritualism! Talk about logic after that.

Spiritualism, it is said, came to the world to give direct proof that spirits exist and communicate. It appears, from the account given of Madame Hauffe, that spirits are greatly interested in furnishing information about property. Cannot human beings attend to property matters without let or hindrance from the "other side"? If they exist, and have the power represented, however, they ought to be impartial. If the theory were true, there would not be a single sorrowing heart, not one poverty-stricken mortal; but the bruised, crushed, broken-hearted would all obtain help from a spirit world. Think of the millions of treasure sunk in the sea. Why do not the spirits make themselves useful? Stop looking for lost papers for the Madame Hauffes; stop passing solid bodies through solid walls long enough to fish up trillions of treasure from the bottom of the ocean, with which to build homes for the destitute, and a spiritual temple for yourselves.

Too bad that this wonderful spirit power through a Swedenborg and a Madame Hauffe should be so rare that we have to take the stories whole, like Gulliver's Travels. Spirits could give information about a "silver service;" but on the great questions of the living present not a ray of light comes from the spirit world. Let us have present-day revelations—if you have them.

How easy it is for my friend to believe all those stories—there is no end to credulity when we begin to do that. A thousand frauds or failures, he says, will not explain them away—but Spiritualism is saturated with fraud. Spiritualists confess it, my friend admits it. A thousand frauds, he says, do not destroy one genuine; but where is the genuine? If a man lies to you a thousand times you are suspicious of him when he tells the truth once. Worse: If you discover that a man lies once you doubt him though he tells you the truth a hundred times.

One can hardly tell whether Brother Hull is in favor of debate or not. He is, and he isn't. He is willing to take the time of Christian builders, but I should not take his time; yet he has challenged me to four debates. "Barkis is willin.'"

My brother used to be such a valiant advocate of free discussion. Now it is a "little tedious" to hear "liberty" defended. He spends his life talking Spiritualism. I prefer the gospel of liberty, the best gospel on earth. Could we have true liberty, peace would follow, despotism vanish, and we could afford to let a spirit world alone until it would gain sense enough to converse intelligently.

I have "nothing to sustain," he says. I have the simple truth to sustain. It has come to pass in these days that if a man does not wear somebody's sectarian collar, or nurse a sickly superstition he has nothing to sustain!

Spiritualists cannot stop their "great work" to amuse me. Their great work consists in sitting in circles, singing "Sweet Bye and Bye," imagining they receive messages from supernal spheres.

What have they "built?" Where are their libraries? Charitable institutions? Their universities? The Materialists make a better showing. They have a university in Oregon in which $2,000 of my money—all I had in the world—not voluntarily, but through over-confidence in a friend, was all swept into that Liberal University.

Moses Hull:—"I have seen that university. The whole thing is not worth two thousand dollars."

Mr. Jamieson:—Away goes my investment. I need money more than universities. My wife says that institution will never prosper. It ought to be just.

You now boast that Spiritualists will not listen to me, yet you have always condemned the bigotry of Christians for not listening to you. Nevertheless, in spite of the unwillingness of Spiritualists to hear the other side, I have had crowded audiences in scores of villages and cities.

But I thought my friend Hull cared more for truth than a large following. Go to any cathedral if you want to see a multitude. Usually, truth is not found where millions bow. How much "following" did Galileo have? And even John Milton, the grandest poet the world ever knew. It is the priests who get "followers." Does Brother Hull yearn for the priesthood?

I was glad to hear my friend admit, and the professor he quoted, that Spiritualism is a "mass of imposture and delusion." But Mr. Hull comforts himself with the thought that beneath this mass there are a few grains of facts. "Hunt for a needle in a haystack." Never in the world's history has there been a movement so overwhelmingly submerged by imposture as Modern Spiritualism, and continually it is a rising flood of fraud.

Are Spiritualists able to fish out a fact in such a "seething, simmering stew" of illusion, deception, trickery? Again and again it has been proved that they cannot detect the difference between what they call the genuine and the counterfeit. Medium after medium, who had been highly endorsed, has been detected in trickery.

For twenty-five years I was a Spiritualist, clung to it with the desperation of despair, and during all those years Spiritualists were proud of my work. The ladies would gather around me and say, "Heaven bless you, Brother Jamieson, the angels are with you." Well, they were, the best materializations I ever saw. They were visible. In all those years Spiritualists never lisped one word against my honor, my integrity. They knew, and said, that however unpopular any doctrine might be I never hesitated to advocate it, if I thought it was the truth. I discovered in 1865 that Spiritualist dark circles were frauds, and boldly denounced them as no part of Spiritualism, after the famous Michigan medium, John McQueen, revealed his imposition.

I will tell you about it to-morrow night.

Moses Hull came to see me at Albion. I had gone to work at day labor, for I always said that if I cannot have a free platform on which to utter my honest sentiments, I will earn my bread by physical toil. At last Sylvester Hoyt, a lawyer, of DeWitt, Michigan, and a convert of mine, wrote me, "Come here, Brother Jamieson, our platform is free." Any platform which is not devoted to mental freedom is doomed.

The first article I ever wrote for the press was "Duty versus Policy." In my striving to practice it, I have lost three little fortunes. It is the most rugged road a human being ever traveled, and at the end of that road you may be almost sure that no one will give you the least credit for it. You are alone with duty done.

The only class of people that ever called my honesty in question is the Spiritualists. The Methodists, when I left them for Spiritualism, said I was misguided. How earnestly my employer, good William Phelps, a local Methodist preacher, of Detroit, Michigan, labored to save me from what he called the delusion of Spiritualism. When Spiritualists were winning converts from the churches and the skeptics, they said, "It is glorious! a freeman's right to change his mind."

After Moses Hull became a Spiritualist lecturer he was asked at the close of a discourse, "You say you were once a Methodist, then an Adventist, and now a Spiritualist; what will you be next? If you were wrong then, how do we know you are right now, seeing you change your mind so often?"

Hull's quick answer was, "A wise man changeth often, a fool never!"

We are both wise men. When he makes one more change, gets where I am, he will be wiser than he is now. I really think the Spiritualists are afraid that I may convert their champion, which is one reason they do not invite me to debate with him at their camp-meetings and societies It looks to me as if they have no confidence in their own philosophy and phenomena. Like Belshazzar, "Their knees smote one against another," notwithstanding a Daniel and a Moses stand ready to fight for their faith.

In the Spiritual mass-meetings Spiritualists advocated great mental freedom and liberality, and said they could tell what they believe to-day; but could not tell what they would believe to-morrow. They insisted that it is the duty of every human being to keep the mind open to truth; to change a conviction every day in the week, if necessary, to grow; to progress, according to the revelations of truth. Then is when I was in love with Spiritualism. The practice now seems to be, "Change your mind to Spiritualism, never from it." That is my unpardonable crime, for which Spiritualists will never forgive me in this world nor the world to come—if I get there!

Mr. Hull asks me to "please account for that mediumship" with which I "startled the world." His inference is that if I cannot account for it, Spiritualism is true. Is that his logic? The philosophy of Spiritualism is that a medium is the instrument of communication, and is not expected to account for anything.

He asks "in all candor" was I "honest in that seance, or was I not?" Brother Hull is blessed with a short memory. Since I gave up Spiritualism I have been frequently denounced by Spiritualists for changing my views. One woman speaker berated me at a Spiritualist convention which Hull attended, declaring that Jamieson is not honest. Moses Hull, then and there, so I am told, arose, and with flashing eye, exclaimed, "Jamieson is as honest as I am, and I am as honest as God!"

When I became a Spiritualist and a medium I was an innocent, beardless boy. I have triumphed over the beardless. As to the innocency—well, I have associated with Moses Hull too much to be downright sure. I think it is an "hypothesis."

At seventeen years of age I gradually drifted from my mother's religion, Methodism, into Spiritualism. I liked the Methodists, their earnestness and warm-heartedness. My father and mother taught me Scotch-Irish honesty. Unless Spiritualism spoiled it, I still have it; for I am Scotch-Irish, like President McKinley and William Jennings Bryan. It is a peculiarity of this race that they will never yield as long as they think they are right. Slow in making up the mind; but when it is made up nothing can change them unless they are shown that the conviction is false. I never heard of a Scotch-Irish-American who was guilty of a dishonest deed.

When I began to investigate Spiritualism, I got down on my knees,—for, whether you believe it or not, I was a very good boy, and have often wondered I didn't die young—and as I was on my knees, I said, "Oh, God! if this new religion of Spiritualism is true, show me the truth." I mingled with the Spiritualists; they were such a happy people, and they proved to me that John Wesley was a Spiritualist; that Methodism is Spiritualism. For ten years I was ineffably happy. God, I thought, had guided my steps, as I asked him to do, into the new religion, which was to become the religion of the world. I sat in circles, like my unsophisticated friend here, and got the spiritual jerks,—had them bad—I thought that the spirits of the departed dead did all that. My Methodist friends said they knew I was possessed of the devil, but I said I knew it was spirits, and we were both mistaken! Sometimes the worst fooled people are those who think they know. I was "influenced," as Hull words it, by eighty-five different spirits and in those days I had not a single doubt that they were the spirits of the departed. That is why I am so charitable to the Spiritualists. They are honest, but deluded, just as I was. This does not include the tricksters that infest their ranks.

When the spirits began to sing, as we supposed, and play, and materialize in the dark, I believed it all. In those days I could swallow spiritual camels, and pass my plate for more. I was then as Hull is now. Mediums said darkness was a "condition" necessary for the spirits to manifest. I said, "Yes, the Bible shows it." But I never could get to be that kind of a medium. My mediumship was inspirational speaking, mental tests, prophetic dreams, healing power and character representation, "such stuff as dreams are made of." I converted thousands, I presume, to Spiritualism. The first rude shock to my blissful dream was a physical and clairvoyant medium who came to Grand Rapids, Michigan, in 1863. His name was George W. Cusser—and he was a cusser. No three men that I ever saw could tie him so securely that he could not untie himself. As I look back to those days I am surprised that I ever accepted the preposterous theory that spirits could tie and untie ropes and knots of all descriptions. I saw sailors bind him hand and foot; yet I began to grow skeptical and proposed to subject him to rigid tests. He refused every one of them, and said the spirits made his conditions, not mortals.

Go where you will to-day among the best mediums in America, and they refuse to be investigated by your method. It must be by their own, or not at all; you must observe the "conditions," which they say they receive from their spirit guides. With a great deal of plausibility they will show that the photographer, the electrician, the chemist must have "conditions," and you are expected to acquiesce in all the requirements of the medium, on the gratuitous assumption that he has, at some time, received a series of rules from spirits whose existence it is the object of the seance to prove. Is Spiritualism based upon a petitio principii? The pretense that because nature requires darkness to grow a potato, therefore angels need it to make themselves known, is a huge twentieth century leap in logic.

By the confessions of Spiritualists themselves they are unable to detect the difference between their counterfeits and genuine; nor have they any means of discovering what is spirit and what is medium, even in the case of their so-called genuine mediums. Dr. Babbitt, a prolific writer on spiritual philosophy, in the Religio-Philosophical Journal, July 9, 1881, says: "A communication may be three-fourths medium and one-fourth spirit." This, by no means, impeaches the veracity of the medium. He, or she, may honestly think it is all spirit; but how can the medium know it is spirit?

I do not take the words of their enemies, but their own.

When I come to speak of the character of the communications upon which Spiritualists rely for proof of identity, I will show that nearly all are frivolous, although I cheerfully admit that some of the most beautiful poetry and eloquent discourses I ever heard came from mediums. But it is human to make poetry and produce eloquence.

One of the greatest proofs I ever knew in favor of Spiritualism was a grand poem through the mediumship of Miss Lizzie Doten, by the spirit, as claimed, of the author of Poe's "Raven." But who has measured the capacity of the human mind? When what purported to be the spirit of Edgar Allen Poe controlled the vocal organs of Miss Doten, the poem was certainly like Poe's Raven; but is it impossible for a human being to imitate even a sublime poem? I carry it in memory; but, as my time is nearly expired, I can give you but a portion of it:

From the throne of life eternal,
From the home of love supernal,
Where the angel feet make music
Over all the starry floor,
Mortals, I have come to meet you,
Come with words of peace to greet you,
And to tell you of the glory
That is mine forevermore.

Once before I found a mortal,
Waiting at the heavenly portal,
Waiting, but to catch some echo
From that ever-opening door.
Then I seized his quickening being,
And through all his inward seeing,
Caused my burning inspiration
In a fiery flood to pour.

Now I come more meekly human,
And the weak lips of a woman
Touch with fire from off the altar—
Not with burnings as of yore,
But in holy love descending,
With her chastened being blending,
I would fill your souls with music
From the bright celestial shore.

As one heart yearns for another,
As a child turns to its mother,
From the golden gates of glory
Turn I to the earth once more,
Where I drained the cup of sadness,
Where my soul was stung to madness,
And life's bitter, burning billows
Swept my burdened being o'er.

Here the harpies and the ravens,
Human vampires, sordid cravens,
Preyed upon my soul and substance,
Till I writhed in anguish sore.
Life and I then seemed mismated,
For I felt accursed and fated,
Like a restless, wrathful spirit
Wandering on the Stygian shore.

But while living, striving, dying,
Never did my soul cease crying,
"Ye who guide the Fates and Furies,
Give, oh give me, I implore!
From the myriad hosts of nations,
From the countless constellations,
One pure spirit that can love me,
One that I, too, can adore!"

Through this fervent aspiration
Found my fainting soul salvation,
And from out the blackened fire crypts
Did my quickened spirit soar,
And my beautiful ideal,
Not too saintly to be real,
Burst more brightly on my vision
Than the loved and lost Lenore.

'Mid the surging seas she found me,
With the billows breaking round me
And my chained and chafing spirit
In her arms of love upbore.
Like the breath of blossoms blending,
Like the prayers of saints ascending,
Like the rainbow's seven-hued glory
Blend our souls forevermore.

Earthly love and lust enslaved me,
But divinest love hath saved me,
And I know now, first and only,
How to love and to adore.

[There was considerable laughter and applause throughout this speech. Judge Koons, one of the moderators, declared that the rendition by Mr. Jamieson of Miss Doten's poem was worthy of Edwin Booth.]

In order to assist in forming a Spiritual and Occult Library in every Spiritualist's home, these eight valuable books, substantially and elegantly bound in cloth, are furnished to our subscribers for $2.50. We are able to do this, from the fact that the authors make no charge for the vast amount of labor bestowed on these works, and which extended over many years. That is why you are getting these intensely interesting books for the price you do. We are only carrying out the Divine Plan, inaugurated only by The Progressive Thinker. There are thousands of our subscribers who have no Spiritualist or Occult library, and this inducement is offered in order that they may commence forming one at once, and thus keep in line with the advancing procession. The postage on the above books and expense of mailing is about 95 cents, hence you are receiving them at an exceedingly low price—simply the result of modern enterprise combined with a desire to do good.

IMPORTANT MATTER FROM OUR FOREIGN EXCHANGES

THE TWO WORLDS, MANCHESTER, ENGLAND.

ROMANISM AND SPIRITUALISM.

To my mind Romanism is a power and principle with which Spiritualism will have to deal. The Roman Catholic very naturally is inclined to resent anything tending to bring his principles into contempt, hence the necessity whereby they ought to foster a principle of charity when differing or expressing their differences from others. One great tenet of Rome is that "We belong to a church out of which no one can be saved." This is an extract from the "creed of Pope Pius the Fourth." Herein lies a fundamental difference. The Spiritualist, on the other hand, believes in a principle that it cannot be a law emanating from the giver of all good and infinite wisdom that anyone should be lost. An untruth will never become a truth with age. The Spiritualist will never make use of the secular power in order to bolster up or disseminate its principles.

The Romanist and Protestant in their day have both outraged the principles of justice, and even now, with our advanced knowledge, they will almost cut each other's throats for the love of God! The Roman Catholic of to-day feels it to be a sort of sin to enter a Protestant church or place of worship whilst it is the same Jesus Christ which they both profess to love and worship. The great unseen Ruler of the Universe ripens the corn and fruits in the fields and gardens of both, whilst puny man would try and have us believe that this same source of love and power has become a "respecter of persons."

The Roman Catholics claim that their church and its teachings are the same to-day as they were a thousand years ago. Is it not true that that Galileo was forced to recant, whilst Galileo's theories are to-day acknowledged? In secular knowledge the church may have advanced, whilst in spiritual knowledge it has become stereotyped. According to the teaching of the Roman church the Spiritualist—not the ignorant, but the enlightened one—will be damned, his soul will be forever lost, and subjected to an endless torture, and this, mind you, from an all-wise, all-merciful, infinite Father of Love.

Now, sir, I am not all-wise; I am not all-merciful; I have not an infinite love; yet my wisdom is so far above and beyond these teachings, my love to them is of such a degree that I would not send the soul of any one of them, from the Pope to the most ignorant peasant, to suffer the purgatories of a literal fire for a single hour. "Purgatory," may, according to this teaching, be "a part of hell called limbo." I do not blame them for believing it, neither would I for anything persecute them for so doing; the fault of living and believing in such a principle, which to me has no terror, would be sufficient punishment in anticipation.

On the other hand, I say to them, do not persecute me because my life's principles have carried me beyond the mediocre character of somebody else's beliefs. The Spiritualist need not throw stones at others; only allow him a free platform and fair play, when and whereby he may more fully demonstrate and promulgate the principles of a universal brotherhood in man, and an eternal spirit of love and good will from the spirits of an all-wise Father.

CONSTITUTIONAL CASES OF APPARENT DEATH.

In the letter you kindly printed in the Two Worlds, containing a quotation from an instructive article on premature burial by Dr. Edward P. Vollum, it was stated that there were other forms of apparent death "that may defy the highest medical skill and all known tests and signs." These abnormal conditions of the human system, Dr. Vollum points out, "are the constitutional cases, due to some warp of temperament, as seen in trance, catalepsy, cholera, auto-hypnotism, somnambulism, etc., which, like hibernation, are inexplicable to any principles taught by science. We know but little of these idiosyncrasies, except that they are usually hereditary, and that their victims usually fall into death-like lethargy from over-work, worry, and foul air, and that during their attacks efforts at resuscitation should be kept up until putrefaction appears, lest they be mistaken for dead, and disposed of accordingly. Quain's 'Dictionary of Medicine' says: 'The duration of trance has varied from a few hours or days to several weeks or months.' The British medical press during the last fifty years has furnished numerous cases which revived from the consciousness of the preparations for closing the coffin. Many notables have been subject to this disorder such as the great anatomist, Winslow, the French cardinal and senator, Donnet, and Benjamin Disraeli. The last-named personage lay in this state for a week. All such cases are in peril because of their uncertainty. Of course, old cases of heart disease and apoplexy may be recognized by the patient's physician, but, as a rule, the diagnosis cannot be sure without an autopsy. All signs of death are deceptive, and all these cases should be held as not past resuscitation until decomposition sets in. Hufeland observes: 'Death does not come suddenly; it is a gradual process from actual life to apparent death, and from that to actual death.' The revivals sometimes reported during epidemics of cholera, small-pox, and yellow fever depend, as in so-called sudden death, upon the fact that the patients are usually taken down in their ordinary health, with a reserve of strength which bridges them over after the force of the disease is spent. The estimates of such disasters are based upon the discoveries made when the dead are removed from cemeteries, as is done in some cities every five years. A number of the skeletons are always found turned to one side or on the face, twisted, or with the hands up to the head. These are counted as living burials."

SPIRITUALISTS AND CHRIST.

Your correspondents on the above subject have apparently not yet freed themselves from the superstitious reverence and worship of Christ, and therefore they invest him with a halo of sacredness which does not belong to him.

In studying the character of Christ we must remember that we have nothing historical as a guide, but only four contradictory gospels, and those were written long after the alleged death of Jesus Christ by some unknown persons.

But perhaps your correspondents will not object to me examining those gospels, to see whether we ought to accept Christ as "our guide, philosopher and friend." He who is so egotistical as to say that "He that loveth father or mother more than me is not worthy of me," (Matt. x:37), cannot be our guide. He that says, "If any man come to me, and hate not his father and mother, and his wife and children, and brethren and sisters, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple," (Luke xiv:26) cannot be our guide, philosopher and friend, for such teachings destroy the foundation of home life, of social life, and national life, and I say a malison on such teachings, whether they come from God or man.

Christ was the first to cast upon the shadowy shore of death the lurid glare of hell. He it was that first mentioned the "never-dying worm." It is a wonder that his admirers have never claimed him to be the greatest naturalist, seeing that he is the only person that has ever discovered that remarkable worm. He also discovered seven devils in his friend, Mary Magdalene. He also turfited some other devils out of certain men into some swine, thereby causing the swine to go and commit suicide. That would prove to the twelve ignoramuses, yclept "his disciples," that he was gifted beyond ordinary man. He was also gifted with choice language when discussing with opponents. To call your opponents "a generation of vipers" is quite in accordance with a man of holy and heavenly character. The "master teacher" would certainly have made his way selling fresh Galilee fish on a stall in Billingsgate, for he not only could call his opponents vipers, etc., but he could so curse a fig tree for not bearing fruit out of season that the poor tree withered up. I think that would be a master curse from the master teacher. There is a great distinction between precept and practice with Christ. He taught us to forgive our enemies, and promised to eternally damn his. Your correspondent, John Horton, is surprised and staggered when he finds that your South African correspondent is in the army. Now I cannot see why he should be so surprised. He who wields the sword walks in his steps. Christ said, "Think not that I am come to send peace on earth. I came not to send peace, but a sword," (Matt. x:34.) Such being the case, and as Christ came to set at variance and to destroy family relationship, I think the soldier is a true follower of the Prince of Peace, who came not to bring peace, but a sword.

In conclusion, if the Spiritualists have no higher ideal than this mythical Christ, then I am sorry for them, for they are at least nineteen centuries behind the times. If there has been no grater man since Christ, then let us never again speak of progress. There has been and are many men that far excel this mythical Galilean, men whose shoes the Christ is not worthy to unloose. Then why hang to the coat tails of Christ, or rather the tails without a coat?

A RUSSIAN "MIRACLE."

The Novoe Vremya of September 14 has the following account of a miracle performed by the famous Father John, of Cronstadt:

On the 12th Father John arrived at the village of Sopino, conducted service, and spent the night with Father Lvov. Next day he journeyed to Konchanskols and consecrated the new stone church there in the presence of fully 10,000 people. After this service a breakfast was given in the school, and many speeches were delivered. In the midst of the breakfast two men and two old women were seen approaching the school-house, bearing the seemingly lifeless body of a woman. For seven years this woman had been paralytic, unable to move arms or legs or open her eyes—was a living corpse. On their bringing her to him Father John arose, stood before her, and, asking her name, gazed fixedly at her. Then in a loud voice he bid her open her eyes. After several attempts Audotya (the paralytic) did so. "Look me straight in the face," said Father John, "and cross yourself." Slowly and with great effort the woman succeeded in making the sign of the cross. "Do it again," said Father John, "and again." With ever-increasing faith the woman repeated the movement. "Stand up," said Father John, and the woman arose. Then he moved from his place, bidding her follow. "Now walk round me," said Father John, and the lately seemingly dead woman slowly approached and fell on his shoulder. "Go and pray," said he, blessing the woman. On this she moved away without any help. All this took place in the presence of thousands, who were unable to restrain their tears.

If Christian priests cultivated the gift of healing along the line indicated in the foregoing, there is no doubt their efforts would meet with greater success than at present. Father John is evidently a true disciple, for he is working the works of his master. He is also apparently a strong healing psychic, and should be responsible for many acts as that here recorded.

ROMANISM.

Your correspondent "Scrutor" allows his pen to outrun his discretion. I wonder what defense or explanation he can put forward for the following notice, posted up in a church in Mexico:

"Raffle For Souls.—At the last raffle for souls the following members obtained the prize, and the lucky holders may be assured that their loved ones are forever released from the flames of purgatory. Ticket 841: The soul of Lawyer James Vasquey is released from purgatory and ushered into heavenly joys. Ticket 41: The soul of Madam Calderson is made happy forever. Another raffle for souls will be held at this same blessed Church of the Redeemer, on January 1, at which four bleeding and tortured souls will be released from purgatory according to the four highest tickets of this most holy lottery. Tickets one dollar. To be had of the father in charge. Will you for the poor sum of one dollar leave your loved ones to burn in purgatory for ages?"

INSTRUCT THE CHILDREN.

Spiritualism is something more than phenomena—it is educational and reformatory. The truest and best reformation is that which is laid in the hearts and minds of children. Therefore Spiritualists should instruct the children. This can best be done by forming lyceums in connection with every society. A society that has no lyceum, it is as incomplete as a church or chapel without its Sunday-school, thereby forcing its members' children to attend other places of worship. The children of Spiritualists who have to attend orthodox Sunday-schools are taught that which their parents do not believe. This is a defect and injustice to the children which Spiritualists should not longer tolerate. The remedy is in forming lyceums.

"Historical, Logical and Philosophical Objections to the Dogmas of Reincarnation and Re-Embodiment." By Prof. W. M. Lockwood. A keen and masterly treatise. Paper, 25 cents. For sale at this office.

"Death Defeated; or the Psychic Secret of How to Keep Young." By J. M. Peebles, M. D., M. A., Ph. D. Price $1. For sale at this office.

"After Her Death. The Story of a Summer." By Lilian Whiting. No mind that loves spiritual thought can fail to be fed and delighted with this book. Beautiful spiritual thought, combining advanced ideas on the finer and ethereal phases of Spiritualism, leading the mind onward into the purer atmosphere of exalted spiritual truth. A book for the higher life. For sale at this office. Price, cloth $1.

"Right Living." By Susan H. Wixon. The author shows a wise practicality in her method of teaching the principle of ethics. She illustrates her subject with many brief narratives and anecdotes, which render the book more interesting and more easily comprehended. It is especially adapted for use in Children's Lyceum. In the hands of mothers and teachers it may be made very useful. Young and old will be benefited by it. Cloth $1 For sale at this office.

"Poems of Progress." By Lizzie Doten. In this volume, this peerless poet of Spiritualism may be read in her varied moods, "from grave to gay, from lively to severe." It is a book to be treasured and richly enjoyed by all who love genuine poetry, and especially by Spiritualists. The volume is tastily printed and bound. Price $1.

"The World Beautiful." By Lilian Whiting. Most excellent in their high and elevating spirituality of thought. Series 1, 2, and 3, each complete in itself. Price, cloth, $1 per volume. For sale at this office.

"Mind and Body; Suggestions and Hypnotism Applied in Medicine and Education." By A. O. Halphide. President Chicago Society of Anthropology. For sale at this office. Price $1.

"The Bridge Between Two Worlds." By Abby A. Judson. This book is dedicated to all earnest souls who desire, by harmonizing their physical and their psychical bodies with universal nature and their souls with the higher intelligences, to come into closer connection with the purer realms of the spirit world. It is written in the sweet spiritual tone that characterizes all of Miss Judson's literary works. Price, cloth, $1; paper, 75 cents. For sale at this office.

PROFESSOR HYSLOP CONTRADICTS MRS. PIPER.

He Says the Boston Medium's Utterances Were Probably Spiritistic, and Not Telepathic, as She Asserts--Relates His Experiences with Her.

There has just been received in this country a stout octave volume—being number XLVI, of the Proceedings of the Psychical Society, whose headquarters are in London—which contains the first comprehensive account of Professor James H. Hyslop's official relations with the famous Boston medium, Mrs. Eleanor E. Piper.

Mrs. Piper's self-revelations, which apeared in a recent number of the Herald, threw a bombshell into the Spiritualistic camp, yet they did not feaze the members of the Psychical Society, which had held her under its tutelage for many years. The article was wrongly called a confession by the public. It might be more rightly characterized by the Greek word "apologia," which does not hold the more or less humiliating implication of the English derivative, "apology," but means rather an explanation.

Now, Mrs. Piper's explanation of her own undoubted powers was that they were due to telepathy. She refused to believe that in her trance state she had any dealings with disembodied spirits.

Nevertheless, Dr. Richard Hodgson, who is the head of the American branch of the Psychical Society, and Professor Hyslop, who has always been the stoutest champion of the spiritistic theory as the best explanation yet offered (though not necessarily the final one) have refused to take her at her word.

THE MOST COMPETENT JUDGES.

They believe that the scientific gentlemen who in their waking senses watched her were better fitted to decide upon the nature of the phenomena than the comatose subject. Beyond this Professor Hyslop refused to say anything. He stood upon his report and was content to wait for that to justify him. Consequently the report constitutes his final answer to his critics.

It should be premised that James Hervey Hyslop, professor of logic and ethics at Columbia University, is a scientist, hard-headed, clear-headed, dispassionate; or if he has a passion it is precisely for the unmasking of all spiritistic fraud.

He spent many years of his life in investigating such alleged facts as apparitions, clairvoyance, table-turning, spirit rapping and mediumship. He found little honesty among the professors of these dark arts, and he ruthlessly denounced their dishonesty. As to the small residuum of honest folk among them he always saw reason to believe that they were self-deluded and ignorant of the fact that in telepathy and in hypnotism lay the real secret of their apparent success.

It was he who, in 1894, climbed upon the stage in Koster and Bial's and exposed the fraudulent pretences of Annie Abbott, the so-called Georgia magnetic girl, and drove her back into the obscurity from which she had emerged. It was he who brought dismay into seance after seance through his extensive knowledge of the tricks of pretended mediums. He has studied sleight-of-hand. He solved the secret of all the conjuring tricks of Keller and Hermann. He can perform many of them himself.

CONQUERED BY MRS. PIPER.

Yet it was this man, so equipped with insight and with knowledge, who was conquered by Mrs. Piper. Conquered is the right word.

He began his investigations as a skeptic. He came, if not to scoff, at least to expose. He found himself convinced almost against his will. He was convinced, first, that Mrs. Piper was perfectly honest and sincere; second, that the manifestations of her trance condition could not be explained by telepathy; third, that the spiritistic theory was at the present moment the best working hypothesis for the solution of the phenomena.

By admitting that it is a working hypothesis only he acknowledges that it is not perfect and does not explain everything, and likewise that he stands with a mind open to receive any more rational explanation.

Professor Hyslop's first sittings with Mrs. Piper were in 1892. Nothing important occurred save the conviction left in the professsor's mind of the perfect honesty of the medium. Six years later he held a series of sittings with her which resulted in convincing him that she had mysterious and occult powers that could not be explained on any known theory of telepathy or thought transference.

PRECAUTIONS AGAINST IMPOSTURE.

All possible precautions were taken to prevent fraud, collusion or imposition.

The arrangements for the sittings were made only through Dr. Hodgson, and with special care regarding secrecy. The following statements by Professor Hyslop will make the whole case clear:

"First—No one except Dr. Hodgson and my wife was to know that I was to have sittings, and only Dr. Hodgson was to know of the arrangements. This plan was carried out in entire secrecy.

"Second—The arrangements for the sittings were not made with Mrs. Piper in her normal state, but with the trance personalities in her trance state.

"Third—The arrangements for my sittings were not made in my name, but in the pseudonym of 'Four Times Friend,' so that neither the supraliminal nor the subliminal of Mrs. Piper could have any clew to my identity.

"Fourth—When I went to conduct the experiments and before reaching the house of Mrs. Piper, about two hundred feet from the house and while in a closed coach, I put on a mask covering the whole of my face, and entered the house wearing the mask, met Mrs. Piper, and went on with the sitting in this condition.

"Fifth—When introduced to Mrs. Piper it was under the name of Mr. Smith, which is the usual way by which Dr. Hodgson introduced strangers. I bowed to her without uttering a sound, the object being to conceal my voice equally as well as my face.

"Sixth—In the whole series of my sittings Mrs. Piper never heard my voice in her normal state, except twice when I changed it into an unnatural tone to utter a sentence, in one case only four words, as explained in my notes.

"Seventh—In the whole course of the sittings I was careful not to touch Mrs. Piper, and I never came into any contact with her to render any muscular suggestion possible, except, perhaps, half a dozen times when I seized the hand while writing to place it on the writing pad which it was escaping. Once I held her head while she was straightened in the chair in which she was sitting. But at all other times I avoided every form of contact that could even make muscular suggestion conceivable.

"Eighth—The record shows that the facts obtained were either without any questions at all, or without questions calculated to suggest the answers given. I was extremely careful to avoid verbal suggestion. I have tried to draw attention to any special exceptions.

"Ninth—During the writing I stood behind and to the right of Mrs. Piper, in a position which concealed any view of me and my movements absolutely from any visual knowledge of Mrs. Piper, whether supraliminal or subliminal, even had her eyes been open instead of closed in the trance. It was necessary to take this position in order to be able to read the writing as it went on."

The fourth, fifth and sixth precautions were taken because in 1892, although the Professor had been introduced to her under a false name while she was in the trance, he was subsequently, on her recovery, introduced under his right one. Hence these were measures against any possible identification.

He is quite sure that Mrs. Piper, in her normal state, never obtained any knowledge of his identity until after the newspapers had published what he had been doing, and this was after the close of his sittings.

The other precautions were assumed to test the influence of suggestion by the sitters; in other words, to prove or disprove the possibility of unconscious telepathic communications.

HOW SHE WENT INTO A TRANCE.

Mrs. Piper, as Professor Hyslop explains, went into a trance in the following manner: She would seat herself in a chair in front of a table, upon which were placed two pillows for a head rest when the trance came on.

Then her head fell upon the pillows and was so arranged by Dr. Hodgson or other sitters that the right side of the head lay on the palm of the right hand, looking off and away from the table upon which the writing was done.

This second table was on the right hand. On it was placed a writing pad. In a few minutes after the trance occurred the right hand showed signs of animation, and slowly moved toward this table, when a pencil was placed between the two forefingers and the writing began.

When a question was to be asked or a statement made to the "communicator," Mrs. Piper's hand was spontaneously raised toward the mouth of the sitter, who addressed the hand, and it then immediately proceeded either to present the message to the "communicator," often extending itself out toward some "invisible presence," or to write out a reply.

Professor Hyslop significantly adds, as if to anticipate the so-called "confession" of Mrs. Piper, that Mrs. Piper's normal consciousness knew nothing of what she had done or communicated in the trance.

"Hence we do not have to reckon with any views of Mrs. Piper in estimating the nature and value of the results, so that the facts have to be studied from the standpoint of the sitter or investigator."

In Professor Hyslop's various sittings Mrs. Piper apparently summoned up for him the spirits of a large number of his relatives, whom she could not have known, and some of whom were not even known to himself. Thus Professor Hyslop thinks that the theory of telepathy through the medium of his own subconscious self is untenable. How could her subconscious self discover in his what had never existed there, even in the shape of memory?

MOST SUCCESSFUL OF EXPERIMENTS.

The most successful of the experiments were with a "communicator," who professed to be Professor Hyslop's father, and with other "communicators." who helped the father out.

These were not faultless, but they contained a residuum of facts which could not be known to anybody save the departed.

Professor Hyslop holds that even the confusions and errors are accompanied by so many true statements and have such associations with the course of thought on the part of the communicator that they continually indicate groups of memories pertaining to his father's mind.

"It is of course," he confesses, "difficult to estimate the value of all this material. It is, so to speak, like a fitful and incoherent dream, or series of dreams, or better still, like the wandering mental condition of a hypnotic patient with the ordinary inhibitions cut off and yet aware of a definite purpose to be executed with interludes of close approximation to the ordinary waking consciousness."

In short, he believes the communicator was either actually his father (with his mind at times somewhat confused and laboring under difficulties in expressing himself), or a very extraordinary personation of him that had acquired a knowledge of his experience ranging from an early period to his death, and including not only a proper appreciation of the matters in which he was most interested, but specific recollections of little possessions and peculiarities, some of which were entirely unknown to the professor himself.

His own name and the professor's were correctly given, and it was he who first mentioned Robert and eventually Frank and Hettie as among his children. Other communicators mentioned the rest of the children, Margaret, Sarah, Annie, Charles, William and Lida before the father did so. The distinction was correctly indicated in all of these names between the living and the dead. The names Ellen and Helen occurred in the father's communications without any statements that showed what relevance was intended, though in the case of Helen the connection suggests that it might be a mistake for Henrietta, the name of a half-sister of the professor. They were not the names of any members of the father's immediate family.

Whatever detailed references the father made to the members of his family concerning his personal relations with them and his appreciation of the points in their character were pertinent throughout, except in the one instance in which the language he used fitted Robert and was not applicable to Frank, to whom it was applied. The most important instances of these were connected with the professor himself and the estimation in which he was held by the father, all which were points subsequently corroborated by the surviving widow, the professor's stepmother.

RECORD'S REVELATIONS.

The father's habits of thought came out very clearly in various parts of the mediumistic record. His references to the moral and religious solicitude he had felt for James and to the talks he had with him on the whole question of psychical research and a future life were substantially correct.

He also clearly remembered the facts associated with his last illness, its main symptoms and such incidents as that James' voice was the last he had heard as he passed away. His remembrances about the medicines he took were less clear, as he specified some that he had only thought of taking, such as maltine, and at least one—morphine—of which there is no evidence that he had taken any. On the other hand he correctly named a preparation of oil of which the Professor was ignorant, and another, strychnine, which the Professor had casually heard of in a letter and forgotten.

"His chief success was in specifying correctly in reply to my question the medicine which I had obtained for him," declared the Professor.

Various incidents in the early life, given in response to the Professor's demand for something that had happened before he was born, were verified by the Professor on a journey he subsequently took in the West, visiting his father's old acquaintances.

Professor Hyslop adds: "Another series of references which I may here group together concern my father's personal experiences, appearances and little personal habits and articles that he possessed. Curiously enough, his recollections about these were the most confused, possibly in some cases positively erroneous, where my own memory was most clear, and, in fact, nearly all his most specific references concerned articles the very existence of which was not known to me at all.

"That he was a little, elderly gentleman; that he could only whisper; that he had no teeth, and that he could not sing were correct statements made about him as Mrs. Piper returned to consciousness. The reference to his books, pictures, etc., had some pertinence, but they were confused and of no evidential value, though I was familiar with the circumstances connected with them.

"But the references to the trouble with the left eye, the mark near the ear, the thin coat or dressing gown he wore mornings, the black skull cap, the tokens, the stool, the writing pad, the rests, and the round and square bottles on his desk, the paper cutter, his diary, the brown handled knife and the pall paring, and the horse Tom in connection with George were mentioned with almost precise correctness, and were all but the tokens, the diary, and the last incident wholly unknown to me.

"The visit of George and Will before moving West was also probably unknown to me. The references to the place in which he said he kept his tin spectacle case and the paper knife were not true, and the box of minerals was either a false or an indeterminate incident.

"The most important instances of error in my father's communications, and which will be regarded by any persons as telling against his identity, although I myself explain them, as the reader understands, on the assumption of temporary confusion in the act of communicating, or possibly as due to an error of memory, are as follows:

"That he sent me books, a box with two books; that Will had his foot injured apparently on the railroad; that there was trouble with Frank's fishing on 'Sunday' (instead of Saturday); that it was Frank (instead of Robert) who was exposed to social temptations; that Will played the flute or fiddle (instead of George and the guitar); Ferdinand (for Anderson, pneumonia for accident, the misapplication of 'cousin' to his nephew, apparently a visit to Frank, apparently also the intimation that Jennie was the name of a relative of my stepmother."

Professor Hyslop's conclusion, then, is not that spiritism is the only hypothesis to be entertained, but that it is rational to suppose it as one of the possible explanations. He sums up as follows:

"To me it is, at present at least, decidedly the preferable one. At any rate, if it has relevant facts representative of personal identity to depend upon and suggesting an appeal to the infinite to escape spiritism, it becomes a legitimate alternative and working hypothesis among all that may be proposed.

"On this ground we shall be able to retort upon those who make their personal conviction or conversion a criterion of the explanatory power of spiritism, or who advance alternative suppositions for explaining the phenomena, that they furnish experimental evidence involving, not the fact of telepathy as we know or suppose it between the living, but the kind of telepathy that will reproduce the unity of consciousness and personal identity in conjunction with the proper dramatic play of personality found in these records, but which would not permit in any case a resort to discarnate spirits to account for it.

"Until this evidence is forthcoming they can have no standing in a scientific court. In the meantime I am content to have suggested with Dr. Hodgson the nature and extent of the considerations which must be experimentally proved in order to refute the hypothesis which is here defended. When this result is effected it will be time to reconsider the position here taken."—New York Herald.

ANNOUNCEMENT.

It is with pleasure we announce that now our Fall and Winter Campaign is upon us, and the greatest feast of reason of the age is certain for our readers in the great Spiritual and Agnostic debate between "Our Moses" and W. F. Jamieson. If you can't spare a dollar, send in 25 cents for thirteen weeks. You will want something interesting to read during the long winter evenings. Subscribe now.

"The Gospel of Buddha, According to Old Records." Told by Paul Carus. This book is heartily commended to students of the science of religions, and to all who would gain a fair conception of Buddhism in its spirit and living principles. Spiritualist or Christian can scarcely read it without spiritual profit. Price $1. For sale at this office.

"Humanity, Its Nature, Powers and Possibilities." A concise, masterly, presentation of the facts and philosophy of Spiritualism. For sale at this office. Price 25 cents.

OUR PEDIGREE.

Man, Thou Hast an Humble Ancestry.

Without special reference to the continuity of the numerical or intellectual potency of any race, tribe or individual, I wish to suggest frankly and truthfully some general ideas on the continuity of subordinate types of life, subject to the same abridgments of interests and warfare of environments that the human race is, and that, if I judge aright, will induce in the minds of recipients some serious considerations respective to our true relationship, and relative standing in the almost boundless ranks of vital creation.

When we critically examine the great fields of animate nature, we are forcibly reminded of the diversity of values, as to function, in each organic complement, so far as their utility responds to the wants of the creature; no two of which are equal in strength, grace, beauty, vitality, or any other factor of its organization, either structurally or functionally; either as to its mechanical arrangements, or to the adaptability to the work this mechanism is prepared to perform for the welfare and enjoyment of the creature.

The relations of each of these types of vital organization to each other and to the rest of the universe has made them just what they are; and had this relationship been less perfect; less conducive to the welfare of their respective organizations, or to the harmonious relationships between each other, there would have been created within their organic complements, resultant imperfections indicing the facts and also heralding an internal warfare for their rearrangement for the welfare of the creature, and the harmony of its environs. On the other hand, had the relationship between them, these organic representatives of nature and their environs been more perfect and conducive to their organic welfare, or their harmonious interrelationship; their phenomenal display to the eye of man the critic, or man the philosopher, or of man the naturalist, would have indiced an organic world, by virtue of its visible representatives, of more beauty, more grandeur, more utility than that which is now being presented to his subtle, broad and comprehensive vision.

Every crook in the branch of a tree, every insect in the beak of a bird, every pang in the associated organism of a vital consciousness positively declares the fact that environs are still supreme, as creative factors, in the arbitrary control of vital organization. Not only the war is still on, vigorously on, between the organic and the inorganic kingdoms; but that such decrees with emphasis that the war is still on, with life and a possible happiness as the stake; and that, too, between all cotemporaneous living forms. It is extermination's relentless struggle, and is waged as between plants and animals; as between vertebrae and invertebrae; as between biped and quadruped; as between beast and human; yea, as between man and man. The fittest survive only until superseded by another fitter still, each in its turn driven to the darkened shades of a final oblivion.

The renowned author of "Thanotopsis" says, "All that tread the globe are but a handful of the tribes that slumber in its bosom."

Not only is this true, but it is true to a vastly greater extent than that author, at that time, could have ever dreamed. Not only the soils, but the very rocks themselves are literally teeming with uncounted, unestimated, undiscovered millions of organic remains; types of a once Now; of a primitive and a strange creation. Types of the absolute parental forms and functions of this great, modern, cotemporaneous, universal brotherhood.

In our intellectual demonstrations of respect to our ancestral lineage, our racial importance, let us not forget the fact that we of this century are called upon by the demands of the noble results and endowments of scientific research and educational developments, to consider that, while we are a fragment of a great division of natural creation, there are also many, very many other kindred types of life, consciousness, and even mentality, upon whom nature spends and has spent vastly more time, and has taken just as much pains, and which in truth, are equally a branch of the great tree of life, vivified by a universal organic law; they and us all one in nature's great, organic infinitude.

I refer not only to the lower modern types, but also, and with emphasis, to those types, strange admixtures of homogeneity and heterogeneity; those types of living, moving, breathing, thinking organisms that have passed forever from the terrestrial bowers and barrens of the home-lands of life's fitful uncertainties, never more to pay the high non-protective tariff of a bare existence, in a continuous and losing struggle for life, its doubtful consequences, with a positive inheritance of death's finality.

Geology tells us of the birth, growth to a magnificent physical supremacy, and final ignoble death, of vast numbers of generic and specific groups; endowed with homogeneous, though strange and to us unfamiliar forms, implying strange habits, forced by peculiar environments to endure or yield to terrible adversities, continuing on through vast periods of time; not months or years; but ages, aeons and incomprehensible epochs, representing time so vast as to exceed the generous imagination of the boldest speculators. Tells of the modification through the evolving changes perpetually working through esthetic, climatic, catastrophic and other causes, until all lines of organic types, either have been strangely modified, or finally exterminated by the potency of this designingless warfare; never more to love or hate, never again to enjoy or sorrow, but finally to bleed and die, leaving us no biographic heritage but fossilized remains to tell the tale of a misunderstood, uncomprehended, unenvied, objectless career.

I will give a brief synopsis of the manner in which natural law has been at work in its distribution of nationalities, tribes and families, genuses, species and varieties. We learn from the paleontologist that, many early types, in their temporal succession and organic evolution displayed what is called "anticipation of future specific types." That is, they were possessed of certain characteristics that later became divided in the different branches of their descendants; some retaining certain organic characteristics, as of feet, limbs or teeth; and another branch taking and retaining other organic peculiarities, as of ribs, vertebra or cranium. For instance, the ancient fossil Ganoid, classed among the early fishes, were not true fishes as compared to the modern fish, but comparable forms of marine vertebrae, having peculiar organs with peculiar and adapted functions, some of which later predominated in the modern fish, and certain others which predominated in and assisted in making up certain reptilian forms.

And again, these old reptiles, not the reptiles of to-day, became divided in their organic structures, as represented in the diversified forms of their descendants, and indiced by their preserved remains. Some of these anticipated the organism of the future bird, having developed a diversity of intermediate forms, such as flying reptiles, birds with teeth, bird-like reptiles with wings, teeth and vertebrate tails in an evolving succession that need not bear mistakes as the fruits of reason. These finally resulted in giving a new type, a primitive bird; other diverse forms going to make the reptile of a later period, and continuing on, constantly diverging in organ and function as time evolved them cotemporaneously upward and apart, eventually changing variety into specie, specie into genus, genus into order, until the grim tentacles of discord finally marks them as typical forms, uniformly and constantly preyed upon by adverse environs, for the last swift and downward slide to extermination's grand finale.

Such represents the philosophic translation of the history of the organic remains of our ancestral originators, as found fossilized in the different geological horizons of our planet; and which have been faithfully traced, step by step, age by age, always onward and upward, embracing all the mighty space of time and events, from the dim panoramas of the palaeozoic times, bearing its data of the genesis of life, to the medievalism of geology, the final NOW; finding the same warfare of interests, the same diversity of organisms, the same probabilities of a final extinction now as then, then as now.

Such is a lesson from which as investigators we should, and as philosophers must create concepts, build premises and formulate conclusions as to nature's great scheme enacted in the dim background of our ancestral origin, development and probable destiny, picturing the long and tedious, bloody and doubtful struggle, up, onto, across and beyond the lower planes of a continuous organic succession. First a soft mollusk, then a fixed-shelled crustacean, then a cartilaginous skeleton, later a vertebrae column, interior bony skeleton, and improved brain organs; then mammalian in reproductive functions, and organs, and higher brain development; later still, a higher intellect, evidences of design functions, anatomy bipedal, nearly upright walking, primitive reason, feeble language; not finally but now bipedal, strictly upright walking, larger brain cavity, much stronger reason, wonderful use of language, functions of design highly developed, the front rank of development, the modern man, the Caucasian of to-day.

A creature having advanced, in spite of adverse environs, all the way up the sluggish pathway of animal life, to the forest homes of simianism; thence to the rocky dens of savagery; onward to and through the dark valleys of barbarism; still upward into higher and more cultivated grounds, and across the threshold of a bare civilization; still onward and upward into the halls of a fuller civilization, with clothes and laws and homes; then again upward and finally to date, to the elevated chambers of the modern dress and homes and laws and schools; noble indices of a higher enlightenment, when and where we first became endowed with mental perceptions fitted for an initial observation from the highest chambered pinnacle, from which a first brave, courageous and free glance is flashed backwards down the dim though glorious landscape of time's fading events, and its magnificent panoramic display of nature's moving, rushing crush of mind's warfare with matter; records of the ups and downs, the pros and cons, the happiness and miseries of this great railway of life o'er which we are, toward an infinity and continuity of events, ever and ever flying.

Not the least of the lessons that we read from this magnificent line of phenomena and events is the startling information: Man, thou wert lowly bred and humbly born. Thou hast passed through and along all the rougher plains of physical and mental crudeness, up to the dignity of first among the still crude forms of nature's great mass of vital organisms; and also art thou still struggling, with no less energy, no less antagonisms, and no nearer than ever before, to the end of a line of creation, that is continually circling in the great vortex of organization, disorganization and reorganization; stamping in strange but unversatile hieroglyphics, the reliable information that though the particular is destructible the general is indestructible; though the organ is mutable, organization is immutable; though the individual is temporal, the universe is eternal.

We are the barbarians to whom some 40th century man, still with more egoism than altruism, more bigotry than brains, more sanctity than sense, may turn with a sneer and say, "There is no blood between us and those barbarians of the 20th century; the creator made them as they were, crude savages, and for no purpose of interest to us. He made us a complete and final type of physical and spiritual perfection. The universe is all for us." At least such has been our cry to the past; and can we expect less than that such will be the cry of the future man to us. While we may dwell stupidly in doubt as to the primal ancestry of the special type, man we can tarry nowise in doubt as to the ancestry of the general types of life, stamped with and directed by that universal, indispensable insignia of all sensoral beings; all universal brotherhood; vital consciousness as the throned monarch of physical organization.

As a final charge on the pages of man's allotment of duties in the premises, let me inscribe the more than probability, that the finger of evolution points with unswerving and constant faithfulness to a positive interrelationship between all types of living, moving, thinking beings; either as between their physical or spiritual organizations; and indicing by legible symbols the establishment of one great and uniform system of creating, developing and destroying; grasping and sweeping onward in irrespective potency all life, all consciousness, all death; alternately swaying on the seat of power the synthetic harmony of life, and the analytical discord of death; subjugating at one fell swoop, all terrestrial nature, from molecule to mountain, from animalcule to man.

Our Fall and Winter Campaign.

The Fall and Winter Campaign of The Progressive Thinker will be especially brilliant. It will be unusually attractive and instructive. It will lead you on to a higher plane. It will make you happier, wiser and better. It will blossom into something brighter, fresher, and more startling, and will be a surprise to you in a variety of ways. Among the many attractions will be the debate between the brilliant Materialist, W. F. Jamieson, and the profound and eloquent Moses Hull. It will make most excellent reading for fall and winter evenings, and we are not sure but what it will so scintillate with the friction of happy hits on both sides that lights can be dispensed with while reading it on a cloudy evening. We are sure that every Spiritualist, Freethinker and Materialist will want to read this debate, and thus become wiser and better. Tell your Spiritualist friends of this debate and request them to send to this office at least 25 cents for a three months' subscription to The Progressive Thinker. No Spiritualist can afford to be without this remarkable debate.

The School Teachers' Victory.

A signal triumph has just been won by two Chicago school teachers over the most powerful corporations of that city; and the more fully the details of the struggle become known, the more remarkable their victory appears.

The appropriations for schools in Chicago have long been inadequate, and whenever the Board of Education needed $1,000,000 or $2,000,000 for any purpose it has been in the habit of deducting it from the teachers salaries. A few years ago, about 4,000 of the 6,000 teachers in Chicago organized a Teachers' Federation. Having reason to believe that the shortage of money was due to the fact that most of the large corporations were evading their legal taxes, they appointed two young teachers, Miss Margaret Haley and Miss Catherine Goggin, a committee to investigate. Then, as the Boston Journal of Education says, "the battle royal began between two little schoolmarms and all the most powerful corporations and trusts in the State combined."

The women's inquiries revealed a most extraordinary state of things. Up to 1875 the railroads of Illinois had been assessed an annual tax on their franchises. In 1874 the assessment was $31,000,000; in 1875 only $22,000,000; and from 1875 to the present time they have not been assessed at all. In 1874 the franchises of the two little horsecar lines which Chicago then had were taxed at $1,000,000; but in 1899 the franchises of the 700 miles of electric and cable lines in Chicago were not taxed a cent. About 1875 the railroads apparently found out that it was cheaper to bribe the officials whose duty it was to apportion their taxes than it was to pay the tax. Other corporations found out the same thing. Of 23 large corporations that the teachers investigated, the majority were not assessed at all, and the others were assessed on only a small fraction of their actual property. These 23 corporations were the gas and coke company, the telephone company, an electric company, and 20 street railway companies.

The women tried to induce the officials whose duty it was to tax these corporations to tax them. Finding that they were in league with the tax-dodgers and were determined not to comply with the law, the women engaged an able lawyer and took legal action to compel the officials to do their duty. The corporations fought hard; they exhausted every resource of evasion and delay, they appealed the case up from court to court; but the law was clear and the evidence of fraud overwhelming, and the Supreme Court of Illinois has ruled that they must pay. The decision will add millions every year to the revenues of Chicago. Hereafter there will be money enough to keep the schools open the full term and to pay the teachers their salaries. All the other municipalities in Illinois will also profit by the decision.

Are not those two plucky young women worthy of a vote?

A Critical and Crushing Review

By Dr. Peebles of the Rev. Dr. Kipp's five lectures against Spiritualism. This crisp and critical reply of the Doctor, while repudiating spiritism, and all frauds connected with the subject, sustains Spiritualism, considering it the complement of primitive Christianity. Price 25 cents.

Hell Revised, Modernized.

And made more comfortable. A scathing review of the Rev. Dr. Kipp's sermon delivered in the Presbyterian church, upon "What Is Hell?" By Dr. J. M. Peebles. A pamphlet of 25 pages. Price 10 cents.

The Soul—Did It Pre-exist?

Did it begin to exist with the body? Is it evolved from the body? Did it ascend up through all the lower orders of creation, or is it a potentialized portion of God? Has it been re-incarnated, or re-embodied? Price 15 cents.

Pro and Con of Spiritualism.

This pamphlet is a re-print of the essays in "The Arena" on Spiritualism in which Rev. H. A. Hart endeavored to prove Spiritualism dangerous and allied to witchcraft. The reply printed in "The Arena" written by Dr. Peebles excited extensive comment, and is absolutely crushing. Price reduced to 5 cents.

Fiftieth Anniversary of Modern Spiritualism.

An elegant pamphlet containing an account of the exercises at Rochester and Hydesville, N. Y., at the celebration of the Fiftieth Anniversary of Modern Spiritualism. It contains the addresses of some of the most noted speakers present. It contains the picture of the Hydesville cottage, wreath, etc., Price 15 cents.

Death Defeated, or the Psychic Secret of How to Keep Young.

This book goes to the foundation of things—health, the laws of health, the foods to eat, the subject of marriage, who should marry and who should not marry, the causes of divorce, the proper time for conception, gestation, the determining of sex, animal flesh-eating, what Herodotus, Hesiod, Homer, Pythagoras, Shelley, Graham and others ate, the foods that produce long life and how to live "immortal" on earth, etc. This book is written in Dr. Peebles' usually clear, crisp style, and attracts the reader from the very first through its facts, logic and convincing arguments. Very handsomely bound in cloth. Price $1.

Vaccination a Curse and a Menace to Personal Liberty.

This finely illustrated volume of between three hundred and four hundred pages, by Dr. Peebles, treats exhaustively of inoculation, cow-pox and calf-lymph vaccination from Jenner's time to the present. It tells how the cow-pox pus poison is obtained—how the vaccine virus, while causing many deaths, sows the seed of eczema, pimpled faces, cancers, tumors, ulcers and leprosy. It gives a history of the several years' battle against vaccination in England, Parliament making it "optional" instead of compulsory. This book should be in every school library and family. Price $1.25.

A Science and a Religion.

As a science Spiritualism at the present time goes deeper into the hidden mysteries than mortal man with all his knowledge of chemistry, astrology or any of the mathematical or physical sciences can delve. It gets its information from the thought side of life; it deducts from the great ocean of intelligence, from the depths of the great deep, the most important knowledge to man—the fact that he is immortal and shall never die, but move on and on into the shoreless stream of progress, learning ever, ever changing, striving, plunging, rising. Moving about in the form he comes in contact with many opposing forces, and yet they are but aids to his eternal progress. To overcome opposition he brings into use all the active energy and draws upon a latent force, a part of him that has previously lain dormant within. All these things are among the teachings of Spiritualism as a science.

As a religion Spiritualism begins with man's moral nature; the aspiring, inspiring, desiring part of him; it begins in his spirit and tells him he has always been and will always be; though change after change may come, as spirit he has always existed and will so remain.

Unlike all or nearly all religions Spiritualism is founded upon cold facts the same as all other sciences, and as a science perfection is no nearer reached as to our knowledge and understanding, as philosophers, than by any other science. We are constantly learning something new, something more of the facts. We learned long ago that as man quits the earth he begins in the new sphere. If he was a beast when he left this plane he began as a beast over there and must remain a beast until an inspiring vibration starts out from his own consciousness, from his spirit brain, then he is aided if he needs aid in his upward progress.

True, if one listens to all that purports to come from the spirit side of life and obeys not his own spirit he will lead all kinds of a life, because, as the door is left open to all comers, some of those "beasts" of which we have been speaking, being earth-bound, can glide up and influence the sensitive or medium, or his own self, and advise according to their ideas. Hence, looking upon the religious or moral side, if we act upon the suggestions of our own highest sense of right, we need no outside advice, but if the good friends see fit to inspire us toward the higher thoughts and deeds we certainly should not be so selfish or egotistical as to thrust them aside.

Spiritualism assumes no authority to force a code of morals upon the people; it says to no man "Thou shalt not lay aside enough of wealth to tide thee through an age of helplessness to the grave; thou shalt not accumulate more coin than will suffice to feed and clothe thee and thy family and lay none away."

But it does teach that in so accumulating it is unfair and wrong to crush others who, like you are struggling to provide against the wolf of poverty and disease which is liable to appear at any time. It teaches that others have rights to "life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness," and as you crush others so will you be crushed in due time. It looks to no God to "give us this day our daily bread," but says, "pitch in and win it, earn it and then get it, for of right it is yours." This is a part of the moral or religious side of Spiritualism. Is it not right?

Spiritualism sanctions human law if it is just, and fights it if unjust. It asks no odds of its enemies. It only asks a hearing and investigation by unbiased minds, and will prove itself the peer of all religions if examined justly, impartially.

The Pictured Story of Beni-Hassan.

An inquirer wants to know what are the facts about the mural pictures at Beni-Hassan, Egypt, which churchmen are constantly citing as evidence that the Jews were in that country, as told in Exodus.

The grotto tombs of Beni-Hassan, are situated about a mile from the east bank of the Nile, and some 200 miles south of Cairo. The mountains at this point are low and sloping, and the artificial grottoes near their summits were cut in the solid rock, the roofs of which are sustained by columns, seemingly the prototypes of the Doric order of architecture. The walls are covered with paintings in colors, representing events in the life of kings, and historical events. The period of their execution is fixed by Egyptologists as about 2,500 years before our era.

The Christians are anxious to force into their service these pictures as corroborative proof of the Bible story, Gen. 42, that Jacob and his sons and their families had entered Egypt to escape a famine in Canaan. Wilkinson, in his Ancient Egyptians, Vol. 1, p. 480, New York edition, says:

"The first figure [in these Beni-Hassan pictures] is an Egyptian scribe, who presents an account of their arrival to a person seated, the owner of the tomb, and one of the principal officers of the reigning Pharaoh. The next, also an Egyptian, ushers them into his presence; and two advance, bringing presents, the wild goat or ibex and the gazelle, the productions of their country. Four men, carrying bows and clubs, follow, leading an ass on which two children are placed in panniers, accompanied by a boy and four women; and, last of all, another ass laden, and two men, one holding a bow and club, the other a lyre, which he plays with the plectrum. All the men have beards, contrary to the custom of the Egyptians, but very general in the East at that period, and noticed as a peculiarity of foreign uncivilized nations throughout their sculptures. The men have sandals, the women a sort of boot reaching to the ankle, and differs a little in form from those worn in Egypt."

The inscription over the illustration Anglicized reads: "The arrival to offer an eye-water to the Pharaoh, which the thirty-seven Aamu bring to him, in the year six of the reign of his majesty the King of Upper and Lower Egypt, Rakhakheper."

The period of the Bible story is given as B. C. 1715, a discrepancy of about 800 years between the two events.

De Lanoye, the French author of "Egypt 3,300 Years Ago," suggests that the picture is "the forlorn hope of the vanguard of those nomadic hordes who, at a later period, were to inundate the valley of the Nile."

Thus the fact about Beni-Hassan. He who reads the Bible story carefully, discovers these Aamu visitors brought a very different kind of presents than that carried by the sons of Jacob. See Gen. 43:11, 12.

In No. 5 of the series of articles lately published in these editorial columns, of date Aug. 3, entitled "Parallel Bible and Heathen Myths," it was maintained the compilers of the Old Testament picked up any facts coming in their way, and after adapting them to their needs they wove them into a history of the Jews. We showed the monumental inscription by Sargon, on the Euphrates was used to build up the character Moses.

Now are not the probabilities very great that this picture-story in the grotto of Beni-Hassan was made to do service in writing up an account of the advent of Jacob's sons into Egypt? It is simply impossible for it to have been a picture record of that event, because of the many centuries lying between; but it was a "good enough Morgan" to weave into a legendary history of a people that required two books from the versatile pen of the real or fictitious Josephus—we don't care which—to prove there was such a nation, a fact, if a fact, which is still controverted.

Those of our readers, if any, who are insistant that Moses was a real character, and wrote the Pentateuch, will turn to page 51 of Renouf's Hibbert Lectures for 1879, on the "Religion of Ancient Egypt." Scribner's Sons edition, and read:

"The opinion which used to be universally received, that Moses is the author of the Pentateuch, must assuredly be abandoned."

Moses aside, and the pretended translation of the Hebrew Scriptures into Greek, conceded to be a fraud by Christian authors, and yet the evidence is most positive that the fictitious Septuagint was drawn upon as authority by the New Testament writers, then where the inerrant "Holy Scriptures?"

Light is dawning on a dark subject.

Nine Thousand Years of History.

Prof. Matthew Flinders Petrie, the famous antiquarian of London, thus sums up the latest evidence of the antiquity of the human race:

"Antiquarians now have to deal with Egypt alone. There is an unbroken chain of historic record from 5000 B. C., besides actual objects which carry history back 2,000 years further, thus giving 9,000 years to human history; but this is yet far from the beginning. Other lands might show the age of man to be more remote by physical evidences, but nowhere could we feel more plainly the certainty of the antiquity of man than where 9,000 years' continuous remains did not yet bring us into the vast periods of those climatic and geological changes through which man had kept up the chain of life to the present day."

Is His Soul Saved?

One of our enterprising daily papers, The News, in speaking of the passing of the noted Chinaman, Li Hung Chang, asks the question: Where is the soul of Li Hung Chang? and goes on to say that the death of the great pagan statesman has brought prominently before the Christian world the query whether the illustrious follower of Confucius can be thought, under the provisions of Christianity, to have entered into the happiness of the ransomed or to have been condemned to eternal darkness for his failure, as it is believed, to have embraced the religion of Christ. Orthodox ministers generally are adverse to judging of his fate.

The Rev. Johnston Myers of the Immanuel Baptist church says that if the distinguished Chinaman had none of the salvation of Christ he is lost. In contrast with this view is that of the Rev. W. B. Thorp of the South Congregational church. "It depends on character," said the latter pastor.

Jenkin Lloyd Jones said that the great Asian stands wholly on his merits as a man. The Rev. J. K. Mason of St. Paul's Universalist church expressed his belief that the soul of the dead statesman "is reposing on the bosom of infinite love."

It was said by an authority on the trend of religious views to-day that the reticence of the majority of Christian ministers to believe that Li Hung Chang would be condemned for his neglect to enter into a profession of the Christian religion indicates a marked change from the attitude of the Christian ministry of twenty years ago.

Among the ministers who were seen by a reporter for the Daily News, these expressed themselves:

The Rev. J. K. Mason, St. Paul's Universalist church: "I believe men all are naturally immortal, and made in the image of God. When the body dies the spirit returns to God who gave it. All men are children of God by nature and He treats them in this world or any other world as a wise and loving father treats the members of his human family. The disposition of the soul of Li Hung Chang would depend on what he is in himself, not on his outward religion as professed. A good man, whatever his creed or nationality may be, in my opinion need fear no evil in this world or in the world to come. I have no doubt that this great statesman rests to-day on the bosom of infinite love."

The Rev. W. B. Thorp, pastor of the South Congregational church: "The question of the salvation of Li Hung Chang or any other Chinese is simply the question of how far he possessed those qualities of character which are illustrated in Jesus Christ and which constitute the only ground of hope which any man has of eternal life."

The Rev. Johnston Myers of the Immanuel Baptist church: "If Li Hung Chang had in any way a part in Christ's salvation he is saved. If he had not he is lost. Only those who belong to Christ are saved. Whether a man belonged to Christ no one can decide or judge after he is dead."

The Rev. Jenkin Lloyd Jones, All Souls' church: "Li Hung Chang stands on his merits to-day, as he did last week. He is estimated by the law of specific gravity which holds in the spiritual world. He is estimated by his works and by the light that was given him. Immortality is not a thing that hangs upon the whims of the individual creed. We go up or down together. There as here what is good endures, what is bad must pass away."

The Rev. R. A. Torrey of the Moody church: "I do not wish to pose as the judge of Li Hung Chang, but if I express an opinion I must say that I believe there is only one way to salvation and that is by a personal acceptance of Jesus Christ. If he accepted the Savior he is saved. If he did not he is lost. Of course, if he really accepted Him he would make an outward profession, but whether he did or not, I cannot tell. We have only fragmentary and unreliable information concerning him, in so far as I know. Good works could only save the perfect man and there are no perfect men."

Outlining the doctrine of the Roman Catholic church on the abode of souls of non-Catholics after death, the Rev. George D. Heldmann, pastor of St. Paul's German Roman Catholic church, West 22d place and Hoyne avenue, said: "As Roman Catholics we believe in hell, purgatory and heaven, and that souls after death are relegated to one of these. Believing in the supreme truth of the Catholic religion, those outside of our faith are not excluded from eternal happiness if they, by invincible ignorance, are not aware of the true doctrines of our church in so far that they have had no opportunity of becoming acquainted with them, or that, they believing earnestly in their own religion, live up to its doctrines and precepts, convinced that they are in the right. While the Catholic church is unchangeable in its faith and asks strict adherence to its tenets from its members, it condemns not the person outside of the church, but their false doctrines, and knows full well that there is not only a God of justice, but also of mercy."

There is a degree of interest attached to these views of Chicago ministers, whose general attitude ranges from old-fashioned orthodoxy to a pronounced modern liberalism. It is worthy of notice that orthodox ministers are far more chary of passing their judgment upon the status of departed "souls" that never professed to believe according to the orthodox standard of a "saving faith." Under the influence of an advancing tide of humanitarian liberalism, they are apparently more hopeful concerning the future fate and destiny of the "wicked."

A principal factor in effecting this humane change—this evolution toward a higher and better belief—has been Spiritualism, with its beautiful philosophy, its glorious facts, and its silent sweet pervasive influence.

INFINITE INTELLIGENCE.

Some Things That Demand Explanation.

This subject seems to fill the minds of a good many people, and its discussion, which was once thought to have been exhausted, continues to break out with more or less frequency. Down in Texas the Spiritualists have constructed a creed that seems to fill a long felt want, and as they have placed it before the reading public it becomes material for criticism. There are three articles in it that move me to touch the pen.

1. We believe in Infinite Intelligence.
2. We believe that the phenomena of nature, physical and spiritual, are the expression of Infinite Intelligence.
3. We affirm that a correct understanding of such expression, and living in accordance therewith, constitutes the true religion.

In expressing a belief in Infinite Intelligence they omit a very essential thing; they do not attempt to explain what they mean by the term, and I doubt if they could very clearly should they try.

It is a very easy matter to define finite intelligence, for an object of illustration is always at hand; but when any one grapples with the infinite kind they are getting where they can only play upon words and talk. The finite view which we are all necessarily compelled to take, is a very limited one, and one person of ordinary gumption can see about as far into the matter as another. Because Nature has, as far as we know, immutable laws or modes of motion, many people jump to the conclusion that they have found evidence of God whom they now call for convenience, Infinite Intelligence; and lots of them feel an immediate desire to pray.

If there could be seen any purpose in the endless mutations that Nature is forever engaged in, there might be some cause for thinking that intelligence played a dominant part in her movements; but reason has thus far sought in vain to discover the least sign of any plan or purpose in all the countless phenomena that greets the human vision. Life and death are forever alternating in all things, and no sooner has maturity been reached by anything, than decay and death are sure to follow. Over and over again this process is repeated, and from present indications will be, until the end of time and a while afterwards.

Why this building up and tearing to pieces; why this eternal feeding of one form of life upon another with such methods of cruelty and heartlessness that every sensitive human being is shocked? Has Infinite Intelligence no heart, or is Nature simply a huge machine that runs on and on without self-consciousness or feeling? The phenomena which we behold leads me to accept the automatic machine explanation, for I cannot believe in heartless intelligence that delights in or seemingly approves of pain and suffering.

We believe, says this creed, that the phenomena of Nature are the expression of Infinite Intelligence. Let us look at some of them. I have seen a snake swallow a toad alive, and it is one of the ways devised by this new God for snakes to live. To me it seems horrible that one form of life should be endowed with such instincts, and when I consider the gopher snake in this State, which lives principally by swallowing live gophers, that bright, pretty but destructive pest to vegetation, I am lost in wonder that Infinite Intelligence should select such a way to keep life in the disgusting form of a reptile. The big fish in the sea eat up the little ones, though I have no doubt life to them is just as dear and desirable as to those of a larger growth; but Infinite Intelligence has willed—if we accept a belief in him—that might shall make right in all this never-ending struggle of life forms to continue existence. The survival of the fittest is nothing but success to the strong or the cunning, and as one form of life cannot live without some other form to sustain it, this carnage goes on forever.

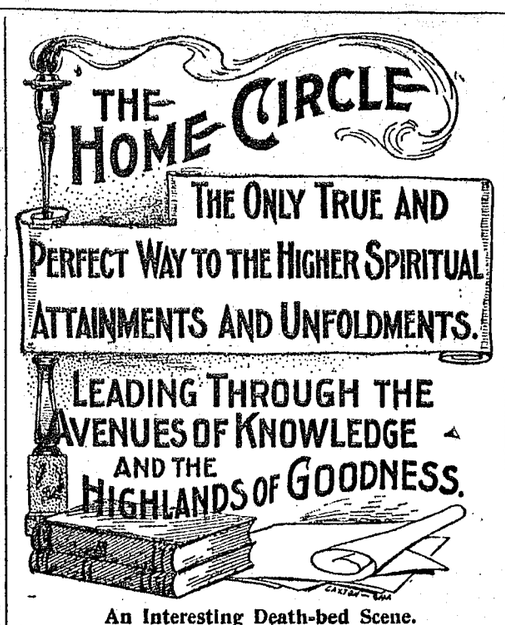
I refuse to believe in intelligence that would not be shocked at the sight and knowledge of the physical suffering and misery that pervades this world, and it will require more than one Texas creed to harmonize my ideas of goodness and mercy with the works of Infinite Intelligence.

If we rise above the brute creation, we find such fiendish acts going on between man and man that the soul is sick with horror. We find that cannibals are still killing and eating their fellow-men on the face of this old earth; and furthermore we know that if the history of wars and military murders was omitted from the record of the human race, it would hardly make reading matter enough to fill an ordinary newspaper. Blood, blood, blood! is the history of life on this globe, being shed in some form or other.

Ask yourselves, you who give the subject any thought, why does Infinite Intelligence permit or insure such things? If there is a fixed purpose in all these horrors that attend life on this globe, I admit my inability to see it, and call upon those who have the "light" to let it shine for general enlightenment.

Excavations made and being made in the bosom our universal Mother, show that so called high states of civilization preceded ages of barbarism, through which the world afterwards passed; and more and more is prehistorical evidence being found to sustain the claim of Voltaire, that alternation from barbarism to civilization, same as day and night alternate, is the fixed fate of humanity on this old earth. For what purpose all this? Ask the believer in Infinite Intelligence. Why must nations ever rise and fall; why must progress go so far and regression then set in; why must wars ever be a feature of human life, and an eternal conflict rage between every sentient form of life in the effort to exist? These are questions that require time and thought, and yet I presume there are many ready to answer them offhand, so familiar are they with Infinite Intelligence and his plans.

We affirm, says the Texas creed, that a correct understanding of the phenomena of Nature—otherwise the expression of Infinite Intelligence—and living in accordance therewith, constitutes the true religion. This Intelligence is manifested in so many ways we will always be kept busy trying to live in "accordance therewith," but how "true religion" is found to be composed of our endless efforts to fight and propitiate the forces of Nature, is beyond my power to conceive. The remark if properly labeled would come under the head of twaddle, for it means nothing.



The bite of a rattlesnake is just as much the expression of Infinite Intelligence as any act performed by mortal man; for the same force that acts through one manifests in the other. All through the works of Nature death and disease lurk in the footsteps of man, and if Infinite Intelligence is the responsible source of these things, let us not while inclined to pray or talk about divine love, forget them.

We know that the divinely appointed home of the tape-worm is in mortal man's stomach, and that numerous worms and parasites live within his "earth form;" and yet some of us—Brother Hull, for instance—are so dissatisfied with the works of Infinite Intelligence that we take medicine to remove them! If Infinite Intelligence designed the tape-worm to live there in peace and harmony, also in the midst of plenty, I would rise as a rational being to inquire if a wrong act is not committed when Mr. Worm is expelled?

In conclusion I will refer to the recent death of a neighbor and the uncommon manner in which Infinite Intelligence brought it about. While lying on a sick-bed it is thought a blowfly laid eggs in one of his nostrils; anyway that cavity soon filled with such products as the blow-fly makes, and death resulted when they reached his brain. The M. Ds. consider it a most remarkable case; but let us not forget that with Infinite Intelligence all things are possible, though some lead us to wonder where "Infinite love," of which we hear so much, has any connection. Still an unbeliever, I am yours, for more light,

An Interesting Death-bed Scene.

I.

The various planes of life in which the human family move are wonderfully diversified—so much so that those moving in the higher range, if they will only look down, they will find some one who needs their kind ministrations and assistance. The great trouble to-day in connection with the ordinary mortal, his vision is too much concentrated on the planes of life above him, and too little on those struggling on the planes beneath.

Humanity are all interlinked, a magnificent chain evolved through the instrumentality of those laws inherent in the Universe of matter and spirit. The one below you belongs to the grand brotherhood of man, and you can not, in the economy of creation, separate yourself entirely from him. He is on a different plane, it is true, and on you in a measure depends his advancement.

The one who hoards his gold is called a miser.

The one who has the power to assist others, and does not do it, hoarding his possibilities for good for his own selfish ends, is equally a miser.

The chief end of existence should not be centered altogether in seeking happiness. The one who makes that his principal aim must be supremely selfish.

The one who, with supreme satisfaction, can satiate his appetite at a fashionable dinner and guzzle down wine of a vintage of twenty years ago, without thinking of those who go to bed hungry and suffering from cold, does not possess a particle of spirituality; he is as destitute of divine qualities as the desert is of verdure and flowers.

The one who lives for self alone, constantly seeking self-aggrandisement, is a pauper spiritually.

The flower glistening with rainbow-tinted hues, and sending forth its exhilarating aroma owes something to the stem or twig on which it rests so queenly; the twig owes something to the roots which repose so placidly in the soil; the roots are under a deep and lasting obligation to the soil from which they extract nourishment; the soil could not send forth its life-giving and flower-making properties without the co-operation of the rays of the sun; and the rays of the sun could not accomplish a beneficent purpose without the efficient co-operation of the genial rain; the rain could not exist had it not been for the elements that compose water.

The fact is, the material and spiritual worlds are interlinked, and one could go on indefinitely illustrating that sublime fact. You destroy or annihilate one link, and the forces of the universe would cease to act properly. If nature's forces—material and spiritual—are so interlinked, so is the whole human family. The miser, who never for a moment considers the welfare of others, who lives exclusively for self, is a distorted link in the economy of creation, just as much as the idiot is. Where would the beautiful flower be without the stem on which it rests? Where would the stem be without the root? The root without the soil? The soil without rain and sunshine? and so on throughout infinity. However low, debased, licentious and ignorant a person may be you can not destroy his identity, materially and spiritually, without disrupting the entire human family, leading to chaos.

II.

As we have remarked before the one who hoards his possibilities for good is a miser in the most comprehensive meaning of that word, for he lives exclusively for self, forgetting that he is only a little link in the vast brotherhood of man; but much worse is he who not only hoards his possibilities for good, but actually uses them for the debasement of others. The daily papers contained a typical case, when they chronicled the death by suicide of a servant girl, Sarah O'Brine, who had been seduced by a wealthy young society man; whose name was carefully suppressed on account of the death of the principal witness against him. Miss O'Brine was a young woman of remarkable beauty, retired in her ways and manners, and in a measure uncultured, yet she seemed to be the central magnet that attracted the attention of Mr. X. Her winsome ways, her modesty, her cheerfulness, her face at times illuminated with a sweetness that would adorn the features of an angel, would naturally attract one who had no other thought than his own selfish, sensual gratification, while one of such unsullied innocence would fall an easy victim to the wiles of such a villain. Mr. X. clandestinely sought her company, and under the promise of a future marriage, effected her ruin. Then followed her discharge as a servant, her complete abandonment by one who had led her astray, and her final death by suicide.

III.

Thus one can see the evil that can be wrought by a person who hoards his possibilities for good, and turns them into a channel for actual evil. Such a person is a menace to society, an enemy to purity, an unclean wretch—worse than a gold-miser, for his hoarded possibilities are used to debase others.

IV.

While there are many sad and brutal scenes on this earth where fast young men ruin unsuspecting young girls, thereby weaving a net-work of darkness around themselves, there are also sad and beautiful scenes—scenes intermingled with extreme sorrow and with joys that transcend the loftiest imagination to describe. The angels seem to be there with a smile of transcendent loveliness beaming on their features. The very windows of heaven appear to open through which are reflected the glories of the spirit realms. One can then hear the whispers of exalted spirits and feel the vibrations that come from loving hearts. Such a scene was lately portrayed by the Chicago Chronicle, in the death of Charles Wedge, of North Chicago. It sets forth that after three days of unconsciousness he suddenly rallied one Friday night at his home, sat up in bed, like an Angel of Light, sang a verse of "Nearer, My God, to Thee," and fell back upon the pillow dead.

He had been ill with typhoid fever for several weeks. He became weaker and weaker, until he could not lift his hand. Finally he lapsed into unconsciousness and for three days his life was despaired of.

On the night of his death the members of his family had gathered about his bedside, expecting the end at any minute. The sick man's breathing became fainter and fainter, and the watchers had just about decided that breath had left the body when the patient sat bolt upright in bed and began to sing most divinely beautiful, as if controlled by an exalted messenger of love from the spirit world.

Though he had never been known to sing before, the touching, plaintive words of the old hymn poured from his lips in a volume and melody that startled the watchers as something supernatural. They could not believe that a man who but a moment before had been unable to move could sing with such angelic sweetness, as if the very fires of heaven's poets were pulsating within his soul. On through the first verse of the hymn the singer went, while the watchers sat in awe. Then, turning to his wife, the sick man grasped her hand and appeared as if about to speak. He said nothing, however, but in a moment began to sing again. The tune was still the same—that of the old hymn which has been the last consolation of President McKinley and many others who were about to pass into the great unknown—but the words were different. From some unknown, to them, spring of inspiration there came poetry, fitting into the cadence of the tune.

V.

The dying scene was not only sad, but joyous; there was a blending of the human and the divine; there, at this dying scene, was the midway station between heaven and earth where mortals and immortals could meet and hold sweet converse.

The dying man, in tones of ineffable sweetness, was addressing his mother, who had passed away years before to the realms of soul. The burden of the song was that he saw the angels and heard them calling him on and that he would meet her across the river—a beautiful picture indeed—one of sadness to mortals, but one of great joy to the immortals.

When the song was ended the dying man held out his hands as if reaching for something and then sank back on his pillow dead. He had seen his mother; he had seen ministering spirits, and fully realized the wonderful change taking place.

Mrs. Wedge was very much affected by the touching deathbed scene. She became hysterical and had to be comforted by other members of the family until a physician was called to attend her.

Mrs. Otis Harvey, a sister-in-law of the dead man, was present at his death.

"We had never known Charles to sing before," she said. "It had always been understood that he had no voice. On the last night of his life, however, he sang as I have never heard a person sing before. The voice was not his. I am sure that there was some divine influence speaking through him, giving a message to those he left behind."

VI.

If you wish to die like Charles Wedge, don't hoard your possibilities for doing good, like a miser, but let those possibilities be used for making others happy, in cheering the despondent, in giving a helping hand in the hour of distress. Mohammed said:

"Every good act is charity: Your smiling in your brother's face; your putting a wanderer in the right road; your giving water to the thirsty, is charity; exhortation to another to do right is charity. A man's true wealth hereafter is the good he has done in this world to his fellowmen. When he dies people will ask, What property has he left behind? But the angels will ask, What good deeds has he sent before him?

Remember, then, that the poor and unfortunate you always have with you. They belong to the great human family, and he who can, but will not kindly assist them in the struggles of life, is hoarding his possibilities for good like a miser his gold, and can only enter the very lowest strata of spirit life when death finally ends his earthly career. Heed the lesson this Home Circle Sermon imparts.

The Longest Pocket-book and the N. S. A.

To the Editor:—As the matter of representation in the N. S. A. seems to be under discussion yet, I should like to say a few words more on the subject. I do not think the full payment of per capita tax for fifty or more members by the small societies, that really have a much smaller membership, has ever been questioned, that is where they had two delegates.

I now have in my possession a letter from one who is within the inner circle of the N. S. A., urging us to raise all the per capita tax we can for next year, and send in a large number of delegates from our state. Nothing is said in the letter about actual membership. I understood while at convention that societies with a very small membership, by paying large per capita tax, had two delegates. Possibly I was misinformed, but I thought my information was good.

All of the above has caused me to think that it is not the society with the largest number of members who has the most delegates on the floor of the N. S. A. conventions, but the society with the longest pocket-book.

In these expressions I do not aim to attack any individual, but the system.

THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER

15 CENTS! 15 CENTS!

Three Months Trial Subscriptions to New Subscribers.

Owing to the unparalleled interest in the Hull-Jamieson debate, and desiring to spread it broadcast among Spiritualists and Freethinkers, we will, until January 1, 1902, receive trial subscriptions for The Progressive Thinker THREE MONTHS for 15 cents—less than cost to us. This offer is made to NEW subscribers only, with the hope of getting them interested in Spiritualism. Bear that fact in mind. Every Spiritualist, every Freethinker, every Christian—in fact everybody should read this debate. There will be other attractions—a vast amount of miscellaneous matter will appear of special interest and value each week.

SOME REFLECTIONS.

On Sir Robert Ball and the Moon.

Sir Robert Ball is an Irish astronomer. He is not an orator. I heard him Nov. 5, on "Time and Tide." There was nothing essentially new in his lecture, but it was an interesting survey of familiar truths. Some of them may not be familiar to all your readers. But if they are truth is always interesting to thinkers; for though always old as nature, they are yet always new in the turn of events, which always present new relations. But Sir Robert presented some new theories that may, or may not, be the correct interpretation of nature—past and future. That the moon causes the tides is a familiar conclusion from the coincidence of phenomena. Yet it may be questioned. Does any man know that the tides are caused by the moon? I believe they are, and I see no good reason for doubting it, but I cannot say I know it. But there is another statement made by Sir Robert Ball, that may be less certain, and unprovable. Since the world revolves on its axis in 23 hours and 56 minutes now, what reason is there for thinking it was ever any less or more, or that it will ever be more or less? By Newton's first law, a body once set in motion will continue it without variation forever, if there be no resistance. As the earth rolls in a frictionless ether or an absolute void, and has no bearings at the poles, to retard its action, it should revolve with uniform velocity always. But Sir Robert says it does not. He holds that the real day is constantly growing longer. That there was a time when the earth revolved in one-fourth the time it now requires for one revolution.

Just how he found that out he did not inform us. Perhaps he has a remarkable memory and is able to recall the events of that far-off time and spike them to his mathematics. But after the moon was born, and partly weaned, and set up business on her own account, she kept close to her mother for several million years, slowly receding as she gained strength and character to go it alone, but always holding a sort of filial interest in her mother (father she had none!) and giving back some of her childish affection, as they spun around the sun together, keeping up a constant interchange through that mysterious natural affection called, for convenience, gravitation. But this evolution of the lunar babe made a slight variation in the order of the mother's toilet duties, and as the infant pulled at her breast, she answered with the flow of her liquid supplies, and the tides were born. They were the result of the affectional squeezes that Luna made upon her mother's breast. The granite beds and mountain chains were too stubborn to answer by any visible sign.

But the liquid was yielding and spontaneous, and as Luna flung her silvery hair over the face of the sea, the waters answered with a "liquid hymn," that rolled from shore to shore and throbbed against the rocks that bounded the opposite coast. As her nightly journeys and daily woolngs were tolerably regular, she established a corresponding ebb and and flow, to meet her morning smiles and her twilight kisses, and has kept up this affectional intimacy for all these millions of years. This is not the way Sir Robert told it, but I report the ideas in my own way. Now this tidal action is, so says Sir Robert, a cause for the variations of time in the earth's revolutions. It causes a slight retardation of the motion of the earth on her axis, and a steadily increasing length of the day.

This change was much more rapid millions of years ago than now; for the moon was nearer, and hence her expressions of affection stronger, and the tides were therefore lifted to greater heights, and with more energy. Every sob of the sea across its bed, reacts upon the earth's rotation, and adds a little to the length of the day. At present it has extended the day to 23 hours, 56 minutes. In a thousand years from now it will have extended the time to 23 hours, 56 minutes and one second! That is the day gains a second in a thousand years. In 60,000 years, then, it will have gained a minute; and in a million years it will have gained over 16 minutes!

Now we may ask if the earth's diurnal-motion diminishes at the rate of 16 minutes in a million years, how long will it be before it will stop? Will the slowing process continue forever—or until the earth ceases to revolve? If the same cause continue operative, without variation, this must be the ultimate result. Now according to Sir Robert Ball, the Irish astronomer, this is just what has happened to the moon! Once the Lunar child behaved like other children and turned over in her bed every night, and gave her old mother a chance to inspect her qualities and proportions, and see if she kept her face clean and her shoulders and spine in vigorous regularity, and behaved well all around the circle. But as she meddled with her mother's affairs and kept the ocean uneasy by her winsome woolngs, the mother reciprocated, and when Luna developed her "expanse of waters" she, too, was touched by the mysterious wand, and her seas began to ebb and flow as the earth pulled upon them by her much greater strength of gravity. As the moon was many times smaller than the earth the effect on her behavior must have been many times greater. Consequently the diminution of the moon's revolutions on her axis were much more marked and rapid. Her days grew longer and longer, and longer, as her revolutions were slower. She lingered with her face toward her mother longer each day. The shades of night put off their appearance until a later hour in the evening every day. This process continuing it is plain that in time she would forget to move at all, and slowly stop her revolutions, and thus hold her smiling face in a fixed and perpetual position, as she rolled on her way in the heavens. Supposing her poles to be horizontal to the plane of the earth's orbit, when she stopped revolving, the side that happened to be our way would stay there continually. And is this the way it has happened that we never see but one side of the moon? I cannot vouch for it, for I was not, so far as my memory serves me, present where I could watch all these changes in the moon's history. But I know of no better reason, or explanation of that singular fact. Perhaps if we had lived on earth twenty-five millions of years ago, we might have had a glimpse of the other side of the moon.

But there are millions of suns and worlds that we have not seen even on one side. And there is still a vast territory on this our own world, that we have never seen, or ever will see, until we put off our blinders and look with the eyes of the soul. When a boy I used to stagger under the thought expressed in the hymn of which four lines ran thus:

"When we've been there ten thousand years
Bright shining as the sun,
We've no less days to sing God's praise
Than when we first begun."

If we were to spend the years of eternity in perpetual song, no matter how sweet the song, we would pray for annihilation. LYMAN C. HOWE.

WHAT'S IN A NAME?

Some Thoughts in Answer to D. W. Hull.

Sometimes there is a good deal in a name. In No. 619 of The Progressive Thinker, Brother D. W. Hull has an article on "The Religion of Spiritualism." There is one word in it that I would change; would change the word religion to morality.

It is not true that "a rose by any other name would smell as sweet." A lady was enjoying a supposed delicious sirloin beefsteak; on being told it was woodchuck, she fainted. The fainting was not rancifu nor hypochondriacal, it was scientific. The avenues of the senses of taste, smell, seeing and hearing all lead to the one sense of feeling in the mind. Either sense affects the others. We eat with our eyes in part. How a dish looks affects the flavor. The fruit and butter put up the daintiest brings the highest price in the market.

The Progressive Thinker launched its ship flying the colors of "Science, supplemented by an exalted morality, the bible of the future." Some thought it either exceedingly rash or consummately wise. Time, study and investigation have proved that it was wisdom. It is now known that science comprehends more metaphysics, imagination, faith and reason than any other system of knowledge.

The brother is candid where he says, "if I am wrong I wish someone would enlighten me." Also where he says, "the revelations of the past are too distant for the satisfaction of our wants," proves him to be traveling in the right direction. Again his quotation of Jesus "that each age must have its own revelations," is evidence of a very progressive disposition.

Science teaches a morality that will be a panacea for all wars. Religion fosters wars. Men have lost their reason trying to harmonize religion and science. The brother is not so bigoted as to lose his reason. He will, however find it impossible to permanently unite religion and Spiritualism as to harmonize religion and science. A genuine scientist has come to know that morality is so far above religion as not to be mentioned in the same breath. There are self-styled scientists that claim to see a blending of Christianity and science. Such have received their knowledge at second hand, and often from a prejudiced second hand.

The good Brother Hull may continue to label his rose-scented Spiritualism with the blood-stained name of religion. It will please many of the Christian Spiritualists. It will provoke antagonism from many of the infidel Spiritualists. Not from all, as all have not yet had time and opportunity to weigh religion and morality on the same scales. Infidelity has far more than the church pushed the world's institutions upward.

Religion is man's relation to God. Morality is man's relation to man. The brother's article breathes a spirit of his still being more or less related to the long-time supernatural God, which accounts for his continuing to lug along the burden of religion. With no more supernatural god there cannot possibly be any more religion. Spiritualism is an exalted morality pure and simple. It is man's relation to man, just that and nothing more.

Christianity has so long taught that "though one has the whole of morality, and has not religion, he is lost," that it is difficult for many to become released from the thraldom. To exalt morality to its true position is an herculean task. Centuries hence there will still be many living in the religio-valley of the supernatural. There is nothing in Spiritualism that demands any form of worship. The great incomprehensible is Nature. The scientific knowledge of her working and how she works, and a beautiful confidence in her wisdom, is the profoundest food for the soul. To call Spiritualism an exalted morality is infinitely superior to calling it a religion.

THE TURKEY'S LAST HOPE.

Oh, I know I'll be beheaded for some hungry Christian man,
As the act for many ages has defined
the Christian plan,
Hence I know I cannot stop it with a sleek and rounded form,
But out yonder in the future I will try to make it warm.

They have murdered my companion and my children one and all,
And have kept me in confinement in a close and filthy stall,
But I'll watch for them up yonder and get even with them there;
I shall feast upon the vision of the murderers at prayer.

It is human, it is Christian to be holding up to God
Their own goodness on Thanksgiving with their sanctifying nod,
But 'tis turkey to be murdered to assist
this cruel fad,
It is turkey to be slaughtered just to make the Christians glad.

I shall call upon St. Peter, for I think he must be nice
And will give me such a welcome that
I'll want to meet him twice.
I shall roost there very near him on that holy golden gate
And for deacons and the preachers I will patiently await.

Yes, I want to meet St. Peter, and for ages sit close by,
And when Christians ask admission I will signal with one eye;
I shall tell him how they feasted on each glad Thanksgiving day,
How they killed and ate nice turkeys in a soulless kind of way.

I shall warn him 'gainst all Christians that have blood upon their hands,
And he'll point them to the furnace heated white with fiery brands.
Then I'll gobble over heaven, and I'll strut the golden street
In my most artistic fashion with a satisfaction sweet.

DR. T. WILKINS.

DEPARTING DAY.

When the day floats down like a thistle-down,
And lights up the golden West,
On my sight there beams a city of dreams
And the dear ones God has blest.
Oh soft and low
They come and go,
And my heart a-thrill can see them still
The dear ones now at rest.

I hear them sing as my heart takes wing,
And I wander the old path o'er,
And there comes in sight, like the stars
at night,
The loved ones I adore.
Ah! how long ago
Came this bitter woe,
When the North wind's gale with the boatman pale,
Left for the other shore.

Oh, wondrous and grand is the soul's dream-land,
That recalls life's spring-time days,
With the roses fair, and the dew-scent
air,
And the aisles of sunset rays.
I can see them yet,
Though my eyes are wet,
As I softly glide down the solemn tide,
Through Time's grievous ways.

I shall see at last the mile-stone past,
My bark will touch the shore,
And the dreams of peace, with the years increase,
Will fade from my sight no more.
And my bark will stop,
As my eyelids drop,
In the scenes of light beyond mortal sight,
In the land of richest store.

PEN TRACKS OVER CROOKED PATHS.

It is only by taking an occasional retrospective view that we realize how fast we are moving. It may be well that the actors in the hurly-burly of life cannot always see how they are acting, nor realize how far along they are on life's journey. Our little church, that is the First Spiritual Church of the city of Buffalo, keeps moving. I must confess that I never enjoyed preaching to them as I now do. It does both church and preacher good to have been separated for a few months.

During my absence they had Lyman C. Howe one month, and attempted to have Carrie E. S. Twing to administer spiritual food one month. Mrs. Twing was sick, so that I think she was able to speak only two Sundays. I have heard no words except those of just praise for the work of either Mrs. Twing or Mr. Howe.

The church was kept open every Sunday all summer, and such talent as could be obtained was utilized. On the whole this was not altogether satisfactory; for while they occasionally had very fine meetings, the people did not know what to expect; and sometimes they were disappointed.

There is talent enough in our church, and in other societies in this city so that, if it was used, there would never need be any disappointments. Instead of using the talent we had, and that we knew, we sometimes invited strangers to our platform; and not always with the best of results. Our own Mrs. Atcheson is one of the best mediums in the city; but she always crowds herself to the rear. No better tests have ever been given on our platform than some which have come through her lips. She could have filled several Sundays in our temple, to good acceptance. The world it is hoped will, ere long know her better.

Miss Coats is developing a grand mediumship. We seldom get her out before the public, but when we do she always makes us wish for more. There are many mediums before the world as public exponents of the philosophy and phenomena of Spiritualism who are not half so well prepared to appear in public audiences as Miss Coats.

Mr. W. V. Nicum, of 154 Normal avenue, has in him the elements of a great inspirational speaker. Were he to devote his time to the work he would soon develop as one of our most able workers.

I wish the Spiritualists around Buffalo would keep Mr. Nicum and these ladies busy every Sunday. It would help Spiritualism in the vicinity of Buffalo. Then there is a Mrs. Chase, belonging, in fact, pastor of the First Spiritualist Church Society, who is wonderful in giving tests. While her platform is—shall I say it?—usurped by another, she ought to be kept constantly busy somewhere. Her work is too important for her to be idle.

The lyceum and Bible class in connection with the First Spiritual Church have both opened, with good prospects. The lyceum has not yet grown to its former proportions, but the interest among those who attend was never so good.

THANKSGIVING.

We are all great believers in trying to assist those who have not obtained as good seats in the theatre of life as ourselves. We have tried different methods of assisting the poor to have at least one happy day in the year. Possibly no plan will work altogether as we could desire; still we all feel that we want to do all we can to help the poor.

This year we are going to be more exclusive in our work than we ever have been before. We will try to assist our own poor, not particularly to turkey and mince pies, but to what they may need more. So our trustees have decided to extend our help generally to poor people whom we know. We will generally help them to money, to be used for food, clothing, rent, fuel, or what they may need the most. This, we are firmly convinced will be far better than to get a great turkey dinner, and advertise for the poor generally to come in and stuff themselves at our expense. We are now, Nov. 20, raising money to send out next week, directly to the worthy poor whom we know, and some of whom belong to our church.

NATIONAL CONVENTION.

I see my little article on the annual meeting of the N. S. A. has borne fruit. It has stirred our good sister Longley so that she takes up the cudgel to defend those of whom I spoke. I am glad she has done it. They sadly needed a defender; and I am sure they could not have found a better one. Now it is all over; I prefer to say very little more about it. I could not say all I would like to say without betraying some particular confidences. That I never do. I do again say the convention was like most other religious conventions; it was full of political trickery—such trickery as causes some of the western people to say: "There, you see what National Organization does; I told you so." But, no matter what was done, nor how many outsiders were shipped in to manipulate matters to make them go a certain way, nor at whose expense; it succeeded, and I hope the results will be good.

My word seems to be doubted about proxy voting. Well, I may be wrong; I have no more to say about it than that one mistook me for a fife upon which a certain tune could be played; and asked me in the greatest confidence how a number of proxies, in the hands of certain designated persons should be used? I knew that was said to pump me; but I was dry; I did not pump.

Even the National Secretary convinced me of one thing while making an effort to convince some of us of another. The thing she wanted to convince us was that New England practically paid in about all the money and therefore owned the convention. The thing which some of us were convinced of was, that that old tradition that "figures won't lie," is only a tradition. Figures can be manipulated. It was proved by those "statistics," that, really, Wisconsin had no right to say much as she had not yet sent in her dues—of course Massachusetts had. But some of us happened to know that while technically Wisconsin owes for her dues, she had twice within seven months sent in handsome presents to the N. S. A., once a little more than $15, and once over $14. Why should the youngest state in the organization be thus insulted, and her gifts thus ignored in the reading of those figures? Wisconsin had explained, that she had just closed a costly camp-meeting, and her treasury was now empty, but that the money would surely come.

I assure everybody that the Wisconsin representative felt that thrust too keenly to attempt to reply.

Now, let us allow all these matters to pass. All the guns which, in that convention were turned against each other, I am sure will, at least, until the next convention be turned against the foes of Spiritualism.

I never had the least feeling in this matter except such as I always had in such cases. My sympathies are ever with the under dog in any fight. I am built that way; I cannot help it. The fact is, I am so generally a part and parcel of that under dog, that, possibly I have a selfish interest in him.

Next year the convention will be held in Boston, and the question is, will it pay the West to go? or could the amount of money it would cost them to go there to be voted down on every proposition, be used in the cause to more advantage in other directions? When I say the West, I do not simply mean Ohio, as Mrs. Longley does. My West extends as far as Illinois, Wisconsin, Minnesota. Yes, it crosses both the Mississippi and Missouri rivers, and goes into Nebraska, Colorado and California. The money that it would cost to send delegates from all these and other Western states, to Boston, if sent in as a donation to the N. S. A., even though it should be forgotten, when telling how little certain states have done, would help the N. S. A. to keep its missionaries at work. When I spoke of the West staying away, I did it in the interest of the cause. I honestly meant that their money would be of more use to the cause than their presence would be as delegates.

There! I think I have said my last word on this matter. "Let the dead bury their dead."

THE MORRIS PRATT INSTITUTE.

Well, we have a college building. The venerable Morris Pratt, out of the greatness of his heart, offered a little more than forty thousand dollars worth of property and money to the N. S. A., provided it would raise ten thousand dollars more as an endowment fund. It seemed to me that that was altogether the greatest offer ever made to Spiritualists. I could not see how anybody could look at it in any other light. But they did; I embraced the very first opportunity, on the first day of the convention to present the magnanimous offer of this grand old man. It seemed to me that right there and then the ten thousand dollars could have been raised within fifteen minutes. As poor as I was, without a cent on earth, I was going to volunteer to raise five hundred dollars of it.

Well, the convention voted to accept this magnificent gift. They even appointed a committee of able and honorable men to go, examine the property, and close with this liberal octogenarian. There, the thing stopped; not a penny was raised, nor a minute spent in any effort in that direction.

This was worse than a "wet blanket" to the feelings of the one who had put in years of time and thirty-seven thousand dollars of hard-earned money in this work. The old gentleman was anxious to know what could be depended upon.

Brother Alonzo Thompson, alone of the committee called to see the property. He admired it; he thought it one of the grandest gifts that could be made; but when he told Mr. Pratt that if the N. S. A. accepted his offer it must come "without any strings to it," the fat was in the fire. Bro. Thompson was in a hurry to get home. He spoke most positively in favor of the movement, and gave us to understand that individually he would help the thing along all he could.

Mrs. Clara L. Stewart had been at work like the heroine she is, in the matter—she had done all in her power. Now the jig was up; the time had come when the whole matter must be settled; so she telegraphed me again, and again. Finally I went; we got Hon. William H. Rogers, one of Wisconsin's most able attorneys, and an out-and-out Spiritualist to come from Madison and advise us. We had the utmost confidence in his judgment, his knowledge of law, and his integrity. He even consented to become one of the seven trustees to whom the deed was made.

We now own a grand college building made of Milwaukee brick—one that will last through the millennium, even though that millennium does not begin within a few hundred years of the time our good Adventist friends suppose. We put two members of the board of trustees of the N. S. A. on the board of trustees of the Morris Pratt Institute. Of course we wanted the college deeded directly to the N. S. A., and as president of the M. P. I., I would gladly transfer the property to the N. S. A. tomorrow, if it will carry out Mr. Pratt's design in the matter.

A truer statement was never made than one made by Mr. Townsend in his great speech when he said, "We must unite or perish." I will put a prediction by the side of Mr. Townsend's statement; and will risk my reputation as a prophet on its fulfillment. Here, Mr. Printer, put this in capital letters,

WE MUST EDUCATE OR PERISH!

The curiosity phase of Spiritualism has had its day. People will not longer go to our meetings as they would to a circus. Already the question is being asked on every hand, "Where are your institutions of learning?" We have had over a half century in which to build up schools; and some of us are ashamed to longer make the humiliating confession that we have none. The time has come when we must present a ministry equal in intelligence to those whom the churches invite the world to hear. If we do not we must accept the consequences, the first of which is desertion by the people.

Thirty years ago my boast was, we have the young people. Our audiences at that time were made up mostly of people from fifteen to forty years old. How is it now? Go to any audience of Spiritualists for your answer.

When a young man or young woman wishes to go into the ministry now, they want to go onto the platform as well prepared as those who enter the ministry in the other churches, and they will.

The theological partition walls are rapidly decaying and falling. Very liberal sentiments can now be uttered in the most of the churches. Those wishing to enter the ministry do not care to be ostracised on account of having entered the ministry in a society where they are either opposed to education, or are too indolent, or too stingy to educate those who are to represent them before the world.

I know more than a dozen cities where Spiritualists—good Spiritualists—seldom, if ever, go to a Spiritualist meeting simply because they are ashamed of the ignorant platitudes which are handed out in the name of Spiritualism. Once more, I say, we must educate our workers; if we do not we must perish, as we ought. "The kingdom will be taken from us and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof."

BOOKS, BOOKS, BOOKS.

The first large book I wrote after becoming a Spiritualist was entitled "Question Settled," and the second, which was really the second part of the first, bore the title, "The Contrast." This was a comparison of the Theology called Evangelicalism, with Modern Spiritualism. These books, I have no doubt have made more converts to Spiritualism than any other one book in the world. After they went through several editions I re-arranged them and allowed Brother Francis to bring out a volume of them under the general title, "Twe in One." The two volumes in one were sold for the same price that we had before sold each of the separate volumes. That edition has been exhausted, and now I have allowed Brother Francis to bring out one more edition, under the title, "Two Volumes in One." It is more beautiful than ever, and has about five hundred pages. It can be had of either Mr. Francis or myself for one dollar. It is one of the best holiday presents that can be made to a friend who has begun studying Spiritualism. It contains the substance of eighteen of the best lectures I ever delivered.

Several years since Mrs. Hull and I brought out a very nice volume of her poems, under the title of "Wayside Jottings." That book has had a good sale, and has carried consolation to thousands of weary hearts. Mrs. Hull now has in press another volume of her very latest and finest poems, entitled "Spirit Echoes." No more handsome or acceptable holiday present could be made than a copy of that book. It can be had, either of us in Buffalo, or at The Progressive Thinker office, for one dollar. We have the promise of having it ready for delivery on the tenth of December.

MOSES HULL.

THE N. S. A.

Facts Are More Important than Fancies.

Boston was not chosen as the place for holding the 1902 convention of the N. S. A. without much deliberation. That question received more consideration than was awarded other very vital matters by the late assembly at Washington. Every city wishing to submit an invitation and special inducements for its acceptance was given a hearing before a select committee. Nothing was heard from any Pacific Coast cities. The question was then made a special order for a fixed hour on a succeeding day. The committee having the matter in charge recommended Boston. The choice practically rested between Milwaukee and Boston. Very unexpectedly to many friends of the former city, Mrs. Stewart, president of the Wisconsin State Association, for reasons not clearly understood by most of the delegates, arose when the hour for action arrived and withdrew the Milwaukee invitation, so the recommendation of the committee was adopted without opposition.

It should be borne in mind that the annual conventions of the N. S. A. have never been held in Boston, that her delegations have been large and useful factors in all the sessions at Washington, Chicago and Cleveland, and that the Beaneaters promise such wealth of attractions that no one who enjoys them will regret their victory. The historical old city is believed to hold a good many Spiritualists besides its dominating element of Catholicism.

Further, the choice for 1902 means that the meeting must come West in 1903. St. Louis was practically chosen for the latter year, in so far as informal unanimity could make the selection. The reduced railroad rates certain for that season ought to make the convention in the Mississippi Valley notable for is large attendance form all parts of the country. This may be still more increased by holding in connection with the N. S. A., an International Convention of Spiritualists from all parts of the world, drawn by the formal celebration of the Louisiana Purchase.

I do not believe that, on second thought, Bro. R. F. Little, of Seattle, will feel that this season's delegates made "so egregious a blunder" in selecting Boston for next year. The Western delegates so voting certainly had the future in view.

It was not in evidence at Washington "that the state organizations doing the most effective work are East." On the contrary the East is working largely through local societies which refuse to surrender the charters they hold direct from the N. S. A. and accept new ones from their own state associations. This has given them excessive representation in the past. The Western state associations may yet have to send missionaries East in order to get Brothers Locke and Stevens, of Pennsylvania, and Brother Hatch of New England, together with their cohorts, into orderly and equitable array.

The corpse that was so ill-mannered as to sit up in the coffin before its own funeral rites were finished, was in evidence at the Washington meeting. The echoes of President Barrett's stirring utterances on the demise of local societies had not died away, and the rest of us were still standing around mopping our eyes with the zeal that befits chief mourners, when it was suddenly discovered in Washington that local societies were distressingly alive. An extra hat was necessary to hold the ballots those of the Northeast gave President Barrett, while Bro. Sprague's pockets were not capacious enough to conceal the proxies of the Indiana locals. Hereafter let us be certain we have a veritable corpse before we hold funeral services.

The Western workers are loyal to the local, State and National Associations. Eastern Spiritualists seem devoted to the local and National, but lukewarm towards State Associations, as the West understands the latter's scope. These good folks of Sun-rise Land are gradually developing up to a point where they will realize that the real interests of our cause are broader than the circumference of a twenty-five-cent piece. We are just now undergoing the crucial strain for our method of organization. We began at the top to build down to the local society, instead of at the foundation and on up to the roof. There is undoubtedly a greater strain under the plan chosen, but the end in view is nearing attainment. Either method ultimates in representation for the local in the State and through the latter in the National.

Let us cultivate tolerance and patience. Compromise of differences will result from mutual concessions inspired by genuine fairness. We seek a common end. Justice must and will be done. GEO. B. WARNE.

A LARGE ENTERPRISE.

Mr. Willard J. Hull, the editor of the Light of Truth, is desirous of saying to our readers that Mr. Townsend, the proprietor of the paper he edits, is conducting a large enterprise that Mr. Hull is confident is destined to meet with eminent success. In conducting the affairs of this company, he says Mr. Townsend is soliciting capital and employing a great many people as agents, and asks any of our readers who may feel inclined, to correspond with Mr. James B. Townsend, Lima, Ohio, for full particulars.

"Invisible Helpers." By C. W. Leadbeater, the noted Theosophist lecturer and writer. Very interesting. Price 55 cents. For sale at this office.

The TRUTH about HYPNOTISM

The real secrets of this mysterious power are laid bare in a 100 page book sent free by the New York Institute of Science. These secrets have been jealously guarded by the masters of the occult sciences for ages. The inside truths are now revealed for the first time by the greatest living hypnotist in the world. He tells you how to acquire the power and use it to better your condition in life; how to secretly influence and control the minds and actions of those around you; how to gain wealth and renown; how to cure bad habits; how to develop Personal Magnetism; how to become a powerful magnetic healer and cure diseases without the aid of drugs or medicines; how to perform hundreds of mystifying and startling experiments. The book mentioned is elegantly illustrated and gotten up at great expense. It is requested that only those especially interested write for it. Address New York Institute of Science, Dept. , Rochester, N. Y.

THE SPIRITUAL SIGNIFICANCE.

A VERY IMPORTANT WORK.

The Spiritual Significance is by Lilian Whiting, author of "The World Beautiful," "After Her Death," "Kate Field, A Record," "A Study of Elizabeth Barrett Browning," Cloth, $1.00.

Miss Whiting finds the title of her new book in these lines from "Aurora Leigh:"

"If a man could feel
Not one, but every day, feast, fast, and working-day,
The spiritual significance burn through
The hieroglyphic of material shows,
Henceforward he would paint the globe with wings."

The aim of this book is to reveal the curiously close correspondence between the developments of modern science and spiritual laws; to note that new forces, as discovered and applied in wireless telegraphy, are simply laws of an unseen realm into which humanity is rapidly advancing and thus gaining a new environment. From this evolutionary progress, as illustrated by physical science the author of "The World Beautiful" continues the same argument presented in those volumes in a plea that the future life is the continuation and development of our present life in all its faculties and powers, and that the present may be ennobled by the constant sense of the Divine Presence, and a truer knowledge of the nature of man and his relations to God tend to a higher morality and increasing happiness. The book is characterized by the same essential style and qualities that have insured for "The World Beautiful" volumes an almost world-wide popularity.

OTHER BOOKS BY LILIAN WHITING:

Kate Field, A Record. Price $2.

A Study of Elizabeth Barrett Browning. Price $1.25.

The World Beautiful. Three Series. Each $1.

From Dreamland Sent, and Other Poems. $1. These books are for sale at this office.

LISBETH.

An Interesting Story of Two Worlds.

Elevating, Fascinating, Instructive Throughout.

This work by Carrie E. S. Twing is exceptionally interesting. She well says: "These characters which have brought out the highest and lowest in different religious beliefs, have moved me, not I them." The whole book is interesting, fascinating, and instructive. Price $1.00.

Self Contradictions of the Bible.

One hundred and forty-four propositions, theological, moral, historical and speculative; each proved affirmatively and negatively by quotations from Scripture, without comment. Price, 15 cents.

The Devil and the Adventists.

An Adventist attack on Spiritualism repudiated. By Moses Hull. Price 10 cents.

The Development of the Spirit

After Transition. By the late M. Faraday. The origin of religions, and their influence upon the mental development of the human race. Price, 10 cents.

THE VOICES By Warren Sumner Barlow. The Voices contain poems of remarkable beauty and force. They are most excellent. Price $1.00.

The Koran Commonly called the "Alkoran of Mohammed." The standard Arabian or Mohammedan Bible. Cloth, $1.00

THUMBSCREW AND RACK.

Torture implements employed in the 15th and 16th centuries for the promulgation of Christianity, with pictorial illustrations. By George E. Macdonald. Price, 10 cents.

LIFE OF THOMAS PAINE.

By the Editor of the National, with Preface and Notes by Peter Eckler. Illustrated with views of the old Paine Homestead and Paine Monument, at New Rochelle; also portraits of Thomas Clio Rickman, Joel Barlow, Mary Wolstonecraft, Madame Roland, Condorcet, Brissot, and the most prominent of Paine's friends in Europe and America. Cloth, 75 cents.

Discovery of a Lost Trail

BY CHARLES B. NEWCOMB,

Author of "All's Right with the World." Cloth 320 pages. Mr. Newcomb made a distinct success with "All's Right with the World," which continues in the front rank of the Metaphysical books that are now so popular. The great number who have been cheered and strengthened by him will welcome another book by the wise teacher whose words of help are doing so much to make the world better by making men and women better able to understand and enjoy it.

"Discovery of a Lost Trail"

is a simple study of that strange and beautiful thing called life, but grand in its scholarly simplicity. It will be in demand by many who have not previously read metaphysical writings. Price $1.50. For sale at this office.

INVISIBLE HELPERS

A Very Excellent and Comprehensive Work.

One from the Theosophical Standpoint.

This work, "Invisible Helpers," written by C. W. Leadbeater, the remarkable English psychic (whose lectures have graced the columns of The Progressive Thinker), is certainly very interesting and suggestive throughout. It treats of the "Universal Belief in the Invisible Helpers," the "Angel Story," "Work Among the Dead," "What Lies Beyond." The work is neatly bound in cloth, and the price is 55 cents.

..GENERAL SURVEY..

THE SPIRITUALISTIC FIELD—ITS WORKERS, DOINGS, ETC., THE WORLD OVER.

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best subserved thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet we wish it distinctly understood that our space is inadequate to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that The Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy, to insure insertion in the paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require. Every item sent to us for publication, should contain the full name and address of the writer. We desire to know the source of every item that appears. This rule will be strictly adhered to.

Keep copies of your poems sent to this office, for they will not be returned if we have not space to use them.

Bear in mind that all notices for this page are cut down to suit the space we have to occupy when received.

Take due notice, that all items for this page must be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer. It will not do to say that Secretary or Correspondent writes so and so, without giving the full name and address of the writer. The items of those who do not comply with this request will be cast into the waste basket.

The executive board of the Indiana Spiritualists' State organization has ordered architects to prepare plans for a new auditorium for Camp Chesterfield that will have a seating capacity of three thousand people, and to submit their drawings December 3. The association will sell hotel and other privileges hereafter, instead of operating the places themselves.

Frank T. Ripley has the Sundays of January, February and March open for engagements. Address all letters to him at No. 828 South Burdick street, Kalamazoo, Mich.

The Philadelphia Ledger has the following from Reading, Pa.: "Warned in a dream that he had but four days to five, James K. Phillips, a young farmer, told two of his friends of the strange message. Last week, within the time fixed in his dream for his death, he was killed by a tree, which he had chopped down, falling on him."

John C. Hemmeter writes from Cleveland, O.: "The Spiritual cause has acquired a new developing medium in Mrs. Lena Wolff, of this city, who made her debut within the past month before several societies here. Her phase of mediumship is clairvoyance and clairaudience. The ladies of the several societies mentioned assembled at her residence, No. 172 Auburn street, on her forty-second anniversary. A luncheon was served, whereupon the sister demonstrated her psychic powers in a number of experiments, all of which were successful and well received; in addition, commending her control, Morning Glory."

Subjects of lectures given by Helen P. Russegue in Springfield, Mass., Sunday, Nov. 3: Afternoon lecture—"What Is the Law that Governs Life and Leads to the Broader Spirituality of Man?" Evening lecture—"What Has Contributed Most to the Religious and Intellectual Development of the Age?" Subjects of lectures given at the same place, Nov. 10: Afternoon lecture—"The Spiritualism of Forty Years, and What It Promises for Forty Years to come." Evening lecture—"What Is Our Symbolism and What Constitutes the forms of Our Worship?"

The Wheeling (W. Va.) Register has the following: "The Wheeling Society of Spiritualists, of which Mr. Henry Brunhaus is the head, have decided to establish a monthly paper in this city. Medium J. G. Hinderer, now here, where he intends to locate permanently, is to be the editor. He says the new paper will be 'non-controversial,' and will be backed by the National Association of Spiritualists which has its headquarters at Columbus." We don't think the N. S. A. is backing this enterprise. It has enough to do in other lines without dabbling in the newspaper business.

Mrs. Ella Dare writes: "Better and stronger the paper grows with every issue. Surely it has set for itself an herculean task—the cleavage of rock-set prejudice, and the planting of truth seeds in the interstices. May it conquer and lead legions of hungry souls out into fruitful fields."

The Chicago Chronicle has the following from New York: "The baptism of nine converts to the Holy Ghost and Us society, a ceremony which was performed in the icy waters of the harbor, has attracted some attention to the belief of this society and to its leader, Rev. Frank W. Sanford, who claims to be a special agent of the Lord to warn the people that the second advent is at hand and who regards himself as a greater prophet than Elijah. He has of late led a strenuous life. During the summer he endeavored to hold his meetings at Stony Brook, L. I., but was run out of town. Since that time he has sought to obtain converts in various portions of the state, but with so little success that at a meeting held tonight and which had been widely advertised, ten people were present, three women members of the society, three newspaper men, one man, two small children and the pastor."

Attendant writes: "Sunday afternoon, Nov. 17, we had an unusually interesting service at the German Truth Seekers' Society, corner of Halsted and 59th streets, Chicago. The meeting was opened with a short talk by President Warne, of the Illinois State Association. Mrs. Warne followed with a fine address and spirit messages; next came an Inspirational speech in German, by Robert Grabe, the society's regular speaker. Then Miss Johnson, of the State Association gave some more good messages. Mrs. D. Besler spoke briefly, promising her assistance at future meetings. Wm. Lynn, regularly engaged by the society for test work, gave messages in a very unique manner, wholly different from others in its mode of external demonstration. Master Harry Paulz, a twelve-year-old member of Brother Grabe's developing class, spoke briefly under Indian control. The help of such talent together with the presence of a number of visitors from as far away as the North Side, gave us courage to put forth more hearty efforts to spread truth. We belong to the Illinois State Spiritualists' Association."

The St. Paul Dispatch has the following from Boone, Iowa: Actress Sadie Claffin, the soubrette of "The Village Parson' company, which showed in Boone last week, was taken to the Kime sanitarium at Fort Dodge. The girl's mind suddenly failed the day after leaving Boone. Her madness was due to an over-indulgence in Spiritualism, one medium telling her her husband, from whom she is separted, would die January 8."

Mrs. Georgia Gladys Cooley has been re-engaged by Unity Society, of Milwaukee, Wis., to serve for the month of December. She is open for week night engagements outside of the city, also for camp-meetings for season of 1902. Address her at 526 Milwaukee street, Milwaukee, Wis.

The Chicago Record-Herald has the following from Kokomo, Ind.: "Cecil Champ, a 10-year-old orphan, told her classmates at school Friday of a dream in which her mother came down from heaven and requested her to accompany her back to the celestial shore. Cecil, in the dream, consented to do so. An hour after telling of the vision she was taken violently ill and died in a few hours. She had been in excellent health. Cecil was a student of St. Francis' Catholic Academy and lived with her aunt, Mrs. A. B. Coonfare."

E. W. and C. A. Sprague, missionaries for the N. S. A. write: "Wanted—The address of every Spiritualist in the states of Ohio and Indiana. Any one can do a great favor for our cause by sending us a list of all the people they may know who are interested in Spiritualism. Be sure to give postoffice, and street and number so far as possible. Address us at No. 745 High street, Alliance, Ohio. Parties wishing our services to organize societies may address us as above."

The Muncie (Ind.) Star has the following from Anderson, Ind.: "The Herald says: 'A scheme to purchase the entire town of Chesterfield has been started by local Spiritualists. Letters have been sent to all leading Spiritualists in the country seeking financial aid. A reporter learned yesterday that local Spiritualists are planning to purchase the town, where, if the scheme carries, a Spiritualist colony will be formed. It is said Dr. Hilligoss and Henry Bronnenberg are the promoters, and they are meeting with encouragement from Spiritualists throughout the United States. If the town can be purchased, one of the largest Spiritualist temples in the world will be the result. Spiritualists will be encouraged to take up their residence there."

A. M. G. Wheeler writes: "I am open for engagements to lecture and give platform tests before societies. Those desiring my services can address me at No. 74 Seventh street S., Minneapolis, Minn."

The Chicago Chronicle has the following from Binghamton, N. Y.: "Driven insane by a dream is the fate of Henry Hasbrouck, an artist from Chicago, who has been stopping at Coldbrook, the summer cottage of R. W. Hull in Stamford. The artist spent the largest part of the summer making sketches of the scenery and the fatal dream came only a short time ago. One day Hasbrouck told a friend that he had a dream of peculiar magnificence and he was going to try to reproduce it on canvas. In vain he worked to recall the details and his mind gave way under the strain. After becoming violent Hasbrouck was removed with difficulty to the state hospital in this city. It is believed that he will recover."

"At the Gates, a Dramatic Vision," is the title of a little pamphlet of blank verse, by Homo Sapiens. It purports to relate the experience of Queen Victoria at the gates of heaven. It is for sale at 124 Dearborn street, suite 4 and 5, Chicago.

"I see my coffin coming!" exclaimed James Savery, a veteran employe of the city of Bloomington, Ill. "They are carrying it into the house, and I am afraid that I am going to die." The Bulletin of that city then goes on to say that the remarkable supernatural warning thus received proved only too true. Before midnight he was a corpse. The aged wife of the old man was greatly alarmed over the exclamation, but hoped it would not prove true and that it was simply the imagination of a half-awakened husband. She gave him every attention, however, but while summoning help shortly after 11 o'clock, he breathed his last."

The papers give the following items in reference to the work of the State Association at Genoa, Ill.: "The State Association of Spiritualists held their state convention in Genoa at Odd Fellows' Hall on Saturday and Sunday evenings of last week. Four sessions were in charge of Dr. and Mrs. Warne of Chicago, during this date. The spacious hall was crowded to the utmost and those interested will be glad to know that meetings of this kind will be held here at least every month. Orrin Merritt of this place is a member of the Board of Trustees of the association and reports the date of regular annual meeting in Chicago during the month of February next." "Drs. Warne and Warne (husband and wife) who gave several addresses on the subject of Spiritualism at Odd Fellow's Hall Sunday, was conceded by all who heard them, to be splendid talkers and having their subjects well in hand." "Last Saturday evening, and three times on Sunday did the Spiritualistic belief hold meetings in Odd Fellows' hall. Dr. Geo. B. Warne, state president, and his wife, Mrs. Warne, and Miss Johnson, state secretary of the Spiritualist Association, were present and were well received. A goodly number of adherents were here from Kingston, Belvidere, Rockford and other places."

A. A. Averill writes: "The Lynn (Mass.) Spiritualists Association, Alex Caird, M. D., president, holding meetings in Cadet Hall, have had a very prosperous season so far. We have had with us Miss Lizzie Harlow, H. D. Barrett, Dr. G. A. Fuller, Mrs. Dr. Caird and Hattie C. Webber. We serve a supper in the hall the first and third Sundays in each month. We have Thomas' full orchestra quite frequently, and singing by Unity Quartette every Sunday. Mrs. May S. Pepper will be with us during the month of December. We are expecting large audiences as Mrs. Pepper is a great favorite in Lynn. Thomas' orchestra will be present and Mrs. Georgia Merchant, the celebrated soloist, is engaged for at least one Sunday; so the public will have a feast of good things next month."

When writing for this paper use a pen or typewriter.

G. H. Kelley writes: "The many friends of Mrs. Celia Hughes will be pleased to learn that she has so far recovered from her late serious sickness that she feels able to commence her winter's work at her residence, 2517 Michigan avenue. Starting the first Monday in December she will open her developing classes, and her regular circles will commence the first Friday thereafter. Mrs. Hughes has passed through a severe ordeal which incapacitated her to such an extent that she was compelled to give up her work entirely for many months. It is hoped that all her friends, as well as other lovers of good, clean mediumship will remember Mrs. Hughes in a substantial manner by responding to this notice."

H. E. Pomeroy writes: "When I see a good thing, I instinctively know it. In No. 626, on the eighth page, is an article by Arthur F. Milton, called Lost and Found. That article is the keynote of true Spiritualism, and I want to endorse it. I am 80 years of age. When a man's brain is governed by a good heart, good spirits and angels are his companions."

J. Jay Watson writes from New York: "I am still here and shall play at the the Spiritual Society gatherings next Sunday, the 24th inst. Mrs. May Pepper's work is grand, and her audiences very large and appreciative. She gives her last wonderful work in Brooklyn on Sunday next, and the dear old Cremona violin of Ole Bull will take part in some Norwegian music."

The Elmira (N. Y.) Evening Star says: "Mrs. Mary C. VonKanzler, the inspirational speaker, had a large audience last evening at I. O. O. F. hall. In fact, many were turned away, there not being standing room. The gifted lady held her hearers spellbound with her eloquence, and many a hungry heart went away satisfied. The text was the old question of Job, 'If a man die shall he live again?' She demonstrated the fact that 'there is no death; what seems so is transition.'"

Lucy S. Carroll writes from Wheeling, W. Va.: "Our society was organized September 28, 1901, by our noble workers, Mr. and Mrs. E. W. Sprague. We now have 100 members enrolled, and the good work is going on. Our hall was crowded Sunday evening. G. W. Way gave a fine lecture and tests. Samuel Hartman followed with a short but very interesting lecture. We are going to push this grand and glorious work right to the front."

W. H. Walz writes from Joplin, Mo.: "Spiritualists seem to be rallying here of late to their duty. We have two societies here; one in East Joplin and one in West Joplin. The East Side society has a State and National charter, but the West Side society has not taken out either as yet. There is quite a number of private and public circles being held and a number of mediums being developed. The East Side society expect to have a Thanksgiving jubilee dinner for mediums and Spiritualists. We also have quite a strong society building up in our vicinity four and one-half miles east, at Dinnweg. They have two juvenile mediums at that place; one is ten years old, Nelson Killebrew; the other is a little miss, fourteen years old, Cora L. Thomas. They both talk under control and give very scientific treatments. Both children are living with their parents. Parents would do well to follow this example, and rear their children to communicate with those that have passed on, thereby comprehending the beautiful philosophy of eternal life and the conditions and surroundings of our loved ones gone on before. I trust every one who has attained this knowledge will let their light shine forth that the world that is so much in darkness may come into the light."

B. Frank Schmid writes from Indianapolis, Ind.: "The First Spiritualist Church of Indianapolis is having crowded houses during the month of November, a great interest being shown by the inquiring mind in the philosophy and phenomena of Spiritualism. We have with us as speaker, Dr. J. O. M. Hewitt, of Chicago who is giving us a better understanding of the Bible, and is opening the eyes of the church-goer with a keener and newer understanding of the old, old book, teaching a better, truer and more spiritual life, by demanding that we know what we worship, emancipating ourselves from the dominion of the past of ignorance and superstition. The daily intercourse of the life unseen brings us greater knowledge, a kindlier feeling towards our fellow-man and a better understanding of God. At the close of each lecture, that is full of thought for reflection, Mrs. Josephine Ropp gives tests. Her work is most satisfactory and her phase of mediumship really remarkable. She gives names and relationship in full and such positive proof of identity that none escape."

W. F. Ruffle writes: "We are pleased to report great success in our work. We were ably assisted yesterday in the afternoon by Mrs. Wagner, and in the evening by our old and esteemed friend, Mrs. Longstaff, and Brother Riggs, and had a full house. We desire to announce that Prof. W. H. Chaney will lecture on Sunday, December 1, at our rooms on the third floor, rear, Athenaeum Building, on the Astrological Explanations of Some of the Most Noted Bible Mysteries, followed by astrological delineations, and closing with spirit messages and clairvoyant readings through myself."

L. de Forrest, corresponding secretary, writes: "The Band of Harmony, Auxiliary to the Church of the Soul, will hold a bazaar in LeMoyne Building, corner Randolph street and Wabash avenue, ground floor, the room formerly occupied by Thompson's restaurant. Lunches will be served all day in the best style. Come one and all and buy your Christmas presents. Thursday, December 5. Donations of food and useful articles will be thankfully received at 40 Randolph street."

W. H. Tucker writes from Elyria O.: "Alice Baker, of 261 Pearl street, Cleveland, Ohio, gave the Progressive Spiritual Society of Elyria, on the 10th of this month, two lectures. Our rooms were filled in the forenoon and in the evening there were many more than could be seated. The best of attention was given by all. She speaks and sings under control, giving psychometric readings and tests. Several of our people called at her rooms for such readings, and were completely satisfied. In my estimation we never have had a lecturer and test medium with us that has awakened as much of an interest in the cause as she. Our rooms were well filled to-day, Mrs. Bacon on the platform. She is now past 77 years old but full of zeal."

Charles T. Ellis writes: "The regular services of the Church of the Psychic Forces were held on last Sunday at Mackinaw Hall, 200 E. 43d street. The conference at 3 p. m., was very interesting, Mrs. Cleveland giving some very good tests at the close. In the evening a lecture was delivered by Dr. Geo. Warne on "Spiritualism," being an answer to a sermon delivered the previous Sunday at the South Side Methodist Church, by Rev. Henry Irvin Rasmus against Spiritualism, who had chosen his text from I. Samuel, 28th verse, in which is given the account of Saul's visit to the woman of Endor. As is customary with all who attempt to denounce Spiritualism, he misquoted the Bible by saying that 'the witch of Endor was an abandoned woman.' The Doctor, who is an eloquent and forceful speaker held the audience in rapt attention to the close of the meeting and left no ground for the reverend gentleman to stand on. It is a pleasure to those who visit this church to say a good word for it, as it is conducted in such manner as to reflect great credit upon the leader, Mrs. Cleveland. All mediums who are recognized in the audience—and not a few come to this church—are welcomed by her and invited to participate, and a feeling of harmony prevails that is seldom met with in any church, and good results are experienced as a natural consequence. Mrs. Cleveland intends to devote every Wednesday evening, at the hall beginning with next week, at 8 o'clock sharp, to test circles. This is an innovation which we believe will be largely appreciated. All who are interested in the cause are cordially asked to come and give their assistance."

H. Tay, S. A. Davis and G. R. Becknell write from Decatur Ill.: "Mrs. India Hill, of this city, and Mrs. Mary Garrett, of Cincinnati, Ohio, have been holding public services on Sundays in the Sons of Veterans' Hall, to large and appreciative audiences, made up of members from all the different churches (the Catholic included), Mrs. Hill, as a speaker, giving our philosophy, wins for her and our cause many friends. Mrs. Garrett, as a psychic test medium, cannot be excelled. Her tests are to the point and always recognized. She is also a fine trumpet medium. In her seances there are wonderful demonstrations of spirit power; also a very marked degree of correctness in all communications given by her guides."

J. S. Geiger writes from Springport, Mich.: "Brother and Sister Carpenter, of Detroit, were with us the 10th and 17th, and organized an association here with 24 charter members Mrs. Marian Carpenter gave us three lectures—one on Saturday evening and two on Sunday. On Sunday afternoon she followed her lecture with tests or messages to the audience. No one can realize the depth and breadth of the uplifting, soul-inspiring words of love and eloquence that bursts forth in torrents from her lips, nor the pathos and rich melody of her heavenly music, but those who have been so favored as to have listened to her. Our town had never been invaded by a live Spiritualist speaker before, and I think this will wake them from their lethargy and set them to thinking."

F. O. Matthews has been called to take charge of the Buffalo Spiritual Church, where he seems to meet with a very favorable reception.

Mrs. L. E. Zimmerman writes from Elmira, N. Y.: "We are pleased to notify you of the organization of the First Spiritualists Unity Society in this city, with a membership of forty, and fair prospects for doubling very soon. Our officers are as follows: Mrs. Louis Duhl, president; E. F. Evans, vice-president; Mrs. Louise E. Zimmerman, secretary; Benj. Rhodes, treasurer; trustees, Dana Blodgett, Ira Smith, H. H. Goodwin, Mrs. Mary E. Stroman and Mrs. Chas MacNeil. Sister Von Kanzler has been with us this month giving us one continual feast for the uplifting of the soul. Brother and Sister Kates gave us a flying visit of one Sunday last month."

Several during the past few days have been sending in a large number of subscribers, for which they have our thanks. D. E. Young, of Union City, Mich., leads, sending in $13.50.

The Times-Star's special from Decatur, Ala., says: "James Wynn, an Oxford blacksmith, came very near burial alive to-day. After the funeral services the casket was opened at the grave, when the body was seen to move. The muscular motion of the face horrified the crowd. The casket was hurried back to the home of Wynn, where he is now under treatment. Wynn had been pronounced dead by the physicians."

Dr. T. H. White writes from Baltimore, Md.: "A few weeks ago I sent for The Progressive Thinker and the eight premium books I must say they are beautiful, and every believer in Spiritualism should have them. When I read that grand book, A Wanderer in the Spirit Lands, it causes me to feel so happy. It is a grand developer within itself. I have been a public medium for the past twelve years and I want to say to all Spiritualists, that if they fail to read your grand paper, they are really behind the spiritual times."

Dr. Emma N. Warne has been lecturing at Rockford, Ill. That place contains a large number of Spiritualists, and should have a regular meeting.

Josephine Norris writes: "The Hull-Jamieson debate alone is worth to me the price of one year's subscription."

Mrs. Carrie Firth Curran, missionary for the O. S. A., would like to hear at once from all Spiritualists who are desirous of her services. She also desires names and addresses sent to her of Spiritualists in any place. She has had a number of communications throughout Ohio, and will be in Geneva, for Sunday, Dec. 1. She would like to hear from all in that locality, so as to save expenses. Direct all communications to her at No. 123 Indiana avenue, Toledo, Ohio.

Mrs. L. A. Beam writes from Lawton, Mich.: "Mrs. Marian Carpenter, of Detroit, Mich., and E. E. Carpenter gave us a lecture and tests at Lawton, Nov. 6. Her lecture was one such as the whole world should hear."

W. H. Leidigh writes: "I have received your last premium book, A Wanderer in the Spirit Lands. I want to say to you that I think it is very valuable, and should be in every family. No person, especially young people, can read it without being benefited both spiritually and materially. We now have the whole list of your premium books in our family, and we consider that they are worth vastly many times more than they cost the recipients. The Progressive Thinker has surely grown to be a giant for good."

J. W. Ring writes: "I lectured twice in Beaumont, Tex., (the great oil district) the 19th and 20th. I had very good attendance, and arrangements are being made for my return each month. Mrs. Carrie Fuller Weatherford is here doing very satisfactory work. She will give psychic readings Thanksgiving night."

Hon. Luther R. Marsh.

I left Boston on Thursday, Nov. 14, en route to Middletown, N. Y., in order to be present and take part in the grand banquet to Hon. Luther R. Marsh, on Saturday evening, Nov. 16, in honor of his 90th birthday.

The hall of the Russell house was packed with the friends of the distinguished guest, and the occasion was indeed a "feast of reason and a flow of soul." The "Old Man Beautiful" was at his best, and his marvelous oratory was as telling as in days of yore.

He said: "My advent here was stormy. The press assaulted, and the people ridiculed. I had no friend in all the town. But the clouds have rolled away, and the sun shines clear and balmy. This banquet, representing the intellect and charm of Middletown, tokens the present condition."

Men great and famous in the nation gathered to do him homage and these intellectual giants vied with each other in praise of Mr. Marsh. These things show in an eminent degree the changes of public opinion in relation to the unseen forces. Clark Bell, Dr. R. Ogden Doremus, Geo. Francis Train, Daniel Finn, Esq., and many others contributed their eloquence to the occasion. The famous Ole Bull Cremona violin which that great master presented me, cheerfully contributed its sweet tones to the occasion.

On Sunday, Nov. 10, I played for the poor unfortunates at the Middletown Insane Asylum, and their happiness was complete. Then at the Universalist church in the evening, then at two receptions in Mr. Marsh's parlors.

Sunday, the 17th, I play at Brooklyn Spiritual Society—Judge Dailey, I believe, president—and Mrs. May Pepper will give a lecture and some of her wonderful tests. Next week at the New York Press Club, and then home again to Boston.

"Compulsory Vaccination."

Vaccination a Curse and a Menace to Personal Liberty, with Statistics Showing Its Dangers and Criminality, by J. M. Peebles, A. M., M. D., Ph. D., Battle Creek, Mich. Temple of Health Publishing Co., 1900.

For a number of years a battle royal has been waged, by an ever-increasing band of sturdy workers, against the practice of vaccination, especially compulsory vaccination. The above-named work of our genial Brother Peebles is a red-hot presentation of what are regarded as the evils of vaccination, coupled with a fiery denunciation of the compulsory enforcement of vaccination, especially in the cases of school children, with special reference, in the latter case, to instances where those children whose parents refused to allow them to be vaccinated, have been debarred from attendance on school.

In this volume Dr. Peebles has presented in extenso practically all the points that can be made against vaccination, having collected from every available source evidence of the injurious effects of the practice against which his book is directed, including the dangers incident to the use of the vaccine virus. A mass of historical and statistical information is contained in the volume, and it is a veritable encyclopedia of facts and arguments for the anti-vaccinators.

Without attempting myself to decide for or against the respective claims of the advocates and opponents of vaccination, I will venture to say that I think that Dr. Peebles, in the fervor of his zeal against what he deems a great curse, is rather too severe upon the physicians who advocate the utility of vaccination, and desire its practice be compulsory in times of danger from small-pox infection. These physicians are denounced in his book several times by Dr. P., in very strong language, as being governed by mercenary motives—they are said to urge compulsory vaccination in order that they may make money by receipt of the fees the public have to pay them for their vaccination services. Now, to my mind, there is no doubt that, almost or wholly without exception, the doctors who advocate vaccination are just as firmly convinced that vaccination is right as is Dr. Peebles that it is wrong, and that they are as conscientious on one side of this matter as Brother Peebles is on the other, and this independently of any mercenary considerations; though it may be sometimes these considerations may give additional impetus to the efforts of some doctors to secure compulsory vaccination. I hardly think that any reputable physician would desire to have enforced a practice that he did not consider advantageous to the community, simply to put a little more money in his pockets.

HEROES AND HEROES.

We give unstinted praise to the man
Who is brave enough to die;
But the man who struggles unflinchingly
Against the currents of destiny
And bears the storm of adversity,
We pass unnoticed by.

We've plaudits and tears for him who falls,
Borne down in the shock of strife;
But a word of cheer we neglect to say
To him who plods on his dreary way
And fights in silence from day to day
The unseen battles of life.

There's courage, I grant, required to face
Grim death on the gory field.
There's also courage required to meet
Life's burden and sorrow; to brave defeat;
To strive with evil and not retreat;
To suffer and not to yield.

Some moments are there in every life
When the spirit longs for rest;
When the heart is filled with a bleak despair
When the weight of trouble, remorse and care
Seems really greater than we can bear,
And death were a welcome guest.

But we crush it down and we go our way
To the duties that lie in wait,
From day to day we renew the fight,
To resist the wrong and to seek the right,
To climb at last to the suncrowned height
And to climb o'er time and fate.

And thus—for my heart goes out to them—
My meed of praise I would give
To those who struggle life's path along,
The host of toil, who are patient, strong,
The unrewarded unnumbered throng,
Who are brave enough to live.

NO WONDER PEOPLE GET SICK!
JUST WATCH THEM DRINK—"ANYTHING THAT'S WET."
A FRIGHTFUL DEATH RATE
250,000 People Killed Annually
500,000 Cases of Typhoid, Malaria, Fevers, Bright's Disease, Kidney, Stomach, Bladder, Bowel Troubles and Kindred diseases all caused by drinking Raw Water from Wells, Cisterns, Hydrants and Streams polluted by Sewerage, City Slops, Cesspools, Decayed Animal and Vegetable Matter, Lime, Alkali, etc. Look at our Streams, Rivers and Lakes, see the scum and sewer evidences. Hydrant water furnished most of our cities is a disgrace and so much poison. Wells and Cisterns are seldom safe. DEATH LURKS IN DRINKING WATER. Look at our newspapers, almost every issue tells of many deaths from bad water. Nearly every disease known is caused by a germ which lives in the water, and you get the disease by drinking them. You'll never have deadly typhoid unless you drink it. From the thousands of tests made by our Boards of Health very little water is found that is pure and safe. Not only is our Drinking Water polluted with mud, slime, filth, lime, alkali, alum or other health wrecking minerals but a hundred and one forms of deadly germs, microbes and bacilli. True, they are small, so small a million is sometimes found in a drop of water, but it is these infinitesimal beings that get into our blood, lodge in our vital organs and gnaw away at our delicate tissues injecting their poisons, producing all manner of disease, no end of doctor bills, misery and in thousands of cases DEATH.

EVER EXAMINE THE WATER YOU DRINK, or do you close your eyes and swallow it down regardless of what it contains? Think of drinking a wriggling, writhing mess of insects—not once but every day—insects that make our blood creep when we see them enlarged many times. Yet, with all that has been said and done to prevent it, with all the facts laid bare, and positive proof offered that seven-tenths of men's, women's, and children's diseases are caused by bad water and that Death comes from this cause, still thousands are making their system a dumping ground for the scum of the earth, a graveyard for these millions of deadly bugs. A powerful microscope proves all that we say. There is only one way to have pure safe water. Distilling it removes every impurity. The

THE OTHER WORLD AND THIS.

A compendium of Spiritual Laws. No. 1, New White Cross Literature. By Augusta W. Fletcher, M. D. In this volume the author, in the thirty-nine chapters, discusses a wide variety of subjects pertaining to Spiritualism, from a spiritualistic standpoint. She evinces the powers of a trained thinker, both in matter of thought and fine literary style, and capability of thought expression. The subjects are well handled with conciseness and yet with clearness. It will prove a rich addition to any Spiritualist's library, and a most excellent book for any one seeking information concerning Spiritualism and its teachings. Price $1.50.

RELIGION OF THE FUTURE.

By S. Weil. Cloth, $1.25; paper, 50 cents. This is a work of great value, written by one of the keenest, most powerful and most truly religious minds of the day. It is particularly a work which should be put into the hands of those who have freed themselves from the dogmas of orthodoxy and from the dogmas of materialistic science, for it will strengthen the conviction of the free mind that mind and senses are not the whole of life.

The chapters reveal a new method in psychic and spiritual research. They show vivid glimpses of a stupendous moral cosmos that will supersede moral confusion, that only verifiable tenets can survive, and the childhood period of faith and fancy will be superseded by knowledge and facts.

THE PSYCHOGRAPH
—OR—
DIAL PLANCHETTE.

This instrument is substantially the same as that employed by Prof. Hare in his early investigations. In its improved form it has been before the public for more than seven years, and in the hands of thousands of persons has proved its superiority over the Planchette, and all other instruments which have been brought out in imitation, both in regard to certainty and correctness of the communications received by its aid, and as a means of developing mediumship.

Do you wish to investigate Spiritualism?
Do you wish to develop Mediumship?
Do you desire to receive Communications?

The Psychograph is an invaluable assistant. A pamphlet with full directions for the

with every instrument. Many who were not aware of their mediumistic gift, have, after a few sittings, been able to receive delightful messages. A volume might be filled with commendatory letters. Many who began with it as an amusing toy, found that the intelligence controlling it knew more than themselves, and became converts to Spiritualism.

Capt. D. B. Edwards, Orient, N. Y., writes: "I had communications (by the Psychograph) from many other friends, even from old sailors whose gravestones are moss-grown in the old yard. They have been highly satisfactory, and proved to me that Spiritualism is indeed true, and the communications have given my heart the greatest comfort in the severest loss I have had of son, daughter, and their mother."

Dr. Eugene Crowell, whose writings have made his name familiar to those interested in psychic matters, writes as follows: "I am much pleased with the Psychograph. It is very simple in principle and construction, and I am sure must be far more sensitive to spiritual power than the one now in use. I believe it will generally supersede the latter when its superior merits become known."

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected. HUDSON TUTTLE.

ASPHODEL BLOOMS.

I am now able to inform the subscribers to this long-delayed book of poems, that it will be ready by December 25. It will be beautifully bound, with six full-page, half-tone illustrations, and an elegant gift book for the holidays. The price is $1 postpaid; 75 cents to subscribers. The original announcement, that to subscribers it would be sent, with Mediumship and Its Laws, for $1 postpaid, holds good for all orders sent before December 1. I wish further to thank the numerous friends whose aid so generously given, has enabled me to publish the several works by the subscription plan, and yet more grateful am I for the fraternal words of cheer they have so freely given. It is impossible for me to write a personal response to all, but I assure them that it is not for want of desire to do so.

D. J. S. Reed: Some years ago I heard a voice distinctly, and a year after, at the fulfillment of the words, I heard the same voice sigh. Since that time, though ardently desiring to become a medium, I have received nothing, and yet I have the privilege of almost weekly sitting in a circle. Why, now that I understand better, do I not? Can you tell me anything of Louis Schlesinger?

A. Occasions may arise in the life of everyone, of great need of assistance, and the tension of the mind may give that susceptibility essential to spirit influence. This may happen only once in a life time. It was on such an occasion that this correspondent heard the voice.

Dr. Schlesinger is highly spoken of by those who know him. He has been long in the field, and mainly in the West. He has been severely criticised, perhaps unjustly, for the failures of a sensitive or healer do not destroy the value of the seances when they have been successful under the same conditions. In fact mediums who are always successful in receiving a set form of manifestations, are more open to doubt. Failure at times should be expected, and goes far to prove the genuineness of successful seances.

P. L. S., Pontiac. Q. What of the MS. of the "Teachings of the Twelve Apostles?"

A. That erudite scholar of ancient literature, W. H. Burr, of Washington, gives the following answer to this question:

"The Andover Review for April, 1884, contained a translation of a Greek manuscript entitled 'Teaching of the Twelve Apostles,' found in 1875 by Bishop Bryennios in a 'Most Holy Sepulchre in Constantinople, and dated A. D. 1056. It is claimed that the original book was composed between A. D. 120 and 150. When I read the translation in 1884, I was constrained to assign the date of the original book to even an earlier period than A. D. 120, because Clement of Alexandria, who flourished about A. D. 200, quotes a passage from it as Scripture (Nisc. i, 20; Teach. iii). Assuming therefore that Clement wrote as late as A. D. 200, must not the 'Teaching of the Apostles' have existed longer than fifty to seventy years in order to be regarded as Holy Scripture? My conclusion therefrom in 1884 was that the book was written as early as A. D. 1. I had ascertained that the Jesus of Paul was stoned and hanged about 75 B. C., and could therefore easily conceive of Apostolic literature in the seventy-five years before the beginning of the Christian era.

"But I no longer credit the existence of any apostolic or post-apostolic writing before the revival of learning in the 14th century. The self-styled Apostle Paul is, in my judgment, a myth. There may have been a Ieshu, or perhaps more correctly an Isa or an Issa, the illegitimate son of Mariam, as recorded in the Arabian Chronicles, who was stoned and hanged for alleged sorcery in Judea, about 1900 years ago, more or less. The Arabian story distinctly says that Isa escaped death by magic and that the mob killed their own leader Isoua, who had been transformed into the likeness of Isa; but the sequel of the story is, that for seven days, while the victim of the mob remained affixed to the stakes, Mariam came every night to mourn the death of her son, until he came down from heaven to comfort her, and that after a single meeting with his disciples at her house Isa returned to heaven. If the Arabian story, which is repeatedly referred to in the Koran, is historical, we may reasonably doubt that part of it which says the Isa escaped death by magically transforming Isoua, the leader of the mob into his own likeness."

It may be truthfully added that what is true of this MS. is true of all those wonderful "finds" which have successively been brought to light. They have been examined by those prejudiced in favor of the claims of the church, and hence utterly untrustworthy. Scholars may come to this task at some future time who will care only for the truth and not with the determination to support preconceived beliefs. Then the vast rubbish heap of writings dating from the first century to the revival of learning, will be sifted, and if there remains anything true and real it will be retained. At present when the honest student enters this field of "sacred history," he feels like the navigator suddenly enveloped in a fog-bank. The coast-line assumes fantastic form, and what at one moment appears as real mountain-headlands or sketches of extended plains, the next melts into clouds. Fraud, cunning deception, and the ever "lying for Christ's sake" baffles every attempt to resolve the mystery.

Dr. D. C. R., Columbus, Pa. Q. What connection has the key to the Bastille with American History?

A. The Key to the Bastille was presented to Washington by Lafayette, and may be seen at Mount Vernon among the relics there preserved.

A Subscriber: Q. If it be granted, as is taught by Modern Science, that the mother has influence over the mental and physical traits of the child before birth, why are twins not more alike?

A. As the apparent conditions of twins, on both paternal and maternal sides are the same, it would be expected that influenced as they must be in precisely the same manner, they would be exactly alike in phyical form and psychic character. They often bear a strong resemblance and yet diverge to even greater disparity than ordinary brothers or sisters. In fact they may be of opposite sex. Even when like the Siamese twins the union has been yet more complete, the character has been notably different.

How are we to explain this strange fact? Not by rushing to reincarnation with its fanciful sophistry, involving ourselves in still more perplexing doubts. The conditions which surround the two germs may be identical, but they are different. One may bear greater influence of father or mother, and the proportion in which these are blended may make immeasurable difference of character. And as it is this mental constitution, we so call, which gives form to the physical body, that will equally show the difference.

If objection be urged, it must be borne in mind that the most potential factor entering into the formation of a living being is this germ force. The cell which bears it is invisible to the unassisted eye, yet it brings the cumulated physical and psychic acquirements of all its ancestral line from the remotest beginning. And such is its strength and persistency that the most adverse conditions at times appears to bring out its most wonderful features. Obviously in the union of two lines of ancestral growth, there may be attraction and repulsion in varying degrees, and the result uncertain.

THE POOR MILLIONAIRE.

He is cunning and shrewd—far-seeing, 'tis called,
One-pointed his gaze, and steady, intent;
He is blind to all things, completely enthralled—
On dime, and on dollar, his life-force is bent.
From morning till night, and often till late,
He studies and plans, just how to create
Some scheme or device, by which to beguile
More dollars from pockets, to add to his pile.
For the graces of life,
For his children and wife,
Not a moment to spare
Has this poor millionaire!

He is climbing a ladder, round upon round—
Of silver and gold, this ladder is made,
And about are strong chains, by which he is bound—
The fetters and rivets of traffic and trade.
He labors, and toils, and cudgels his brain,
And threshes his thoughts, to give him more gain,
Till nerves are all tense, and conscience awry,
And men are but toys, that money may buy,
But each link of the chain,
Grows to trouble and pain,
Turns to canker and care,
For the poor millionaire!

And his nature grows sideways, and withered and dry—
The juices of life refresh not, nor bless,
From the money he loves must come the supply,
To furnish him now with life's happiness.
He buys, and he buys, from morning till night,
He uses his gold with all of his might,
For travel, and art, and pictures and books,
And tires of them all, as soon as he looks.
For his soul has not guessed,
What it is to be blessed,
Nor that riches though rare,
Make the poor millionaire!

"How Shall I Become a Medium," Fully Answered

The above question is comprehensively answered by Hudson Tuttle, in his new work, entitled "Mediumship and its Laws, its Conditions and Cultivation."

Silver coin can be sent with safety if carefully wrapped, and is preferable to stamps. Price, postpaid, 35 cents. This work should be in every family. Address HUDSON TUTTLE, Berlin Heights, Ohio.

HUMANITARIAN WORK.

Salvation Army's Work in Saving Women.

A beautiful example of delicate and excellent humanitarian work is that of the Salvation Army, in New York City, as related in the Chicago Inter Ocean's special correspondence, which sets out with the statement that, a few weeks ago Magistrate Deuel, the Jefferson Market police judge, made his court officers laugh. The magistrate was not trying to be funny. Therefore the officers did not laugh outright. But in the seclusion of the corridor they had a beautiful time, chuckling in chorus over what seemed to them to be an uncommonly good joke. This was the joke.

After appointing Staff Captain Caroline Welsh of the Salvation Army to be a probation officer, the magistrate actually paroled several women of the class officially known as disorderly, instead of sending them to the island for ten days. They were instructed to report to Captain Welsh three times at intervals of three days. If they did so and behaved themselves in the meantime they would escape the island trip.

"Report to the Salvation Army lassie!" chuckled an incredulous one. "Shure an' them bright eyes o' hern will go blind lookin' for them women to report!"

But Captain Welsh's eyes are as bright as ever. Possibly they are a little brighter when she gives the statistics of the new experiment. During the first two weeks after her appointment eleven women were paroled to her care. Only one of the number failed to report to her. It is hardly necessary to state that the magistrate and the captain are doing the chuckling now. The court officers are busy wondering who said that the day of miracles is over. They would like to inform him of his mistake.

HAS POWER OF BELIEVING.

Captain Caroline Welsh is about as tall—that is to say, she is about as short—as Queen Victoria was. Her heart is somewhat out of proportion to her body, being large enough to embrace the whole of Manhattan island as well as the surrounding country. She distinctly resembles another royal person besides Queen Victoria. This is the White Queen in "Through the Looking Glass." It isn't that she looks like the White Queen, but that, just like that amusing character, she has such a power of believing.

"Why," said the White Queen, "sometimes I've believed as many as six impossible things before breakfast."

That is the way with Captain Welsh. She's a believer of the calibre that moves mountains. For eight years she has been working among the fallen women of New York City. She has prayed and she has struggled, but, most of all, she has believed. When the wise ones at the police court laughed at the notion of paroling disorderly women, and said that it was absurd to expect them to report on their good behavior, the captain simply believed what was declared to be the impossible. And the impossible promptly came to pass.

The captain lives at one of the Salvation Army rescue homes for women who want a chance to leave the life of the streets. This one is at 316 East Fifteenth street. There are about thirty-five girls in it now. Last winter, with only thirty-five beds in the house, there were more than forty accupants. At night beds were made on the floor. This winter Captain Welsh is believing—but that doesn't belong here.

"Five girls are due to report to me this afternoon, between 3 o'clock and 6," said the captain the other day, as she sat in the parlor of the home and listened for the door bell to ring. "It is only a little after 2," she went on, "so I need not expect any of them yet. But last week one of the girls came early and I want to be ready for them."

"You say they report to you. What do they tell you?"

WHAT THE CAPTAIN ASKS.

"I ask them what they have been doing, and whether they are following the Judge's instructions about keeping off the streets."

"What is to prevent their lying to you"

"Nothing. They can lie to me with a pretty good chance of not being found out."

"Then what good does the arrangement do?"

"I hope—I believe" (correcting herself) "it is going to do a great deal of good, in time. I——"

The bell rang, and a cheerful little adjutant came in.

"It's Miss ——," she said.

"Ah!" the captain exclaimed. "I was expecting her. I believed she would come early. She was the first one last time."

The reporter offered to interrupt the interview while the girl came in to make her report, and, the offer being accepted, took a seat at the other end of the long room.

"Well," the captain's genial voice exclaimed as the girl entered, "how are you to-day?"

"Pretty well." And they shook hands.

"And what have you been doing since I saw you?"

"Been staying in the house. This afternoon I wanted to see you, so I took a car and came up here early."

Then the voices sank to a low tone, and for half an hour the two women sat close and talked earnestly. Finally they arose and shook hands again.

"Then you'll be in to-morrow?" said the captain.

"Yes, I'll come."

The door closed after the caller and the captain turned around, looking as pleased as if she had found a hundred dollars.

"She doesn't have to report again to-morrow, does she?" asked the visitor.

"Oh, no! She's coming up to-morrow to—I guess I won't tell you."

The captain hesitated.

"Oh, well, you wouldn't recognize her if you ever saw her, and you don't know her name, so I will tell you. She doesn't know how to read or write, and we're going to teach her. We'll manage it. She told me about it just now. She said that she couldn't get work because she was too ignorant. So she's coming up and we're going to teach her."

CONSIDERATE OF THE UNFORTUNATES.

"You are unusually considerate of her feelings when you hesitate to tell this lest it may betray her ignorance to some one."

"Why shouldn't I be? I can't expect to rouse self-respect in a person by treating her with contempt. You asked what good this paroling is going to do. As a matter of fact, the chief hope of good lies in the fact that the girls are by this means brought into some sort of relations with honest, decent people, and if they really want a chance to live a different life they can have that chance."

"How are you going to give it to them?"

"In one of several ways. We have just this week opened a laundry here in the basement of this house. I've worked for it so long, and it has come so hard! But I never stopped believing we should get it soon or later, and now we really have it. We have put in $1,200 worth of machinery and we can employ fifteen or sixteen women. They will live here in the home, and the beginners will have only their board and clothes. To the more proficient ones we will pay something."

"But you can't keep the same girls always, even if they want to stay."

"No, when a girl has been with us long enough for us to understand her, we get her a place in domestic service."

"But who will employ her?"

"I might almost say, who won't? We could get places for a great many more girls if we had them."

"How do you happen to have so many in the home then?"

"Because I won't send a girl out until I have reason to believe that she can be depended upon. When a girl has stayed with us six months I know what she can do and to what extent she can be relied upon. This morning we had an application for a servant at $12 a month and another application for a cook at $25 a month. Our girls go into excellent families. In fact, we would not send them anywhere else.

"As I said, at last we have our laundry. We also have a bookbindery where we employ about fifteen girls. That is in our Industrial home in West Thirteenth street, where the girls board. We pay them by the piece at the regular rates paid in other bookbinderies and they are at liberty to find a better position when they can. Other girls are taught sewing. They make the uniforms we wear. Other girls are taught stenography. A young woman stenographer gives us her services two evenings every week. That is her way of doing good in the world. I think it's a pretty good way."

GIRLS ARE TAUGHT HOUSEWORK

"Of course all the girls in the home here are taught housework if they don't already understand it. They take care of the house and learn the proper way of doing everything.

"While most of our girls have been of the class known as disorderly, we have some whose trouble is drinking. It is a little easier to find places for them than for the others, but we can always get employment for any of them. What we need most and what I am believing hard that we shall get is another house where we can take girls to board.

"Do you know what pay many girls get for their work? We have one tall, beautiful creature who received the princely salary of $3.25 for working in a store. Now, if anybody will explain to me how a girl is going to live on that I would be very grateful. This girl has no home. She, therefore, has to hire a room somewhere, and for that she must pay at least $2 a week. That leaves her $1.25 a week to buy her meals, her clothes, her pleasures. I'd like to know how she's going to do it. I know of plenty of cases like that; plenty of them.

"I want to start a boarding-house for those girls. I want to give them a clean room, plain but wholesome food, a parlor where they can receive their friends and have some innocent amusement. I want to be able to do it for $2 a week. The good Lord knows that they will have hard work making their extra $1.25 a week pay for their clothes and other expenses, but the problem won't be so hopeless as it is now. I want that boarding-house. I'm believing hard that I shall get it. But I need it right now.

"Of course that would not be a home like this one. Here we take girls and women who have no alternative to the life of the streets. If they really want to escape from it, they can come here and stay with us until we can give them a chance outside with a reasonable assurance that they will not go back to their old ways."

"But do they want to reform?"

"Oh, there are so many of them that do. We need twice as large a home as this is, but we are so cramped for money. We get an allowance of the army funds, but it doesn't begin to meet our needs, and the rest comes only by voluntary gifts. We ought to have much more in order to carry on our work."

MOST OF GIRLS REFORM.

"But do the girls really reform? Do they stay reformed?"

"Yes."

"What proportion of them?"

"I don't often talk about that, but I believe—my experience proves to me that 75 per cent of them can be reformed."

"That is a remarkable statement."

"I know it is, but I do not make it rashly. You must admit that eight years of experience gives me the right to speak with some assurance. I only can judge a wider range of cases from my experience with those we have had, but I think I am justified in doing that."

As the second paroled girl had come to make her report, the visitor took leave of the captain and went around to the Isaac Hopper home, in Second avenue. This is an institution especially for women who have been sent to the island for drunkenness. It has been in existence for years. When the matron was asked if she could find employment for the women who came to the home she had the same report to make.

"Without any difficulty," she said. "The same families have been coming to us for servants for the past twenty years. Why do they come? For several reasons. One is that they know the worst of a girl, instead of having to find it out for themselves. Another thing is that when they take a girl from here they know that she comes to them clean and well. If they get a servant from some intelligence office they do not know from what dirty, unwholesome surroundings they may be taking her, nor what contagious disease she may have.

"Most of our girls go out of town into the suburbs for their places, but we send some of them to families living in the city. We have only servant who has been engaged whenever she was sober by one family for the past five years. She gets excellent wages and is a splendid cook. Her one fault is drinking, but during those five years there were two straight years when she kept perfectly sober. She got off on one of her 'spells' a while ago, and, after serving her sentence at the island, came to us.

MUST DO PENANCE FOR FAILURE

"She stayed here until she was quite herself again, and then, as this same family wanted her again, we sent her up there. But she deceived me. Rather, she disappointed me. She meant to go, but she met some of her friends, and the first thing I knew she had been sent to the island again. We shall keep her here now longer than we would ordinarily, because of her failure to do as she would have done. They earn no money here, have little liberty, and in her case, of course, it is penance to keep her. So we shall do it by way of punishment."

"Do you lose faith in these women?"

"No. Few of them can completely reform. They do want to. They tell me when they are sober, that if they could choose between death and keeping on in this life of periodical 'drunks,' they would rather die. Some of them do reform, but most of them seem to have an appetite which once in a while they are absolutely powerless to resist."

"Do you ever have women who have been arrested for other offenses than drunkenness?"

"Sometimes they have been arrested for theft, and sometimes we have disorderly women."

"And can you find people willing to employ them?"

"Yes, always. We could place more women than we have. I know these girls well, and I can say that if I should go to housekeeping myself I should immediately come here or go to some similar home to get my servants."

Surely such work is worthy of emulation and deserving of all praise. How fully in accord it is with the philosophy of Spiritualism—far more so than with any system of dogmas or beliefs that relegate any portion of the human family to endless perdition and hopeless misery. Their beliefs aside—though their general work is tinged by that influence—this work is along the lines indicated by the Spiritual philosophy when the same is not merely held as an ideal, but is actualized in earnest effort to help humanity to the attainment of better life here and now in this present world. INCOMPATIBLE.

Socialism and Christianity Are So Declared.

My neighbor handed me a copy of The People's Paper, in which I became much interested, and read it all carefully, and it met my approval generally, until I came to "Socialism Defined," which contains many definitions and the party platform. Here I met with serious obstacles in the sentiment of certain definitions expressed as follows:

"The ethics of Socialism are identical with the ethics of Christianity. Socialism is simply applied Christianity."

To make this idea still plainer one of them says: "I believe the things that Christian Socialism stands for. It is God's way out of the wilderness and into the promised land. It is Christianity applied." Now add to this the direful consequences expressed by Zola, "Whosoever is content to scoff at the new gospel—Socialism—is a fool. Whosoever treacherously stifles it is a criminal." We perceive a remarkable similarity to Christianity which says: "Preach the gospel to all the world. He that believes it shall be saved. He that believes not shall be damned."

It proposes to force its acceptance by the people under threat of an angry God and Devil and damnation in Hell for disobedience. In the Dark Ages Christians made it a crime to oppose their religion, and millions suffered death. It is a fair supposition that the Socialist party approves and adopts the above quoted statements; otherwise they would have no place in Socialism Defined. We understand they are baits to catch Christians.

Among the definitions we observe statements from dictionaries and from eminent writers—Morris, Ruskin, Creelman, Wilcox, Clark, and others, which are all sound and sensible ideas. They have no reference to Christianity. The platform of the Socialist party is very good, and it contains not the slightest allusion to Christianity.

We observe another averment which says: "Socialism has nothing to do with a man's religion." It has so much to do with a man's religion that it must be Christian, simply.

If Socialism is "Applied Christianity" it interferes very materially with a Mohammedan's or Buddhist's religion, for Christians regard those people as heathens; therefore they cannot be Socialists and hold to their religion. It also interferes with the Spiritualist's religion, which is incompatible with Christianity.

We (millions of us) want nothing to do with Christianity with its mythical God and formulas of worship. It is a fraud; a sham; badly mixed and confused; represented by hundreds of independent selfish sects, as much unlike each other as an equal number of people of different nations. It makes men competitors and antagonists—a burden to human progress. It is a disgrace and dishonor to humanity.

"Christian Socialism" will not win. If the Socialist party carries Christianity in its future campaign, they have got a heavy burden that will eventually defeat and crush it. Socialists had better cut loose from it, let it alone and attend to their own business, as expressed in their platform of excellent principles and purposes. Then we will be with them. But we don't want to follow any "God's way out of the wilderness;" for we have no faith in Jehovah nor any other God.

Socialism Defined opens and closes with two clauses that fit each other admirably. "The ethics of Socialism are identical with the ethics of Christianity." It closes with a remark from Mark Twain: "I bring you the stately matron Christendom, returning bedraggled, besmirched and dishonored from pirate raids in Kiachow, Manchuria, South, Africa, Etc., with her soul full of meanness, her pocket full of boodle and her mouth full of pious hypocrisies. Give her soap and towel, but hide the looking-glass."

Mark Twain expresses a great truth—a scandalous fact. Christendom is liable to blight or curse anything which it may control.

Socialism professes to be allied to Christianity (admitting it into the list of definitions), then dismisses it with a slap in the face.

DEAFNESS CURED

By No Means Until ACTINA Was Discovered.

Ninety-five per cent of all cases of Deafness brought to our attention is the result of chronic catarrh of the throat and middle ear. The air passages become clogged by catarrhal deposits, stopping the action of the vibratory bones. Until these deposits are removed a cure is impossible. The inner ear cannot be reached by probing or spraying, hence the inability of Aurists or Physicians to cure. Ear drums are worse than useless.

It is folly, therefore, for deaf persons to hope for a cure by the old methods of the aurists and physicians, and instead of wasting precious time and money on methods that never have cured Deafness or Catarrh, they should awake to the times and apply the scientific cure. That there is a scientific cure for Deafness and Catarrh is demonstrated every day by the use of ACTINA. The vapor current generated in the ACTINA passes through the Eustachian tubes into the middle ear, removing the Catarrhal obstructions as it passes through the tubes and loosens up the bones (hammer, anvil and stirrup) in the inner ear, making them respond to the slightest vibration of sound.

RINGING NOISES IN THE HEAD.

ACTINA has never failed to cure this distressing symptom. The vapor current passes quickly and freely through the Eustachian tubes removing the catarrhal substances that obstruct the easy exit of the wave sounds. We have known people troubled with this symptom for years to be completely cured in only three weeks' use of the ACTINA.

As Deafness and ringing noises are caused from Catarrh, the hearing cannot be restored and noises stopped till the Catarrh is cured, and as Catarrh cannot exist under the use of ACTINA no person need be deaf or have ringing noises in the head if they will use ACTINA properly.

ACTINA also cures Asthma, Bronchitis, Sore Throat, Weak Lungs, Colds and Headache; all of which are directly or indirectly due to catarrh.

Write us about your case. We give advice free, and positive proof of cures.

"THE UNKNOWN"
—BY—
CAMILLE FLAMMARION.

"The Unknown" created a marked sensation in France when first published and can scarcely fail to arouse the greatest interest in this country. It is an eminent scientist's study of the phenomena of the spirit world. In touching upon the various physical manifestations the author cites many absolutely authenticated instances, and chapters of his book are as weirdly fascinating as the most fantastic of Poe's tales. It treats on incredulity, credulity, hallucinations, psychic action of one mind upon another, transmission of thought, suggestion, the world of dreams, cerebral physiology, psychic dreams, distinct sight in dreams, actual facts, premonitory dreams and divination of the future, etc. 487 pages, cloth bound. LIFE BEYOND DEATH
Being a Review of
The World's Beliefs on the Subject, a Consideration of Present Conditions of Thought and Feeling,
Leading to the Question as to Whether It Can Be Demonstrated as a Fact.—To Which Is Added an Appendix Containing Some Hints as to Personal Experiences and Opinions.
BY MINOT J. SAVAGE, D. D.
8vo, Cloth, 342 Pages.

After a review of the beliefs held in the past concerning life beyond death, Dr. Savage takes up the present conditions of belief and considers the agnostic reaction from the extreme "other-worldliness" which it replaced, which was in turn followed by the Spiritualistic reaction against agnosticism. He points out the doubts concerning the doctrine of immortality held by the churches and the weakness of the traditional creeds and the loosening of their hold upon the people. He then considers the probabilities of a future life, probabilities which, as he admits, fall short of demonstration. The volume includes a consideration of the work of the Society for Psychical Research and also an appendix giving some of the author's own personal experiences in this line. Dr. Savage holds, as a provisional hypothesis, that continued existence is demonstrated, and that there have been at least some well authenticated communications from persons in the other life. The chief contents of the volume are as follows:

Primitive Ideas—Ethnic Beliefs—The Old Testament and Immortality—Paul's Doctrine of Death and the Other Life—Jesus and Immortality—The Other World and the Middle Ages—Protestant Belief Concerning Death and the Life Beyond—The Agnostic Reaction—The Spiritualistic Reaction—The World's Condition and Needs as to Belief in Immortality—Probabilities Which Fall Short of Demonstration—The Society for Psychical Research and the Immortal Life—Possible Conditions of Another Life—Some Hints as to Personal Experiences and Opinions.

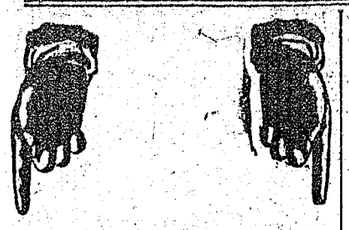
"THE LANGUAGE OF THE STARS."
A Primary Course of Lessons in Celestial Dynamics.
BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE LIGHT OF EGYPT."



This important primary work is the first practical exposition of the Astro-Magnetic forces of Nature—in their relation to man—that has yet been issued by the American press. It contains fourteen special lessons, embracing each department of human life, in such plain, simple language that a child can understand the elementary principles laid down. And in addition to these lessons is an Appendix, containing a full explanation of all technical and scientific terms in general use upon the subject, thus forming a brief, yet practical Astro Dictionary. This work is illustrated with special plates.

DR. G. E. WATKINS,

The Noted Chronist,

Will on October 15, open his new Boston office, at 1087 Boylston street, where he will be pleased to meet all who may call between the hours of 10 a. m. and 2 p. m. The wonderful work in healing the sick that Dr. Watkins is accomplishing is indeed most astounding; his patients live to testify to his wonderful powers as a healer. For the last year his work has been most wonderful. He says himself that his cures this year have been more than ever before in numbers, as he confined himself to only 30 new patients a month. Dr. Watkins attends personally to each case, and therefore he can do better work than if he had a great many assistants; no staff of visible helpers are in his office to annoy and suggest this and that. He knows what is the trouble with each patient, and knows the right specific to give. He prepares and puts up all of his medicine, and has no help in his medical treatments that is visible help. Write him to-day, and by return mail you will receive the diagnose. No charge made for diagnosing your case. Send age, sex and leading sympton. C. E. BATH, M'gr.

? ARE YOU SICK ?

—IF SO—

Does Your Doctor Understand Your Case?

Are You Getting Better?

If you are not getting better write today to Dr. C. E. WATKINS, Boston, Mass., and write him just your condition financially, and he will make his price for treatment within your reach, He is treating a great many cases free; others he charges a light fee.

He makes no charge whatever for Diagnosis.

If You Are Sick

Why not write him today, and no matter who has failed to help you, to consult him COSTS NOTHING.

Try DR. WATKINS.

Let him diagnose your case, and then it will help you to decide who knows best what is the matter with you. Send all letters to 1087 Boylston St., Boston, Mass.

WHAT IS PRAYER?

Thoughts on Its Nature and Philosophy.

As we sail upon the illimitable sea of human knowledge in our puerile craft of investigation, in most parts supposition, we find that we will never reach the great ultimatum of all life's energies; and yet we see in life the beauty of a most perfect three: cause, effect, end; spirit, nature, life; life, death, transformation. The ultimate is produced by the union of the will of life with the intellect of thought; in other words, life is the offspring of the affectional in the form of a woman mated with the rational faculty in the shape of a man.

Every thought which contains within it the seeds of life, by which is meant every idea, which falling into the fruitful soil of receptivity, grows and blossoms into the maturity of strength and power, reveals to us the spiritual essence and law of prayer.

But in the consideration of this subject we want to cast out of our mind the conservative, conventional, orthodox idea of prayer, and look at it in a rational, radical, spiritual way. For there is prayer and prayer—prayer that is always answered, and prayer that is never answered.

What is prayer? Prayer is the conatus of effort, the persistent, energetic influence of man's life to obtain that which he seeks. That upon which man sets his heart is the god of his life, and though he may pray in public places, in revival meetings or elsewhere to a so-called Jehovah, if every energy is given to the acquirement of wealth he is a worshiper of Mammon, and his real, true heart-prayer is to his god, the Almighty Dollar.

When we consider the question of hypocrisy in all its essential bearings of life we see that man becomes either a conscious or unconscious hypocrite. The first should be despised; the last should be pitied. The first is a knave and a rogue; the last is simply a deceiver, but while he deceives others he deceives himself the most of all. He is the slave of his own hypocrisy. In the world of religious thought we see different kinds of people to-day: First, the tyrant, of which material the priesthood is made, and of the same substance is every man who is desirous of placing upon the neck of his brother man the collar of creed and dogma; second, the hypocrite, who professes to be what he is not; and thirdly, the freethinker.

Now, taking our position on prayer and seeking for an illustration, we will look for a few minutes at Mr. George Gould. This gentleman is a Presbyterian, with which we have no fault to find. But if that gentleman prays, and uses his Lord's prayer as given in the Bible, he becomes in the first two words, guilty of telling the Lord a falsehood. For in the spirit of the prayer we see in the words "Our Father" a recognition of the universal brotherhood of man. Grover Cleveland is also a Presbyterian, and although personally we have nothing against the man, we should think from the exalted position of the presidency which he has held he would believe more fully in the doctrine of election than in any ideal state of brotherhood.

Again in the words "Give us this day our daily bread," Mr. Gould and all of whom he is a type pray in sound and words, for the sustenance of both body and soul, and yet would deprive his fellow-man of both these inestimable blessings in order to secure more benefit to himself.

As I said before, prayer is effort. A man may mumble words to the winds of heaven, expressing most earnest desire for the possession of some favored good, and yet if that prayer is words becomes no effort in his life his prayer is vain. On the other hand, there are men who never uttered a verbal prayer in their lives, yet whose entire lives are successful prayers.

Take a common illustration of prayer in act. When the farmer ploughs the ground and casts seed into the furrow he obeys the commandments of Nature as they are written in the seed and in the earth, in the sun and in the rain; and his prayer is effectual according as the conditions are favorable or unfavorable to the answer of such prayer. For remember this, no prayer is ever answered unless the conditions are favorable for such answer. In this case the conditions would be according to the state of the ground, the seed put into it, the skill in husbandry, the protection afforded to the growing plant, and the culture bestowed upon it.

The fruit-grower plants a tree; the act is a prayer for fruit, and in the growing of the tree, in the swelling of the buds, in the unfolding of the leaves, the man sees the daily answer to his prayer.

If a man's prayer is naturally and spiritually in harmony with that which is necessary for his best development, his prayer is answered and his life is made more beautiful and happy. If his thought harmoniously blends, in praying the prayer as taught by Christ, with Christ's thought he enters into heaven here and now through the gate of life. Any man or woman, I care not how unfamiliar with the words of that wonderful prayer he or she may be, who is in any way, shape or form trying to better the condition of humanity by educating the people into the recognition of the universal brotherhood of man is praying that prayer of Jesus the Christ in spirit and in life.

It is with hesitancy that I speak of Christ the man, for so much of his history is wrapped in the swaddling-clothes of myth and fable, and it is hard to separate the wheat of truth from the chaff of falshood and of humbug, yet no doubt in my mind exists that Christ was a good man. His life was a perpetual prayer for righteousness. In his martyrdom on the cross, according to the Bible story, he breathed forth a prayer of forgiveness.

Thus it is! Every good man's life is a prayer for the good. Every bad man's life is a prayer for the bad and vile. The first is a union of the divinity of the higher powers of being with the humanity of man. The latter is the mating of infernal devilry with the depravity of animalism.

Every man and woman prays. The object to which a person devotes his life is the god to whom he prays, and his devotion to such object is his life's prayer. It may be the acquirement of wealth; it may be the attainment of knowledge; it may be the acquisition of fame. No matter what the object, if it takes his life's attention and devotion, it is the god to whom he pays homage and adoration.

Every Utopian dream of genius is in reality a prayer—a prayer for the betterment of a world. Sneer not, kind friends, at idealism, for what are ideals to one generation become the active, palpitating heart, life and soul of the next.

In "Uncle Tom's Cabin" Mrs. Stowe sent forth her prayer and earnest plea for the recognition of the African race to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness; and Edward Bellamy's prayer is like unto it in his grand and glorious volumes of "Looking Backward" and "Equality." Plato's prayer is embodied in his "Republic;" Sir Thomas More's in the "Utopia;" Campanella's in "The City of the Sun;" Lord Bacon's in the "New Atlantis;" and Cabel in his "Voyage to Icaria." Tom Paine's most effective prayer is embodied in that little volume of "The Age of Reason," which has brought down upon his devoted head the wrath of the churches for the last century.

Lincoln's Emancipation Proclamation was a prayer for liberty, as was also the Declaration of Independence in 1776. All the martyred hosts of earth are those whose beautiful lives ended in a prayer for liberty on the cross, at the stake, on the gallows or at the foot of the guillotine.

All works of genius, art, beauty, invention, are prayers of the devotees at the shrines of their respective objects of worship. This is true in all and everything. By a man's character and walk in life you can obtain a fairly accurate idea of the kind of god he worships. As Ingersoll says: "An honest god is the noblest work of man."

With this new view of prayer before us, we believe the Spiritualists should most certainly be a praying people. Those who have been honored by the gift of mediumship should most certainly get into conditions, enrapport, as it were, with the visitant spirits of that other sphere, thus conducing to and effectuating better and more truthful communications. All prayer lies in effort and study, and if we study how to bring about the best conditions that the best effects may be produced, the science of spirit phenomena will be greatly accelerated and increased; its influenced quickened, made richer and better, and its life become a more potent factor for good. Such I should hope would be the Spiritualists' prayer.

Good News for the Afflicted.

CONSULTATION AND ADVICE ABSOLUTELY FREE.

The Renowned Dr. Peebles with His Able Staff of Assistants Has Originated a System of Psychic, Hygienic, and Medical Treatments That is Curing Thousands That Were Called Incurable.

DR. J. M. PEEBLES.

DR. PEEBLES, the Grand Old Man of Battle Creek, Michigan, so well known throughout the world as an authority on Psychic Phenomena and the application of the Psychic Science in Curing Diseases, has, with a corps of able assistants, so perfected a system of curing chronic and so-called "incurable" cases that almost every disease known to man yields promptly and permanently when placed in their hands. Do not despair if other physicians and other methods have failed in your case, for they have on file thousands of letters from patients telling of their wonderful recovery under their care after years of unsuccessful treatment from the best physicians of the world. Geo. H. Weeks, of Cleveland, O., sends heartfelt thanks for restoration to health after suffering from nervous prostration and insomnia for years; he says he now enjoys excellent health and restful sleep every night. Mrs. J. A. Rust, of Itasca, Minn., cured of uric acid poisoning in two months' treatment, writes: "I am better than in years, and each day brings new health and strength. I will refer all ailing ones to you." Mary A. Earl, Crawford, Mich., suffering from pronounced female difficulties and kidney disease, says: "I took your treatment three months and it has been a success in my case. I am indeed grateful to you for my recovery." C. K. Davis, Woodman, N. H., who suffered all the miseries of a dyspeptic, writes that as the result of Dr. Peebles' treatment, he had not missed a meal since last March. D. W. Bridgman, of Del Norte, Colo., writing Sept. 30, after a three months' course; "When I began treatment with Dr. Peebles' Institute of Health I was a cripple, unable to walk but little with a cane. Now I am able to walk with ease. Some days ten or fifteen miles. I can hardly find words to express my gratitude as I had tried everything I could hear of and got no relief."

If you are in poor health, no matter how long you have suffered or what your complaint is just write the Doctors a plain truthful letter about your condition and then will confidentially consider the same and send you FREE OF CHARGE a full diagnosis of your case, together with valuable literature, explaining fully this grand science and their wonderful methods of treatment which gives hope to all the afflicted. Special advice in your case which in itself would be worth more to you than countless sums of money, for health is above all price. DISTANCE NO BARRIER. It matters not how far you may live from them their methods will restore you, for it is an ideal home treatment that can be successfully taken in your own home without detention from your daily duties or the knowledge of anyone. The founder of this Institute spent over fifty years in study and investigation in perfecting this method, and it is, without doubt, the most wonderful and effective form of treatment ever discovered by man. IT IS A COMBINING OF THE MENTAL WITH THE PHYSICAL, THE PSYCHIC WITH THE MEDICAL AND HYGIENIC A SYSTEM OFTEN ATTEMPTED IN THE PAST BUT NEVER BEFORE PERFECTED. ABSOLUTELY THE BEST THAT SCIENCE CAN PRODUCE is brought into your own home and at a cost within the reach of all, for the Doctors charge nothing whatever for advice and counsel and only a moderate charge to cover actual cost of remedies used in preparation of the medical part of the treatment. It is a greater pleasure to the Doctors to spread their GRAND METHOD and restore the sick and teach them how to stay cured than be possessed of great riches. If your health is poor, no matter whether you have suffered years or only a few weeks, write at once for their diagnosis of your case and literature disclosing the grandest system of treatment ever discovered. THOS. J. HAYNES.

Mrs. Isaac Shinneman passed to spirit life, from her home in Farmer City, Ill., Nov. 2, 1901, aged 56 years. Mrs. Shinneman had for many years been an earnest Spiritualist, and with her husband had been promoters of, and contributors to, the Free Progressive Church of that city, which was dedicated last March, hers being the first funeral held in the new church. Services were conducted by Mrs. A. E. Kibby, of Cincinnati, O., assisted by Mrs. India Hill, of Decatur, Ill. Interment at Weldon, Ill.

COR.

Hattie E. Bailey, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. George Bailey, of 34 Wilmington street, Rochester, N. Y., passed to the higher life, Nov. 10. Hattie was a medium, loved by all who knew her. She was nineteen years of age. Services were conducted by the writer.

MRS. R. W. BARTON.

Mrs. Emeline E. Wood passed to spirit life, October 30, 1901. She was 81 years old. She had been a Spiritualist since the Rochester knockings were first heard. She was a medium (not a public one), and did many good deeds for the cause.

MRS. GEO. F. BROOKS.

Pittsfield, N. H.

Mrs. Harriet Skinner wife of R. D. Skinner, passed to spirit life from Marcellus township, Mich., October 28, 1901, aged 66 years. Through her as a medium for many years, that light which is to illumine the world has been shining, without price or compensation, in the form of communications of instruction and consolation from spirit friends. It was through her mediumship that "Farmer" Riley first became interested in Spiritualism, and began his developing circles, and of whose wonderful manifestations the world has heard. Funeral services at her home, October 30, conducted by H. L. Chapman, of Marcellus, Mich.

COR.

Passed to spirit life, from her late residence in St. Paul, on Nov. 15, Mrs. Emma Rebecca Hall, aged 66 years. She was a highly educated lady of superior and refined mind, a loving and devoted wife and mother. In her early years was trained in the strictest New England orthodoxy, yet her aspirations were for a higher spirituality, and in search of truth she investigated the facts and philosophy of Spiritualism, in which she became a devoted laborer. Her disposition was of the gentlest and sweetest; to know her was to love her. Surviving her is an aged, devoted husband (a veteran Spiritualist).

TO SPIRITUALISTS.

The Progressive Thinker in its issue of October 26, very kindly printed the address delivered by the undersigned at the N. S. A. annual convention in Washington. Following out a suggestion made to me, I have sent a great many copies of the address to Spiritualists who in turn have passed them out to Liberalists and members of churches. The reports thus far show that the address is going to be an excellent missionary document. Hoping this is true, I have, therefore, concluded to reproduce the address in pamphlet form, and will send to any Spiritualist, without charge, as many copies as he thinks he could use. Please address me at Lima, Ohio. JAMES B. TOWNSEND.

—THE—

Christs of the Past and Present.

By MOSES HULL,

A comparison of the Christ-work or Mediumship of Biblical Messiahs and the conditions they required, with similar manifestations in Modern Spiritualism. This is a good work to study for arguments with which to meet the very common orthodox question, "Why do you always require conditions for your spiritual manifestations?" Cloth bound, 25 cents; paper 25 cents. For sale at this office.

Were You Born Under a Lucky Star?

A complete exposition of the science of Astrology, adapted from the Four Books of Ptolemy, the Astronomer on the art of Reading the Stars, with many illustrations. By A. ALPHEUS, Secretary of the Astrological Society of England and America. Handsomely bound in cloth, gilt top, with beautiful designs stamped on side and back. Price $1.00. For sale at this office.

THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER.

SPIRITUALISM—Progress, the Universal Law of Nature; Thought, the Solvent of Her Problems.—SPIRITUALISM

VOL. 25. CHICAGO, ILL., DEC. 7, 1901. NO. 628.

THE N. S. A.,

And Its Disgruntled Friends.

In reply to The Progressive Thinker's comments upon my letter in the issue of November 16, I will tax you with a few words.

From a positive comprehensive view of our public cause I can positively say there are numerous Spiritualists who, from prejudice and misunderstanding, are trying to tear down the usefulness of the N. S. A. These are the disgruntled people of whom I spoke—and also said The Progressive Thinker had joined. And this is true indirectly—because your severe comments give them aid and comfort; and you are encouraging opposition and lack of support by saying the continuation of "blunders will result in the extinction of the N. S. A." If you prophesy death for the N. S. A., you encourage it and make it possible.

By rising above bad results and gathering our forces to fight for the right, we encourage and create life. The late convention was a very competent one and a large one. Its results were good in many ways—and bad (strictly bad) in no way whatever. Some things might have been better done, and some good things were not done, that should have resulted. But the errors should point the way to future action. As I see it, we need a National Association of State Associations and then there will result a better personnel in the convention because of more careful delegate selection. The good results are worth working for, instead of making impossible by destroying the basis of such achievement.

No one ever has asked that the N. S. A. shall not be criticised. Instead of being too delicate to be criticised, it has been so robust that it has stood an avalanche of opposition and has made headway. If criticism will kill it, then let it die! But do not abuse it from prejudice. Let justice be done. I have severely criticised the N. S. A., but I sought to do it in its conventions where I could correct its errors. That is where an enemy of wrongs being perpetrated will become a true friend.

The N. S. A. is the great body of Spiritualists—and its errors are their errors. Let us discuss ways and means and correct errors.

Your journal and others are the mouthpieces of Spiritualists. Tell what you want—but do so in a supreme effort to correct whatever is wrong and to achieve the best. Let us build on what we have, and not tear down ruthlessly what has cost so much to build.

We need organization. Let us develop it. Let all go to Boston next year and bring the best wisdom to secure what our cause most needs. No duly accredited delegate will be muzzled, nor be unduly influenced—if they have a mind of their own and know what they want and our cause requires.

Agitate all the year—and get the much needed legislation properly before the people. You should thus mold the delegates for needed results.

If another president or any officer is desired, work to obtain such. President Barrett has been re-elected each year as much because no one has sought the place, as by the personal desire he may have entertained. If he seeks it, then let any one desiring the position seek it and work for it. I have not so far seen a candidate for the presidency develop a campaign.

Your suggestions covered several available persons—but no rally was made to any one. Brother Sprague declined in the convention to allow his name to be used even for a nomination. With no avowed nor proposed candidate, what could the delegates do, but vote for the man who has well served, and was willing to continue? I do not deplore the idea of working for the president, nor any official. But the person should not do that—the people should call the person.

When Mrs. Longley was first elected as secretary, it was by a popular call, made in advance through the spiritual press. That did not drag our convention into politics; to the contrary it resulted in a harmonious and wise election of a competent official. Do the same all this year for a president, and the people will welcome and the delegates will obey their will. Brother Barrett will also be glad to see a popular choice.

But whoever is elected, should have the undivided support of all Spiritualists. The president of the N. S. A. cannot be a Figure-head. The position demands activity. It may have been a mistake to elect the same person nine consecutive years, but that does not make him either a boss or a Figure-head. It will be well to dignify this office and to respect its occupant. The position is a proud one, and no one suggested for it should be insensible to the honor. If improper effort shall be made by anyone to secure or hold the position then that person should be turned out. But, when elected by fair means, or re-elected repeatedly, no unwarranted attack should result in a disgraceful defeat.

I plead for the occupant to be honored when honor is due. And whatever is necessary for our cause, we should labor for. We look to our spiritual papers for protection from wrongs and the espousal of the right. These should be done in the altruistic spirit, with a sincere desire for justice, and without malice. I am sure The Progressive Thinker will seek the right, as it ever has so strenuously, and that it will uphold the N. S. A. in all good work, and with charity for errors so criticise and advise that the future may witness success and utility built upon past failures. I am sure The Progressive Thinker desires success and not the failure of the N. S. A. Fraternally,

GEORGE. W. KATES.

Just as we expected. Those who have been calmly criticising the N. S. A. are still regarded in the light of being badly disgruntled, while those who are really the genuine disgruntled, are led by our good brother, Mr. Kates. He has worked himself up to a feeling of peculiar nervous excitement because a spirit of kindly criticism has arisen in regard to the N. S. A. Nearly every delegate who went to Washington from the West, returned home with a feeling in many respects akin to disgust, but with no intention whatever of dealing death-blows to the N. S. A. Spiritualism had an unparallelled growth before the N. S. A. was inaugurated. Its mediums were as good then as now; its speakers were equally as eloquent then, and its meetings were more largely attended then than now. No one then thought of any decline in Spiritualism, but since the inauguration of the N. S. A. that thought has been unwisely spread broadcast throughout the country.

A convention like the one held at Washington has a distinct personnel, and that personnel makes either a favorable or an unfavorable impression, depending on the officers and the delegates, and their methods of action. The fact that its leading official published without any comment a proposition to return to Mr. Mayer his splendid gift of $15,000 because he expressed his candid opinion prior to the convention, has done more to make an unfavorable impression of the personnel of the N. S. A. than anything else. Spiritualism without a single medium's home, without a single charitable institution, and with no place for the superannuated workers, the gift of Mr. Mayer came like a great light from a cloudy sky, and notwithstanding that fact the leading officer of the N. S. A. published a proposition without comment to return the price of his gift to him. While the N. S. A. took no action in that direction, to the outsider—to the one who calmly reflects, and uses a little common sense, it was a damaging blow to that body, for no one in the future will make such a generous gift to it as Mr. Mayer did, providing he intends to use his influence to elevate the N. S. A., for the very gift would actually destroy the giver's influence among a certain class, and whenever he tries to work a reform, this will be thrown in his face, that he "needn't think he can buy the N. S. A. because he made it a princely gift," and a proposition is likely to be made to return the same, as in the case of Mr. Mayer.

The real work of elevating Spiritualism can not be done successfully by the N. S. A. There are more laws now on the statute books of the different states inimical to mediums than when the N. S. A. was first inaugurated, and even in the District of Columbia, the headquarters of our cause, an unjust discrimination is made, and so far the N. S. A. has been powerless to remove it. The State Associations are the principal ones to renovate, elevate, and promote our cause; they are the ones to prevent hostile legislation; in fact they are the ones to promote as far as possible our cause, while the N. S. A. can not well be regarded otherwise than a mere figure-head—a necessary one, perhaps—a figure-head without any absolute authority in law only to receive bequests. Now that Spiritualists have a home, permanent headquarters in Washington, bequests should be made direct to the various state associations whose legal status is equally as well defined as that of the N. S. A. We call upon wealthy Spiritualists everywhere, in making donations to kindly consider their respective state organizations, for if they make it to the N. S. A., and thereafter try to influence that body for good, a proposition is likely to be made to return it to them.

By all means, let the N. S. A. live. We want it to be an instrument for good, but at most, as we have said before, it can only be a mere figure-head to shine by reflected light; it is simply a figure-head to-day, and that is about all it was ever intended for.

The State Associations will be the leading factors in all reformatory work in the future, and to them Spiritualists must look for real progress.—Editor.

RAPID TRANSIT.

The first train leaves at 6 p. m.
For the land where the poppy blows,
The mother dear is the engineer,
And the passenger laughs and crows.

The palace car is the mother's arms;
The whistle a low, sweet strain;
The passenger winks and nods and blinks,
And goes to sleep on the train.

At 8 p. m. the next train starts
For the poppy land afar.
The summons clear falls on the ear,
"All aboard for the sleeping car!"

But what is the fare to poppy land?
I hope it is not too dear;
The fare is this—a hug and a kiss—
And it's paid to the engineer.

So I ask of Him who children took
On His knee in kindness great,
"Take charge, I pray, of the trains each day
That leave at 6 and 8."

"Keep watch on the passengers," thus I pray,
"For to me they are very dear;
And special ward, O gracious Lord,
O'er the gentle engineer.

THE FUNERAL

I was walking in Savannah, past a church decayed and dim,
When there slowly through the windows came a plaintive funeral hymn;
And a sympathy awakened, and a wonder quickly grew,
Till I found myself environed in a little negro pew.

Out at front a colored couple sat in sorrow nearly wild;
On the altar was a coffin, in the coffin was a child.
I could picture him when living—curling hair, protruding lip—
And had seen perhaps a thousand in my hurried Southern trip.

But no baby ever rested in the soothing arms of Death
That had fanned more flames of sorrow with his little fluttering breath;
And no funeral ever glistened with more sympathy profound
Than was in the chain of tear-drops that enclasped these mourners round.

Rose a sad old colored preacher at the little wooden desk—
With a manner grandly awkward, with a countenance grotesque;
With simplicity and shrewdness on his Ethiopian face;
With the ignorance and wisdom of a crushed, undying race.

And he said: "Now, don't be weepin' for dis pretty bit o' clay—
For de little boy who lived dere, he done gone an' run away!
He was doin' very finely, an' he 'preciate your love;
But his sure 'nuff Father want him in de large house up above.

"Now, He didn' give you dat baby, by a hundred thousan' mile!
He just think you need some sunshine, an' He lend it for awhile!
An' He let you keep an' love it, till your hearts was bigger grown;
An' dese silver tears you're shedding's jest de interest on de loan.

"Jere yer oder pretty chillun!—don't be makin' it appear
Dat your love got sort o' 'nop'lized by dis little fellow here;
Don' pile up too much your sorrow on deir little mental shelves,
So's to kind o' set 'em wonderin' if dey're no account demselves!

"Just you think, you pooah deah mounahs, creepin' 'long o'er Sorrow's way,
What a blessed little picnic dis yere baby's got to-day!
Your good faders and good moders crowd de little fellow round
In de angel-tended garden of de Big Plantation Ground.

"An' dey ask him, 'Was your feet sore?' an' take off his little shoes,
An' dey wash him, an' dey kiss him, an' dey say, 'Now what's de news?'
An' de Lord done cut his tongue loose; den the little fel- say,
'All our folks down in de valley tries to keep de hebbenly way.'

"An' his eyes dey brightly sparkle at de pretty things he view;
Den a tear come, an' he whisper, 'But I want my parents, too!'
But de Angel Chief Musician teach dat boy a little song,
Says, 'If only dey be fait'ful dey will soon be comin' 'long.'

"An' he'll get an education dat will proberly be worth
Seberal times as much as any you could buy for him on earth;
He'll be in de Lawd's big school-house widout no contempt or fear;
While dere's no end to de bad tings might have happened to him here.

"So, my pooah, dejected mounahs, let your hearts wid Jesus rest,
An' don't go to critercisin' dat ar One w'at knows de best!
He have sent us many comforts—He have right to take away—
To de Lawd be praise an' glory now and ever!—Let us pray!"

HERMETIC BROTHERHOOD.

Temple Talks—Atomic Potency.

It is often asked, "What is the purpose of the Brotherhood work? Why is it, for years and years, the Invisibles have tried to bring about a certain consummation? Why is it, that the wise in the visible have gladly forwarded the labor on the plane of manifestation?" We reply: Because we held, in trust for the world, under obligation, matters of the utmost importance. That they are needed, is demonstrated by the fact, without reorganization, or a new permeation of potency, mankind as a whole, stands in imminent danger of falling into a chaotic condition. This is acknowledged by those who think deeply; it is confessed by those whose thoughts go beyond the present. They ask, "What next? What lies beyond, even in the near future?"

The Masters of Potency say: "We can help the world come back to such condition as shall put aside this feeling of unrest; of fear; of dissolution." But the mighty, who know only physical dominance, reply, "But you are few."

"Yes, but the few may become many."

"But," they still protest, "you have little influence, even as you are; the hours are passing swiftly to the time and necessity for the use of the forces you claim you can put forth."

Very true, but in our Record of Adept Truth, there is a declaration, the result of experience, in the wisdom of the Wise, which says: "God hath chosen the weak things of the world to confound the strong." This is the point which we desire to use as our starting place.

A single breath of wind will send the avalanche crashing into the valley. The slightest change on the electric plane may hurl into the atmosphere, through the action of changing polarity, a cyclone. The destruction which this cyclone can produce will be unmeasurable by any known value.

It is not necessary under any circumstances whatever, that a movement to be irresistible and overpowering, shall so commence. Suppose there is an embankment, beyond which lies a mighty body of imprisoned waters. A single drop, percolating through this embankment, may lead the way for another and another. Finally, a little stream trickles through, and beyond that a mightier. Soon, with the rush of an overpowering torrent, the whole weight of the waters behind sweeps out, carrying everything before it.

A single word, on the proper key, may so change the polarity of the whole environment as to create an entirely different condition of thought for miles about the individual uttering it.

A breath, a potent thought put forth into the atmosphere at the proper time, may upset the harmony of a whole city.

It was well said by Him, whom you regard as one of the greatest of teachers, "Let your yea be yea; and your nay, nay, for beyond lieth evil." No words are put out into the atmosphere; no thoughts go forth into the ether, without producing their effect. If these thoughts are intensified by the thoughts, actions and powers of several unified individuals, there is accumulated on the unseen planes, something that may go back to torment and plague those who have been active in sending out unjust or disastrous forces. But in all movements of this kind, for good or evil, (for the force used in each is the same, as the explosive of opposing armies may be of exactly the same composition), the first appearance is simply the change of polarity in a single atom. That accomplished, the next atom is affected, and so along the line, until every atom has changed its polarity. If the potency is increased or continued, then another line is affected and another. Then all at once, the intensified force of those changing polarities moves divergently from the straight lines—the organism is fully transmuted. The changing is the beginning, perhaps, of wide-spread evil to the sons of men.

That which may be good can also be evil. That is to say, the One Cause is behind all effect. In the majority of cases, the going forth is evil or obstructive to man, because he puts it forth carelessly and this produces inharmony. It is because the whole world is inharmonious that we feel so disturbed, so much overcome; so much obstructed in all we desire to do. But whatever happens, however great the force, however overwhelming the potency, the beginning is at the single atom. Just as it is in our wide-spread public enterprises. Here, too, the atom takes its part in thought, because the polarity at a certain point, brings into the brain of some thinker a new thought-combination. The single individual thinks the thought. He voices it. Another man approves and sustains it, and suddenly the thought becomes the property of several. Thus urged on, the single thought becomes the prevailing thought of a nation—of the world.

Is it not well for us to keep in mind these two important points: We are never to despair if our force seems small, for one is the most potent of all numbers. We are to make the most of our environment, under all circumstances and at all times.

W. P. PHELON, M. D.

Mrs. Tingley Is Defended.

The Los Angeles Times of yesterday contained a sensational story purporting to be an interview with Mrs. M. Leavitt, formerly a resident of this city, in which serious allegations were made concerning the treatment of inmates of the Point Loma Homestead. These statements are refuted in detail in the following communication and affidavits:

Editor Union:—On the last two Sundays, at the Fisher opera house, Mrs. Katherine Tingley has been compelled to somewhat forcibly draw attention to attacks which have been made upon her and upon her organization. So widespread have been these slanderous attacks that I imagine there were but few among the audience who were previously acquainted with them. While necessarily holding back for a future occasion very much of the information which is now within her hands, she endeavored, and I believe successfully, to show that these attacks emanate in the first instance from the so-called Theosophical society, sometimes known as the Besant party, who have made use, as their tools, of certain foolish and spiteful ministers in this city and elsewhere. I believe that what Mrs. Tingley said carried with it a large measure of conviction, but whatever further evidence is needed is supplied with a curious promptness by yesterday's issue of the Los Angeles Daily Times. The farrago of mendacious folly which appears in that paper respecting Mrs. Tingley and her work is too lengthy and too silly for extensive quotation here. The headlines are, however, almost a sufficient index to the quality of the letter press. They read as follows:

"Outrages at Point Loma," "Exposed by an 'Escape' from Tingley," "Startling Tales told in this City," "Women and Children Starved and Treated Like Convicts; Thrilling Rescue."

The "exposures" mainly consist of the supposed revelations of Mrs. Holbrook and Mrs. Neresheimer. They are all sufficiently disposed of by the affidavits of which copies are attached hereto. These and the remainder of the charges are so fatuous that they are their own reply. There may possibly be weak-minded people in Los Angeles who will believe anything, but here in San Diego where Mrs. Tingley's work is better known by personal observation, each falsehood will carry its own refutation to the mind of the reader. My object, however, at the moment, is not to answer what needs no answer, but rather to point out that this long scream of abuse which embraces well-nigh all the charges to which public attention was drawn at the opera house emanates from a Mrs. M. Leavitt who was greatly occupied with the slanders inaugurated by Col. Olcott during his recent visit to this city and who left with similar precipitancy when Mrs. Tingley began to publicly handle the matter. No more striking and no more immediate confirmation of that lady's contention could be desired and I believe that your readers will share this opinion. Yours truly,

SIDNEY G. P. CORYN.

AFFIDAVIT OF MRS. E. A. NERESHEIMER.

State of California, County of San Diego. ss.

The statements contained in the Los Angeles Times of October 28, 1901, about myself: that I have been forcibly separated from my husband, that I am not allowed to speak to him, that I am forced to live alone in a little tent on the grounds that surround the institution, are one and all malicious and false from beginning to end. The fact is that I am married twenty-eight years, that I have never lived separated from my husband, that I am living most happily with him in luxurious apartments at the beautiful homestead at Point Loma, and, furthermore, I emphatically state, being qualified to do so after a residence of ten months at Point Loma Homestead, that one other statement contained in the article of the Los Angeles Times about the general conditions at Point Loma and the treatment of children by Katherine Tingley and the Universal Brotherhood, is totally false and I am of the opinion that the statements about myself and against Katherine Tingley and the Universal Brotherhood organization have been purposely invented and circulated with the malicious intent to injure Katherine Tingley and the Universal Brotherhood, and that my name has been used on account of my being the wife of a trusted cabinet officer of the institution in order to serve the ends of these malicious falsifiers

I am glad of this opportunity to be able to state that the rosy and happy children of this institution are a living testimony of the most gentle, kind and proper treatment which they receive.

COGENT COMMENTS.

The Spirituality of Spiritualists.

Being perfectly willing of running the gauntlet of all manner and mode of criticism as a "carping crank," and having all sorts of dire anathema maranatha flung at my poor head from several directions of the compass in payment for some of my former remarks, I at the same time desire to thank those kind old mothers and fathers in "Israel" who have so heartily thanked me for what others found naught but sharp and sarcastic rhetoric; and therefore, after these preliminary words beg to offer a few thoughts from my correspondent in Cuba, Mr. J. H. Bickford, who, by the way, is a brother of Mrs. Addie C. Littlefield, who, I believe, is favorably known as a medium in the East, particularly in Boston:

"As to the decline of Spiritualism, I think it is as generally understood, but really, NO. In my researches the last five years, I have found more real Spiritualists who did not attend so-called Spiritualist meetings or belong to a society, than I have met in the societies. This may seem a broad statement, but I believe it true. You ask them why they do not belong to a society, and the answer is, 'I do not care to associate with people of such moral character as some who are the foremost in the societies here, for they are too well known as anything but spotless. Here, at home, we enjoy our religion.' And one old couple told me: 'Could we expect our daughter in spirit life to manifest in a crowd like there is in —— hall? We would not insult her by thinking of it.' So for years, this old couple have kept a cabinet, and although not rich, have had a medium in their own home, and they have been well repaid, for their parlor is hung with large paintings of 'their dear ones gone on;' and when a sensitive enters the room, he can perceive the force. It is a temple kept sacred to the spirit friends. They are readers of at least two Spiritualist papers, and both are well wishers for the cause, but although they do a great deal of work for it, are not known in either of the two (or three) societies in that city, Lynn, Mass.

"This is only one case; there is another in the same city—one of the best mediums in the city is not known in public at all, but she has all the work she can do giving sittings. So you may see that the real Spiritualists are being slowly driven from the ranks of the Spiritists, for there is only one in a hundred, and the mass rules. So in time, I think, the so-called Spiritualists of today will become extinct, and true spiritual Spiritualism be elevated to its proper place—the head of all religions of the new if not the whole world.

"At present it does nothing to put it by the side of other religions of the world. The others send their workers abroad here in Cuba—a nation of sensitives—one of the best fields in the world for Spiritualism, and workers for it if it has any, there are none; no organized effort at all. But is that the way with other religions? Oh, no! There are plenty of them preaching ignorance to the poor people and doing a great deal of good in the way of looking after poor children, and a good deal of bad in preaching hell-fire and brimstone to them.

"If Spiritualism is what our great speakers and writers say it is, where are they? Why are they not here teaching these people the light of their great truth, and caring for the little ones, who, could they be brought up under the teachings of Spiritualism, would produce some of the best sensitives the world has ever seen? Why not a Spiritualist lyceum as well as a Baptist Sunday-school or a W. C. T. U. or a Y. M. C. A., or any of the many other societies already started? Not a little whisper from the Spiritualists! Not a move, not even a comment in their papers!

"Are they all gone to the beautiful Summerland of which they tell so much, or are they so busy getting messages and chasing after phenomena from the beautiful life beyond the grave, that they have not the time to think of the thousands here in this beautiful land, that have been bound down in the utter darkness of a religion of ignarance, governed by a body of crafty and corrupt and bloodthirsty priests. Have I a right to say this? History answers a most emphatic Yes! They can not deny that in all history none can compare in savagery that of the Spanish Inquisition. That the burning of a few negroes in the United States is a disgrace to the Americanos no one of intelligence can gainsay. Although their crimes deserve heavy punishment, let the law deal with them.

If this is a disgrace to the United States, what was the burning of over 31,000 people by that institution of the 'Mother Church'—the Inquisition? One ruler in the fifteenth century burnt at the stake 10,220; burnt in effigy, the persons having died in prison or fled the country, 6,860; punished with infamy, perpetual banishment, etc., 97,321, making a grand total of 114,401. Another, a Holy Father, Ximines, a cardinal, burnt 3,564; otherwise punished, 49,291, making a total of 52,855. But, don't hug yourselves, Baptists or Presbyterians, or other Protestant churches! You have burned! You have hanged! You have tortured! You, who are descended from Puritan blood, don't be too proud of it! They came to America to worship God! But how long were they here before they were hanging men and women, and whipping them from town to town, and nailing their ears to door-jambs, and boring their tongues with red-hot irons? Because they were Quakers and worshiped differently! But so far as I can find, no such black and red damnable stains in the path of Spiritualism. I am more than proud to say that.

"As to Spiritualism being a religion, is it, or is it not? One can very easily believe in table-tipping, trumpet-speaking, hand-writing on the wall, materialization, etc., (the most of the so-called Christians are—have to be, if they believe the Bible, which is hardly anything but a record of such phenomena) and yet be a great way from being a Spiritualist. I know very well I am not. Why? Because I am not spiritual enough. To be a Real Spiritualist one must be pure in Soul and mind, free from all impure things and desires; pure as the holiest and cleanest person who dares to call himself a Christian or anything else on this green earth, and who does no wrong thing because he never thinks of such things, and habitually breathes pure air.

"And all this, my friends, must be lived and done without any hope of reward (as commonly understood from the cast-iron orthodox standpoint of rewards and punishments). No reward of merit for a true Spiritualist? Only the love of Right because it is Right, with the knowledge that when the little life on this earth is ended, and the next one entered, there is to be met Justice, no more, no less! No orthodox Savior to save, no ungodly God to destroy! But your own soul to face and to wash till it is whiter than snow—the great question is, What is the best kind of washing powder?

"The Christians think they have a laundryman, and ought to know what every true Spiritualist knows, that love for their fellow-beings, carried out in good works and kind words, honest lives and noble aspirations, make the only course that will insure a happy home on high, where they may still continue it in helping their fellow-beings who have been blinded by the false teachings of a materialistic church, for the most part of the churches are materialistic, have a literal city of gold, and other priceless things to excite their love of display and greed, to become a shareholder in the Holy Trust, or be scared into it by the lake of fire, where another inquisition is going on with fire for its chief instrument of torture.

"How absurd to think of the Overruling Power of the universe as one with all the passions of a human, jealousy being the most prominent. Why is it so? Because one human race has not been capable of realizing the vastness of it, comprehending it no more than an infant could understand the working of the most intricate machine. Therefore, it has been made to the capacity of the mind of man.

Not long since an American, who calls himself a Spiritualist, came into my tent, and I spoke of Spiritualism as a religion, and he at once said, 'I don't like to hear anyone call it that. It is not!' We had quite a little discussion on the subject, I taking the stand that it was; that in fact to be a true Spiritualist one must necessarily live as good, aye, a better life than a Christian, and it must be done with no hope of reward, as generally understood, therefore was a harder life to live according to a human standpoint than the Christian's, and that if there is such a thing as religion, Spiritualism is it.

"If you go by the generally understood meaning of the term, it is not. But we must not give the same definition to such cognate terms as do the orthodox! Remember that, brothers and sisters. I am not sufficiently educated to write independently my ideas on the good of the cause, being obliged at the death of a brother, to leave school at the age of fourteen, and have been hustling for a living ever since, so pass my crude thoughts on to you to dress up in more presentable language and form. Yet I find that Webster says Spiritualism is not a religion, but as commonly used it is.

"Concerning this country, I have a thirty-five acre tobacco plantation, all plowed and planted by myself, and am thus a very busy, hard-working Yankee in Cuba. It is a nation of Sensitives, and there are some believers in Spiritualism here, but they are very quiet. Why shouldn't they be, here in Pinar del Rio, but a few years ago, a young girl had her eyes torn out because she was a clairvoyant, so I was told by a native; and many of them call me the devil, because I can tell them some few things they knew I could never learn in, to them, a natural way. But I hope the itinerant peddler of Spiritualism, the traveling fortune-teller, will never come here (although they would reap a harvest of pesos), because they are an injury to the true cause. But I should like to see a corps of workers, teachers, lecturers and phenomena mediums come here. The other religious denominations have sent to help the poor, teach the ignorant. Come and give them the light of what ought to be the greatest boon to mankind—the knowledge that they can learn from good ones gone on before how to live here on earth, and how to prepare for that higher and better, let us hope, life to come after."

I do not feel that I could say more than Brother Bickford has said on the present subject. Spiritualists do not act one whit better than the so-called, self-styled Christian denominations, who wrangle with each other on points of doctrine and piously curse all who differ from them. We do the same. Upon only one thing are they at all united, and that is, abusing the Spiritualists. Well, if I were a hide-bound orthodox, I am afraid I would throw pretty strong Bible language at those who attempted to take away my religious prop, and actually proved it to be unsound. I really am afraid I should not like it. But, although we are a lot of intellectual bushwhackers, let us not crucify each other, brothers and sisters; how can the cause progress in decency when there is so much bickering, fault-finding and jealousy in the ranks? Will those who abuse the missionary spirit please shut off on what they would do if they were missionaries, and go down to Cuba, as Brother Bickford suggests, and show themselves "martyrs for the cause" as they have howled so lustily for years back, or else "forever after hold their peace." I am not talking to the one who is doing and has done all he or she in reason can do or did do, but to the ones of ample means and opportunity who desire to attract attention from themselves by vociferous squalling at others. And may the blessings of the spirit world intelligently shadow over us all, now and forevermore. Amen. U. G. FIGLEY.

THE GREATEST DEBATE WITHIN A HALF CENTURY UPON MODERN SPIRITUALISM

DISPUTANTS:

REV. MOSES HULL,

President New York State Spiritualists' Association, Headquarters, Buffalo, N. Y.

—AND—

W. F. JAMIESON,

Secretary National Liberal League, Headquarters, Cincinnati, Ohio.

PROPOSITION:

Resolved, That the phenomena and philosophy of Modern Spiritualism prove that departed spirits can communicate with mankind.

MR. HULL'S THIRD SPEECH.

(Fifth Address of the Debate.)

Gentlemen Moderators, Ladies and Gentlemen:—Mr. Jamieson has said many things to which I am aching to reply, but I must adhere to my determination to open each of my affirmative speeches with one or two astounding facts—facts which can neither be doubted nor dodged. It may be "unlucky for the facts" to be dragged into a debate like this, but I have become so used to using them that it will not do for me to forsake them now.

I need not tell my opponent who Charles Partridge was. He knew him before I did. A more honest, or a more intelligent man would be very hard to find. In 1850 he, very much against his will, was converted to Spiritualism. He afterward spent a fortune in promulgating it to the world. Undoubtedly Mr. Jamieson has enjoyed reading Mr. Partridge's "Spiritual Telegraph." The philosophy and the phenomena of Spiritualism were both meat and drink to Mr. Partridge.

As presiding officer over a debate between my worthy opponent and myself, he sent many waves of pity to Mr. Jamieson, who was suffering under the fire of a red-hot stream of facts fired from my batteries.

Mr. Partridge published the history of his conversion to Spiritualism. Like my opponent, he at first was willing to accept any other than the correct explanation of Spiritual manifestations.

Like the ancient maiden lady, who retired to a tree under the branches of which to devoutly pray for a sharer in the woes and miseries of her life, when an owl in the tree above her said, "Who, who," she responded, "Anybody, Lord," these anti-Spiritualists are ready to accept any theory, no matter how absurd, if it will only confirm them in their faith that man is only an animal made up wholly of flesh and bones and animated by breath.

Like a great majority of other wise men, Mr. Partridge was finally compelled to surrender. He attended a seance with the Fox sisters, in Rochester, N. Y., in September, 1850, which he reports as follows:

"The mediums, the Misses Fox, did not know me, neither did they know that I ever had a brother, or know his age, time of death, etc.; but through the raps and the use of the alphabet his whole history was given to me. The day of the week, the day of the month, the hour of the day of his death was given me; his business and property were disclosed and every test question I was capable of putting was correctly answered. My ability to test him became exhausted, and yet I told him I did not believe he was communicating, but that by some means, my own knowledge of the facts was reproduced through the raps. He then said, I will communicate to you a matter of business, of which you can have no knowledge, but which will be confirmed by next mail. He then said, 'Messrs. Finley, Johnson & Co., of San Francisco, who had your goods for sale, have failed, and, will probably not pay one cent on the dollar they owe.' I answered, 'It cannot be true; the house is reputed to be very wealthy; and instead of this last communication confirming that the spirit of my brother is present it makes me, if possible, still more skeptical, because I feel sure this last communication is not true.' The spirit added further that he did not think that I should even get an account of the sale of the goods.

"The next mail brought letters confirming the failure. I subsequently wrote to the parties several times, requesting account of sales, which they did not send. I then sent my account to a house there, to intercede for me and get an account of sales. They tried to obtain such an account, and finally wrote me they could not, and advised me to trouble myself no further about the matter; for if I succeeded in getting an account of sales the house would not pay one cent on the dollar. And these things I never had the means of knowing were disclosed to me, and things I did not believe at the time have been confirmed."

Now any explanation of this that leaves the spirit of Mr. Partridge's brother out of the case, would enable Mr. Jamieson to play Hamlet with Hamlet left out. Let Mr. Jamieson say what he may, I ask if the Spiritual hypothesis is not the natural one—the one which would suggest itself to any rational mind as the true explanation. Are not all other explanations rather far-fetched? Do not all other explanations look more like an invention to try to dodge the weight of the evidence, than like a straightforward effort to find the truth?

I will next present a case from memory. I clipped it out of The Progressive Thinker and laid it aside so carefully that I have not as yet been able to find it.

A lady, a Mrs. Parkhurst, who was not a Spiritualist until her recent experiments made her so, relates the matter about as follows: Her father was a very peculiar man; he kept all of his business to himself. Some years ago he suddenly went to the other world. The family knew he had money which he had hidden somewhere, but did not know where it was, nor could they find it.

After the death of this man the house seemed to be haunted, in so much that no one could be induced to live in it more than a few days at a time. These disturbances continued for years.

Bye and bye this lady, who lives in Nebraska, received a letter from a medium of whom she had never even heard. I believe it was a Mr. Cole. The letter informed her that her father had something of importance to communicate to her. She complied with the conditions, whatever they may have been. The result was, she got a communication from her father telling her exactly where to go and get that money.

She did as her father told her, and found the gold—several hundred dollars, exactly as her spirit father had said. This money she divided among the heirs. After this she received a communication from her father thanking her for what she had done; and stating that, as he had now done justice to his family he thought he could rest.

Now, of this communicotion I know nothing except what I saw in The Progressive Thinker, where I presume Mr. Jamieson read it; for it was not more than six or eight months since that it was published. I never heard of Mrs. Parkhurst before nor since. I did not even write to her postoffice to find out whether she was a reliable woman. I see no reason why a person should, of her own accord, write such statements except because they are true.

Mr. Jamieson has not touched one of my leading arguments; he finds it necessary to go out in search of floating straws to which to cling and thus keep up a half-appearance of attempting to review me. I wish, for his sake, not mine, he could be induced to grapple with my real arguments, but from past experience I fear I shall wish in vain.

I think it will be my duty, in as much as he does not follow me, to follow him. I will before I begin a new argument examine a few points in his last speech.

I introduced the most positive historical statements concerning the seeress of Prevorst—statements which, if true, place the evidences of Spiritualism beyond a peradventure; no one can admit the facts quoted from William Howitt, Dr. Kerner, and others, without admitting Spiritualism. This Mr. Jamieson meets with the statement that "Madame Hauffe was before the days of Modern Spiritualism."

Yes, she was. What of it? Did I assert that there had been no evidences of Modern Spiritualism before the Fox Sisters? or, as there were evidences of Spiritualism before the Fox girls does it follow that there can be none since?

Did I not prove by Dr. Samuel Johnson, that in every age and every nation men had witnessed the same phenomena and conversed with those whom we call dead?

The next assertion in Mr. Jamieson's speech worthy of notice was, that he "discovered that dark circles were frauds." I beg Mr. Jamieson's pardon; he made no such discovery. He may have discovered that frauds were sometimes practiced in some of the dark seances. Before he takes that chair in Logic he must learn that there can be no more in the conclusion of a proposition than there is in its premise.

Mr. Jamieson has attended a few dark seances and found that in some of them there were fraudulent manifestations; he concludes that therefore all dark seances are frauds. Now when Spiritualists assume that there never was a fraud committed in a dark seance, his wonderful discovery will have some point; not before.

Next my worthy respondent asserts that Spiritualists blame him for changing his mind. I never saw a man in my life who was as anxious to be persecuted as he is. I wish he would be kind enough to show me the Spiritualist who blames him for changing his mind. If he will I'll have him churched. I never heard one of them blame him for his change of opinion. I have seen a few who thought his judgment very weak; I am not sure but that I am somewhat of that opinion myself, but I have the first one to hear blame him for it. They all feel like saying, "Poor fellow! he doesn't know any better."

Mr. Jamieson is very sore because I asked him if he was honest when he played medium in that Paw Paw seance. Like Cæsar's wife he was above suspicion, and it was but little above an insult for me to imply that it was possible for him to do a dishonest act. I do not look at it in that light; on the contrary I fully believed him to be honest; if he was not at that time, I believe he is now, and that he would come out a la Samuel Phelps Leland, Von Vleck, Hagaman, et al, and would confess that, in order to fool the Spiritualists he had played a little game on them. The renegades from Spiritualism nearly all confess, from McQueen down, that they played medium; why might I not have reason to believe that he would confess to the same? But the fact is, I never had a thought but that he was honest in that seance; but I wanted to apply the inductive methods of reasoning to it. There are several hypotheses of that seance, inductive logic never tries but one at a time. The audience might say Mr. Jamieson played medium to fool Hull. I thought a direct answer from him on that question would set them to looking for another hypothesis.

If Brother Jamieson should be poisoned by eating his breakfast to-morrow morning, and if the coroner determined to find out which particular dish contained the poison, he would first try one, then another, and would keep on until he found which one it was that contained the poison.

Now Mr. Jamieson did do something which made his friends believe he was controlled by the parties I mentioned; it seems that he thought so at the time. Now he thinks differently, I want his hypothesis; he has not given it as yet. He says he was not dishonest. Very well, then there is one hypothesis out of the way. He, of all people in the world knows whether he was honest or not, and so I asked him. I did not know who else to ask. Mr. Jamieson says that man can be dishonest and play such games. Now he says that was not the case with him, so that hypothesis gives way to something else. Now let me say, I believed him perfectly honest when I asked that question, but I am not a good witness; I did not absolutely know whether he was or not, and if I did know, the world could not be as sure I knew as it is that he knows. Thus I am glad to have it from his own mouth. If I was prepared to give evidence, my evidence would be ex parte. I am interested to prove my case. Mr. Jamieson is not. When he says he was honest, he testifies that there were phenomena which cannot be accounted for on the ground of the dishonesty of the medium; perhaps it is the only absolutely honest case of mediumship in the world, I must make much of it, it is to help me prove my hypothesis.

Now that Mr. Jamieson has been forced to admit that he honestly supposed himself to be under the influence of that old philosopher, and others, his admission sets the hypothesis of cheating aside. That brings us to where we can try other hypotheses. My hypothesis is that Mr. Jamieson was under the influence of departed spirits. He says I am wrong; he is going to account for it without admitting the agency of departed spirits. He has also been compelled to reluctantly admit that he was honest. Now what was it that performed these extra-Jamiesonian wonders? Was it electricity? Was it Jamieson's subself? If so I would advise him to make arrangements with his sub-conscious self to come to the front and stay there. This he can do without conditions; for this audience will remember that he came down like a thousand of brick on conditions.

Mr. Jamieson says he was controlled by eighty-five different spirits. Isn't that wonderful, controlled by eighty-five nonentities? or were these eighty-five things lightning? He was honest, mark that, no place for a question there. You will offend his dignity if you ask one. Who or what was these eighty-five what-you-call-'ems? They every last one of them claimed to be spirits. Were they all liars? Well, whatever they may have been, they have been cast out, into the swine, and Mr. Jamieson does not associate with them now.

We are next treated to a dissertation on rope-tying, in the dark; on conditions, etc. It is true that ropes have been tied and untied in the dark; it is also true that mediums, like other people, require conditions. In connection with this he mentions certain mediums who renounced Spiritualism. Let me say, there have been very few renouncers.

Samuel Phelps Leland never renounced it; neither Dr. Von Vleck nor Hagaman renounced Spiritualism. Each of these persons told me they never renounced it, because they never believed it.

Leland, in his debate with me at Battle Creek, said he was young and wicked; he wanted to train in bad company; the Spiritualists were the worst company he could find, so he claimed to be a Spiritualist. Von Vleck said he pretended to be a Spiritualist, because he was "fishing for suckers," and he found plenty of them among the Spiritualists. In other words, he took advantage of their confidence in the mediums and spirits. Hagaman says he was a fraud all the time—never anything else than a fraud. Brother Jamieson is a good man, but when he gets in the company of so-called renouncers—well you have all heard the story of that poor, righteous dog Tray! that's the outcome of it.

Now, let me tell you a story about Dr. Von Vleck. The story was originally told me by George Winslow, of Kalamazoo, Mich. I did not believe the story; that is, I thought somebody had imposed on Mr. Winslow. But two weeks since, Mr. Wortman, in Buffalo, told me the same story. When he told it he said he was one of the parties, then I immediately became interested in it. Dr. Von Vleck gave an exposé of Spiritualism in Buffalo. Mr. Wortman was there. He says he never witnessed better manifestations in the dark, in his life. Dr. Von Vleck went home with Mr. Wortman, so did many others. When they got there Von Vleck boasted there again that he could do anything that any medium could do. They invited him to be tied. To this he readily consented. After he was tied he asked all to leave the room and take the light and he would show them how quickly he could untie himself. They left the room, but left the light burning on the piano. He was fastened to where he could not get to it without untying himself. All left the room but told him that perhaps he would need the light. They refused to take it; in about thirty minutes as they saw no signs of his coming out they went in to see how the Doctor was getting along. As he had as yet made no progress on account of bad conditions they gave him another, and a third trial. They let him work until between one and two o'clock, then they took the light out, and he soon came out of the room untied. He then and there confessed that it was a foreign power that tied and untied him. He begged of them not to give him away; they told him they would not if he would leave on the first train, and never return. He promised, and so far as Mr. Wortman knows, he kept his word.

Mr. Jamieson mentioned several mediums who had renounced Spiritualism, among them Mattie Hulet. Let me inform him that Mattie Hulet-Parry-Krekle never renounced Spiritualism. She told me so herself, in San Francisco and in Portland, Oregon.

Her story told to me twice was that she was a widow. Judge Krekle wanted to marry her, and as he was a lovely, a wealthy and a popular man, she wanted to marry him. While the judge was a liberal man he was not a Spiritualist. In fact, he hated Spiritualism. He would not be hitched up to a Spiritualist lecturer, so he demanded of her to cease advocating Spiritualism, which her love for him caused her to do. On his dying bed he again extorted the promise from her that she would never again take the Spiritualist rostrum.

With tears in her eyes she told me she felt the influence while talking with me, and while listening to me speak. Said she, "I dare not hear you; if I do I shall surely break my vow made to my dying husband."

The same thing can be said of Cephas B. Lynn and Nettie Pease Fox. Neither of them ever renounced Spiritualism. Mrs. Fox, for the sake of peace in the family, joined the Unitarian church, but she carried her Spiritualism with her into the church, just as thousands of others have done.

Cephas B. Lynn talked for twelve years of going into the Universalist church; not because Spiritualism was not, in his estimation, true, but because he was tired of itinerating at starvation prices. He wanted to settle down and be a pastor.

The quotations Mr. Jamieson made from Dr. Babbitt and Andrew Jackson Davis, I endorse. I have said the same things myself. I wish I had time to talk of and explain them.

Mr. Jamieson says, "No spirit has proved that a single word or thought ever came from the spirit world." How easy to make perfectly groundless assertions. Let me ask him:

1. Did I not show that Madame Hauffe saw and described the wine merchant's clerk. Did he not tell her the very place to find the missing papers?

2. Did not I prove that Baron Swedenborg saw the spirit of Mr. Harteman; inquired of him about the silver service, and Mr. Harteman told him right where to go and find the receipt in proof that he had paid the debt? Did not he go and find a drawer not known to be in existence by anybody on earth? and did he not there and then find the receipt?

3. Did not little Eva tell Mr. Johnson about the turkey pea blossoms?

Did not Charles Partridge's brother come to him and give him news that there was no earthly way of finding out?

These cases can be multiplied by thousands, but this will not stop this reckless young man from making foolish assertions.

Next, we are asked: "Why should spirits return? Jesus did that." I am glad to hear that, especially in the next sentence after asserting that "not a thought or a word ever came from the spirit world." Well, the Bible says, "We shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is." If he returned, why not allow those who are like him to do the same?

"Jesus," says Mr. Jamieson, "said, 'handle me.' Why should spirits be so sensitive about being touched?" Yes, Jesus once said, "handle me." Spirits have said the same. This same Jesus once said, "Touch me not, for I have not yet ascended to my God and to your God."

He next says, "Mr. Hull is not after truth, but a large following."

Did anybody beside Mr. Jamieson hear me say that? I was talking of public debates. When I debate I like to debate before the people. I would not debate with Mr. Jamieson under any other circumstances; he has not an argument but that I know as well as he does; why should I debate with him? I answer, for no other purpose than to have the people hear it. If he cannot call out a few more people than I can call out myself there is no use of further increasing his already overgrown combative lumps by joining him in debate. When I debate with other men and before large audiences I try to tell about the same amount of truth that I would going into a corner and debating with Mr. Jamieson.

The last thing Mr. Jamieson did was decidedly the best. Let me advise him to cease from debating and go to reciting Miss Doten's poems. While they prove nothing in this case, when he is repeating them he is talking good sense and good poetry. Dear brother, use Miss Doten's poems often, they will make your speeches sound and read better.

The Progressive Thinker one year and the eight Divine Plan books, $3.50.

In order to assist in forming a Spiritual and Occult Library in every Spiritualist's home, these eight valuable books, substantially and elegantly bound in cloth, are furnished to our subscribers for $2.50. We are able to do this, from the fact that the authors make no charge for the vast amount of labor bestowed on these works, and which extended over many years. That is why you are getting these intensely interesting books for the price you do. We are only carrying out the Divine Plan, inaugurated only by The Progressive Thinker. There are thousands of our subscribers who have no Spiritualist or Occult library, and this inducement is offered in order that they may commence forming one at once, and thus keep in line with the advancing procession. The postage on the above books and expense of mailing is about 95 cents, hence you are receiving them at an exceedingly low price—simply the result of modern enterprise combined with a desire to do good.

IMPORTANT MATTER FROM OUR FOREIGN EXCHANGES

LIGHT, LONDON, ENGLAND.

SOME NOTABLE WARNINGS.

I send you particulars of the following warnings, selected from many other mediumistic incidents that have happened to me during the last few years.

I have carefully omitted all extraneous matter and truthfully narrated the circumstances, which I noted down at the time of each occurrence:

Whilst conversing with my mother one afternoon, I saw (apparently objectively) a large brilliant white butterfly rise seemingly from out the ground at her feet. It fluttered towards the ceiling and disappeared, as if it were wending its way heavenwards. I mentioned this circumstance at the time and took note of the hour. My mother received news the next morning that her brother had passed to the higher life at that very hour.

I was visiting Conishead Priory one summer for several weeks. One Sunday I attended the evening service which was held in the large entrance hall. During the singing of the anthem, I distinctly saw, about the length of a yard before me, suspended as it were in the air (the fatal sign), a deep-edged mourning envelope, a sure warning of the death of a relation or friend. I wrote to my mother asking if all were well at home. As no news came to hand during the next few days of any deaths among my relations or friends, I dismissed the matter from my mind, supposing the vision to have been fancy, or an optical illusion. When, however, the Indian mail arrived, some little time afterwards, I received a letter from my brother, announcing to me the sudden death of one of my nephews in India. He had passed to the higher life on the very day I had seen the warning, and allowing for the difference of time between England and India, almost, if not quite, at the very minute.

I dreamt I was standing in the hall at home, and I saw very distinctly a female figure approaching me holding a small salver in her hand, whereon was lying a letter which had a very deep-edged border (the fatal sign). I took the letter but failed to recognize the bearer, although I seemed to know she was a servant. I mentioned the dream to my sister and we wondered for whom the warning was meant. A day or two afterwards my sister heard of the very sudden death of a servant who had recently left me and who had been in my service some time.

I was wintering abroad during the year 1900, and whilst in Egypt felt an overpowering impression that some evil had befallen a nephew of mine in England. So strong was this conviction in my mind that, not having my nephew's address, I wrote to a near relation for news about him. The reply was, that the last accounts were satisfactory. Again I felt the urgent impression of evil connected with my nephew. I wrote pressingly once more to my relative, begging her to inquire personally if all were well with my nephew. The reply came, "Your impression was correct; his young wife, after an acute and painful illness, passed to the higher life."

Before retiring to rest on a certain Saturday night, I saw objectively above me (the fatal sign) an envelope with a black-edged border. I considered it strange as I knew of no relation who was ill. On the Monday following, my brother-in-law received a telegram from the Straits Settlement stating that his brother over there had passed to the higher life very suddenly, early in the morning of that day. I had seen the sign.

Here comes a warning to me, before even any illness was apparent to anybody:

I I had arranged to leave Cairo on the Easter Tuesday of 1901. I had previously booked my passage by steamer to Piraeus (Greece), and from thence on by train and steamer to Venice via Athens. One night, a few days before my departure, I was awakened by a voice saying most distinctly, "Illness, trouble, beware!" Of course I felt rather uncomfortable, for I knew it to be a warning. I fancied it related to my sister, who was in a delicate state of health, and I wrote to her at once, begging her to be very careful of chills, etc. I started on the Easter Tuesday for Alexandria, sleeping at one of the hotels in that town for the night, to be ready and fresh for the morrow, when the steamer was leaving for Greece. On the Wednesday morning I was told that a case of death by plague had occurred the day before, and that the consuls were awaiting orders what quarantine was to be declared at the respective ports in Europe. The steamer's route had been changed that morning, and she was to proceed direct to Smyrna, leaving out Greece on her way. Taking Cook and Son's advice in the matter, I went on to Smyrna, having only two days' quarantine in the Bay of Voula. The trouble, the expense, the annoyance I had to encounter through this change of route and the quarantine regulations that had to be followed were very great, and only those who have had the misfortune to undergo them can understand this. In this case I was most distinctly warned of illness and trouble, long before it was known at Cairo that plague had broken out in Alexandria.

I had promised to meet a friend on a private matter. I felt sure he was to be trusted. An hour or two before the appointment I was sitting in my study and fell asleep. I dreamt I went to keep the appointment but could not see any signs of my friend, but instead saw some evil-looking men, who seemed waiting for me. An intuition told me they wished to do me an injury out of spite and malice. I awoke, and the dream being so vivid, I determined to be careful. I kept the appointment, but unseen to others. I waited, but my friend never appeared, but I saw the men I had viewed in my dream evidently waiting for me. Thus avoided them. Afterwards I discovered that my letter had fallen into bad hands, and had I not had this warning given me in time, I might have fared badly.

I wished much to speak to a friend who had left town, and whom I had not seen for some considerable time. He had been staying in the country, attending to his professional duties. I determined at the first opportunity to run down by train and visit him. I decided to do this on the following Saturday, so as to have a quiet day on the Sunday I wished to surprise him and did not write. A day or two before the date on which I had fixed to start, I received a letter from a lady friend, saying she had had a warning dream about me, begging me to be very careful where I went or what I was going to do. She felt convinced I was on the point of running into some great danger. The night before I started I dreamt I saw a male human form; on the breast was a large scarlet blot clearly marked, not as if there was a wound, but as if the skin was discolored. I awoke, but could not decipher the meaning and the matter passed from my thoughts. I started by the train on the day fixed upon, and, having arrived at my destination, called at the house where my friend was staying. I then heard that he had been very ill and had been removed to some hospital, but I could get no clue as to the illness. I went to the hospital outside the town, which was isolated from other houses. It did not even then occur to me that there was anything contagious in the illness. On arriving at the house or hospital, I inquired if I could see my friend. "See him!" replied the official, "certainly not; he is stricken with scarlet fever, and has it very badly." I need hardly say I walked away more quickly than I had come. The meaning of my dream and my friend's warning was thus clearly revealed to me.

MUSICAL PHENOMENA.

Mr. Thos. Cooper writes: It will be remembered that some remarkable musical phenomena that occurred in my experience last February were reported in the Two Worlds. I have recently had a recurrence of similar phenomena, which I think your readers will like to have a brief account of. I have heard nothing of the kind until Sunday, the 27th ult., when just before rising I heard, apparently outside my bed-room window, a simple melody being sung, accompanied on an instrument of the harmonium kind, but of much sweeter tone than I ever heard before; and, as the day advanced, a variety of music was performed, accompanied on a very fine-toned organ, the bass notes being particularly round and full, and skillfully played. The voices were of good quality, and evinced great culture and good training, and everything was executed with the greatest facility. The music may be described as melodious, sweet, flowing, and, at times, grand. About noon a piece of more pretentious character was commenced, in which the tenor sustained the leading part, and vocalization of an extraordinary character formed the chief feature. It lasted a considerable time, and must have taxed the singer far beyond human endurance. The performances continued until midnight, and were listened to by the hour by self and friend, affording us infinite delight. It was a great musical treat. The following morning was ushered in at daybreak by the merry sound of handbells playing vigorously, apparently overhead, which was followed by similar vocal performances as on the previous day, when all of a sudden the air became resonant with the sound of multitudinous handbells, playing the well-known air, 'Rousseau's Dream,' and after a time the organ and voices joined in, producing a novel effect, which was very fine. The singing of sweet melodies, with but little intermission, continued till midnight. The sound of handbells was heard in the night, but in the morning the music was listened for in vain, which was somewhat disappointing, as on the previous occasion the phenomena extended over five days. I consider the phenomena on the present occasion more remarkable in some respects than on the former. They are certainly very inexplicable and wonderful, and transcend anything of the kind I have ever heard or read of.

A LARGE ENTERPRISE.

Mr. Willard J. Hull, the editor of the Light of Truth, is desirous of saying to our readers that Mr. Townsend, the proprietor of the paper he edits, is conducting a large enterprise that Mr. Hull is confident is destined to meet with eminent success. In conducting the affairs of this company, he says Mr. Townsend is soliciting capital and employing a great many people as agents, and asks any of our readers who may feel inclined, to correspond with Mr. James B. Townsend, Lima, Ohio, for full particulars.

ANOTHER LEAF IN THE PIPER MYSTERY

MRS. PIPER'S TRANCE REVELATIONS ATTRIBUTED BY PROF. HYSLOP TO SPIRIT INFLUENCE—THE MEDIUM HERSELF INCLINES TO TELEPATHY.

James H. Hyslop, professor of logic and ethics in Columbia University, does not accept the "confession" of Mrs. Piper, the celebrated Boston medium of the Society for Psychical Research, which was published in full in the Sunday Record-Herald a few weeks ago.

Mrs. Piper asserted that spirits had nothing to do with the communications she has been giving to scientists and others while in a trance condition at various times during the last fifteen years. She inclined to telepathy as the explanation, and reasoned that she had never heard of anything being said by herself in a trance state which might not have been latent in her own mind; in the mind of the person in charge of the sitting; in the mind of the person trying to get communication with some one in another state of existence, or some companion present with such person; or in the mind of some absent person alive somewhere else in the world.

Professor Hyslop takes the view that Spiritualism or telepathy must be the cause, and as between the two he holds unqualifiedly that Spiritualism offers the more reasonable explanation. This is the summing up of the results of seventeen sittings with Mrs. Piper, as the paid agent of the Society for Psychical Research, which the professor has related in detail in a publication just issued as part of the records of that society.

HYSLOP'S FIRST SITTING.

The first of Professor Hyslop's sittings was held December 23, 1898. Of this he says in his book just issued:

"Dr. Hodgson and myself arrived at Mrs. Piper's about 10 o'clock a. m. I had provided myself with a cloth mask covering my face, such as is used at mask balls. This I put on before leaving the coach in which we rode from the station. Under the concealment I went to the door and into the house, upstairs, where we met Mrs. Piper in her room. I was introduced to her as Mr. Smith. I merely bowed without uttering a word, and did not speak until after she had gone into the trance.

"These precautions were taken owing to my having met Mrs. Piper casually in 1892. At that time I had no beard, while I now wear one. But the mask effectually concealed my face, so that no recognition was possible under any ordinary circumstances. As I was introduced Mrs. Piper caught sight of the mask, and, seeing its meaning, broke out into a laugh at Dr. Hodgson and remarked that only once before had such concealment been used.

"Presently, after dusting some articles in the room, Mrs. Piper sat down upon her chair for the trance. Pillows had been placed in front of her for her head to lie upon while entranced. I sat some three or four feet away, where I could closely watch the trance coming on. She sat quiet, and no indications of the trance occurred for some time, say three or five minutes. Then I noticed a few slight jerks of the head and some twitching of the right eyebrow. Mrs. Piper picking the while at her finger nails. Both stopped in a few moments and no trace of the trance was to be remarked.

MRS. PIPER IN A TRANCE.

"Mrs. Piper then leaned forward upon the pillows, closed her eyes, rubbed them, with her face somewhat flushed for a few moments, then opened her eyes, slightly straightened up, used her handkerchief, returned to picking her finger nails and assumed a slightly fixed gaze. I then noted a gradually changing expression in her face. It had lost its flush, and there was something of a pallor in it, though very slight and only noticeable, perhaps, in contrast with the previous flush. But the most notable change in the expression was one that is hard to describe. The whole muscular appearance of it was less drawn than when I was introduced to her, and seemed fuller and more flabby, if that word can be used. Her mouth also was a little drawn on one side, and the gaze became more fixed. Her mouth soon opened and she passed easily, without a struggle, into the trance, with something of the appearance of a faint.

"I then changed my position behind and to the right of her, so that I could watch and read the writing, not a word being said by myself in the meanwhile. Nor was I at this or at any time during the trance either in contact with her or where she could see me, her whole face being turned away from me and buried in the pillows.

THE SPIRIT MOVES HER.

"Sitting there behind and to the right of her, I soon noticed the muscles on the hand at the third finger begin to twitch. Soon the whole hand began to shake and then reached out and down to write. A pencil was placed in her hand and the twitching continued for a few moments, and the hand again raised itself in the air, but immediately lowered itself to write.

"Dr. Hodgson sat near the table on my right, where he could see the writing as it proceeded. This he copied, reading it in a low voice as an indication to the trance personality that it was intelligible.

"When a question was to be asked or a statement made to the 'communicator,' Mrs. Piper's hand was spontaneously raised toward the mouth of the sitter who addressed the hand, and then it immediately proceeded either to present the message to the 'communicator,' often extending itself out toward some invisible presence, or to write out a reply.

"With Mrs. Piper there is no mechanical apparatus whatever in the experiments excepting the writing pad and the pencil which you furnish yourself. Hence there is no excuse for comparing the case to slate writing and cabinet performances generally. Experiments are conducted in open daylight, in a room without any special arrangements for them, except the tables as indicated, and this room, in so far as living persons are concerned, might be any one that the skeptical inquirer might wish to choose in any locality whatever and not confined to Mrs. Piper's home.

MRS. PIPER NOT CONSCIOUS.

"Mrs. Piper's normal consciousness, as the past evidence goes to show, knows nothing of what she has done or communicated in the trance. She also remains ignorant of the communications until they are published in some form, except, of course, when a sitter chooses to tell her something, which I need hardly say in my case was nothing.

"No one except Dr. Hodgson and my wife knew that I was to have sittings, and only Dr. Hodgson was to know of the arrangements. This plan was carried out in entire secrecy. The arrangements for the sittings were not made with Mrs. Piper in her normal state, but with the trance personalities in her trance state. The mask on my face I kept on until the third sitting, when I felt it unnecessary to wear it any longer, for the reason that at the end of the second sitting the name and relationship of my father was given as Mrs. Piper came out of the trance."

TALKING WITH SPIRITS.

The spirits with which Prof. Hyslop believes that he communicated through Mrs. Piper were those of his father, Robert Hyslop, who died August 29, 1890, a brother Charles, who died at 4½ years old in 1804; a sister Anna, who died twelve days later at 3 years old. Besides these there were brief messages from Professor Hyslop's mother, cousin and two uncles.

Professor Hyslop thus gives the incident at the close of the second sitting, when Mrs. Piper (presumably under the spirit influence) gave the name of his father.

"Spirit—Well, do you really think you underst—understand— stronger—understand? And I will come again with more clearness with the help of this (pause)—man who wears the cross. James, my son! James, my son, speak to me, I am going far away.

"Hyslop—Yes, father, I shall be pleased to see you again. I shall have to go now.

"Spirit—I am too far off to think more for you. I. H. H. Friend, we ask thee ere we depart, when thou wilt return. We must restore this light a little before we can speak as we do—speak as—desire."

TELLS HYSLOP HIS NAME.

Here Dr. Hodgson intervened and the next meeting was set for Monday. This produced, according to Prof. Hyslop, the following results:

"Spirit—We will have it so. We do not think that thou has U. D. us.

"Hodgson—No, I fear not.

"Spirit—Do we U. D. that there is only the Sabbath between our meeting?

"Hodgson—Yes, only the Sabbath.

"Spirit—Well, it will be for us; and we will make it good. (Amen.)

"Spirit—We go now, and may God's blessing rest on thee. X R." (Cross in air.)

Here, according to Professor Hyslop, Mrs. Piper's subliminal self spoke:

"H. H.—Sh. (Repeated again and again. Dr. Hodgson thinks she is trying to repeat his name. Sounds to him like Hishon.)

"Hodgson—Hodgson? Who is it?

"Mrs. Piper (subliminal self)—Hyslop.

"Hyslop—I am he.

"Spirit—Tell him I am his father. I—, Good-by, sir. I wouldn't take him away that way. O dear! Do you see the man with the cross shut out everybody? Did you see the light? What made the man's hair fall off?

"Hodgson—What man?

"Spirit—That elderly gentleman that was trying to tell me something, but it wouldn't come."

MRS. PIPER AWAKES.

At this Mrs. Piper awoke from her trance. The disjointed sentences with which nearly every sitting with Mrs. Piper ends appeared to Prof. Hyslop to be the confused murmurings of a number of communications in the spirit world. As these spirits realized that their method of communication was being some way cut off, all seemed to try to talk at once, sometimes accusing each other of unfairness or of monopolizing the "light." This has been explained in the series of Phinuit communications previously printed by the Society for Psychical Research. "Rector" Imperator and George Pelham are apparently the strong spirits who commune with Mrs. Piper and repeat to her messages from the others.

Professor Hyslop thus writes of the way in which his first sitting with Mrs. Piper ended:

"Mrs. Piper began to come out of the trance. First I noticed much twitching of the hand and arm, followed by a noise like snoring. Presently the head was raised, the mouth opened and the eyelids very slightly raised. She remained in this condition for a few moments, the tongue rolling about in the mouth and slightly protruding. This was followed by a decided gaze, with the eyes set, looking into space, and presently she looked about, following Dr. Hodgson with a wild stare; said 'Oh, dear me!' and fixed a wild, fierce gaze on me.

"I at once left the room for fear of frightening her with my mask, as she came out."

DIALOGUE WITH SPIRITS.

Professor Hyslop describes his first "meeting" with the spirit of his father. At this juncture the hand of Mrs. Piper appeared to write under the influence of her control, "Rector." Apparently "Rector" stood side by side with Robert Hyslop in the spirit world, striving to teach him also to write through the hand of Mrs. Piper.

This is one of the most dramatic dialogues in the book and, condensed a little by the New York World's reviewer, is as follows:

"Spirit—Good morrow, friends of earth. We greet thee again, and thou art welcome here—welcome. We bring Prudens and more light will be given. All is well. Fear not. Thy friend is in good hands. We will bring him now. Good morrow, friend; all is well and will be—we ask thee to follow—we ask thee to follow us carefully and hear what we have to say—what—

"(Excitement followed by calm.) Peace.

"Second spirit—James, James! Speak, James!

"Hyslop—Yes.

"Spirit—James, speak to me.

"Hyslop—I am glad to see you.

"Spirit—James, James, speak to me. James, James, I am not ill. Oh, oh, I want you so much. I want everything, James. I want everything. I want to see you. I want to tell you everything. I want you to hear me. I am not very near just now—just now—but I am coming, coming. I see you. I see your spirit in the body. They tell me I will soon be all right and able to help you. Oh, I did not quite know how it would be here. (Pause.)

"Spirit—Give me my hat and let me go. I will not leave you until I tell you all I wish. Where is Willie? (A relative.)

"Hyslop—Did you ask for Willie?

"Spirit—Yes, I did. Is he all right, James; is he, is he?

"Hyslop—He is all right.

"Spirit—I want my head clear. I feel choked. I am choking. I am going. I will come back soon.

"Spirit—I would not return for all I ever owned—music, flowers, walks, drives, pleasures—pleasures of all kinds, but—ever owned, he says, music or walks, drives—walks—walks—drives, or—kinds, books and everything.

"Spirit—Oh, I should have so much to do. Where there is light I will always be."

HIS FATHER'S ACCORDION.

During the sitting one spirit wrote:

"Can you not give me something belonging to him? He wants it so much. He used to play for you."

Professor Hyslop meantime had been unwrapping a parcel which contained an accordion, which his father had prized and on which he had played during lonely hours in the last years of his life. The hand of Mrs. Piper caressed the instrument. This appeared to strengthen the spirit.

"Spirit—James, my son, I was too weak to speak to you before, but I know all now, and see you just as you looked before I came here. I have not been here very long, have I?

"Hyslop—No, you have not, only a short time.

"Spirit—Don't you think I will always be your father?

"Hyslop—Yes.

"Spirit—Because I will. I will. We are very happy together and you know it. Give me something for the purpose of helping me remain longer.

"Hyslop—Yes, here it is. (Giving accordion.)

"Spirit—My toy. I remember it so well. I left all so suddenly, yet I knew I was coming. Do you remember what my feeling was about this life?

"Hyslop—Yes, I do.

"Spirit—Well, I was not so wrong after—after all. I felt sure that there would be some knowledge of this life, but you were doubtful, remember."

RECALLS HIS CANE.

Professor Hyslop here explains that this is in reference to a skepticism as to a future life which he experienced formerly, and which somewhat troubled his father, who was a very devout man.

The sentence, "Give me my hat," Professor Hyslop notes as an expression which was very often used by his father, who, in the invalidism of his later life, called on the others of the household frequently, "Hand me this," "Hand me that," instead of reaching it for himself.

Professor Hyslop relates an incident of a cane and a conversation which he held with the spirit about it, which is one of the most remarkable narratives in the book. He writes:

"I had given a cane with a carved handle to my father shortly before the Presidential election. On it was a representation of a 'gold bug.' Some years previously father had changed his political party. When he came to his old home in Xenia, Ohio, to die, my cousin, Robert McClellan (now dead) expressed his curiosity about father's politics in the question, 'Well, Uncle Robert, how are you in politics now?' My father replied simply by picking up this 'gold bug' cane and shook it at my cousin, and all had a hearty laugh about it. In one of the sittings I alluded to the Presidential election, and as soon as the allusion was understood I asked: 'Do you remember how you shook a walking stick at Robert McClellan about that time?'

REVELATIONS OF THE RING.

"Great excitement followed in the hand, and as soon as it calmed down it wrote: 'Well, I do. I never was more excited in my life. I think I was right, too.'

"Hyslop—Well, who gave you that walking stick?

"The forefinger of the hand which had been listening to my question began tapping me on the left temple for fully half a minute and then wrote: 'You did, and I told him about it.' (Pointing to Dr. Hodgson.)

"Hyslop—Yes, I thought so. What was on it?

"Spirit—What was on it? I think I know that it had the little top. I—I think it had the little ring. Ring on it."

Here the hand attempted and did draw imperfectly a picture of the beetle or gold bug on the cane, says Professor Hyslop. Afterward it transpired, too, that Mr. Hyslop in life had mended the cane once by placing a little ring around it. Professor Hyslop did not know this at the time.

At another sitting the hand suddenly wrote:

"Do you remember the stick I used to carry, with the turn in the end, on which I carved my initials? If so, what have you done with it? I need to use it for emphasizing expression occasionally. (Hand strikes pencil on book several times. Hand kept repeating turning motion.) Understand? James."

The hand several times stopped writing and made a turn. Hyslop imitated the motion, when "Rector," the spirit control, appeared to take up the dialogue in an endeavor to explain matters:

"Rector—Yes (with a twirl of the stick nervously). This is almost identical with his gestures. He is amused at our description, friend, and seems vaguely to understand our imitation. Draws it across his so-called knee, lets it fall by his side, still holding on the turned end. Hears sound of music, to which he listens attentively, with the expectation of keeping time with the smaller end of his stick."

By inquiry among relatives after this incident Professor Hyslop learned that these gestures were all characteristic of the elder Hyslop. Mr. Hyslop had another cane, with a carved handle, and this he often playfully hooked about the necks of the other members of the family.

His habit, too, was to thump the floor with this stick to call attention to his wants, during a long illness which deprived him partially of speech.

Recalling a trivial incident which it seemed impossible that either Dr. Hodgson or Mrs. Piper could be aware of in any way, Professor Hyslop resolved, by way of a test, to question his father about it. At one time, years before, the dog of a neighbor, Samuel Cooper, had broken into Mr. Hyslop's field and had killed some sheep. "Some unpleasantness arose in connection with the shooting of the dog," says Professor Hyslop, "and the two men remained unfriendly for years, when they were finally reconciled." So Professor Hyslop asked:

"Hyslop—I wanted to know if you remembered anything about the dogs killing sheep?

"Spirit—Oh, I should think that I did. Yes, I do very well, but I had forgotten all about it. This was what we had the discussion about, and I made it unpleasant for him. Yes, very well, James, but just what you asked me this for I could not quite make out, as Mr. Cooper was no relative of mine. I remember it all very well, and if I could have recalled what you were getting at I would have tried to tell you, but I see him seldom, and I referred to him only because you asked me about him.

"Hyslop—All right, father, I wanted it for my scientific purpose.

"Spirit—Oh, yes. Why did you not just remind me of it? Well, I will work for you and remind you of other things quite as good. But don't hurry me, and in time I can talk to you just as I used to.

On one occasion through Rector, Mr. Hyslop, it is stated, inquired especially as to what had become of a black skull cap which he used to wear and a special quill pen with which he used to write. He also recalled, whimsically enough, that on his writing desk two bottles always stood, and the hand attempted a rude drawing of them. Again he said:

"I recall a thin black coat or dressing gown affair I used to wear mornings. I can see myself sitting in my old armchair before the open fire in the library reading over the paper. Look at me there, James, and see me in the gown I refer to and answer me."

At first Professor Hyslop states that he believed a mistake had been made as to the thin black coat, as he could not recall that his father ever wore such a coat. Inquiry revealed that during the last two years of his life, when Professor Hyslop knew few details of his personal habits, Mr. Hyslop had really been accustomed to wear such a coat while sitting before the fire reading his morning newspaper.

HIS LAST ILLNESS.

Professor Hyslop once asked the communicator (whom he believed to be his father) what was the nature of his last illness. Mr. Hyslop, writes the Professor, died of what was probably cancer of the larynx, but he himself believed that his disease was catarrh.

The spirit, after much hesitation and stumbling, described the scene about his deathbed somewhat accurately, but apparently believed as in life that the disease was catarrh. Professor Hyslop says that he in asking the question had in mind distinctly the cancer of the larynx, and that if telepathy had been employed by Mrs. Piper she would have mentioned this disease rather than catarrh.

To one of his sittings Prof. Hyslop had brought a knife which his father formerly carried, and apparently it was recognized. Toward the end of the seance Rector began to write:

"Rector—Friend, we bid thee farewell until we choose to meet thee as thou wilt know. God be thy guide meanwhile.—R." (Cross in air.)

The hand here held up the knife and put it down. Cross in air. The cross is the sign which Rector always employs. Here Mrs. Piper's subliminal self apparently spoke.

"Imperator—Cut your finger with it sure. Take it away from him. Take it away from him. Oh, is that you, Imperator. I want to go, too. I want to go" (in crying voice). After this there were many inarticulate murmurs.

The communications from other supposed spirits were generally less interesting and important than those which the Professor received from Mr. Hyslop. Upon one occasion he received a curious statement, presumably from his brother Charles, who died in 1864, at 4½ years old.

"Spirit—James, I am your brother Charles, and I am well and happy. Father would like for you to have the pictures, if you are still in the body, James."

(Reference is here made to some paintings.) "He asked me to say this for him. His voice troubles him a little when trying to speak. But if you could only see his delight when he hears you I am sure, my dear brother, that you would never doubt that he still clings to you." Professor Hyslop notes that reference is made in more than one instance to his father's throat trouble, as if it still continued in a measure in the spirit world.—Chicago Record-Herald.

IN DREAMLAND.

Some Reflections on Their Aid to Artists.

"Dreamland inspirations are the best. I am deeply interested in psychological matters, and grasp good ideas wheresoever I find them and put them on canvas as quickly as possible."

Thus an artist, Ralph Clarkson, expressed himself to-day while discussing the blight of insanity that has afflicted a fellow-artist, Henry Hasbrouck, who won national fame and is well known among Chicago artists as a painter of landscapes. Mr. Hasbrouck's mental disorder is due, it is said, to ineffectual effort to recall the details of a wonderful picture which he beheld in a dream. Waking, he caught the general scheme of the landscape, but when he sought to transfer it to canvas he was baffled. Believing immortal fame awaited the reproduction he labored fruitlessly to bring the details from the depths of forgetfulness and as a result he was taken from Binghamton, N. Y., to an asylum a few days ago.

The fact that a dream had been the cause of the young man's insanity roused much discussion among Chicago artists, all of whom knew Mr. Hasbrouck by reputation if not personally. He was never a resident of this city, it is said, but has visited here on numerous occasions.

"That dreams are often helpful cannot be doubted," said Mr. Clarkson. "There is the notable case of Puvis de Chavanne, who was retained to decorate the Sorbonne in Paris. The work involved immense labor and De Chavanne, despairing of being able to work out the grand scheme required, was on the point of throwing up the commission. At this point he had a vision, or dream, some might call it an inspiration, and the whole work in all its grandeur and beauty was before him. He held the details in the grasp of his mind and worked it out without difficulty.

"It is impossible to find the line of demarkation between the objective and subjective mind. It is possible that they are so closely connected that in dreams the subjective solves the problem sought and transmits the solution to the objective mind. A revelation is not necessary to the value of a dream. In the case of Hasbrouck, he may have had a beautiful dream and been unable to recall it in its entirety. In such instances it is injurious to make effort, since there is no resistance and the mind is in danger of injury. Speaking of the conscious and subjective minds, there is the case of Chanler, former husband of Amelie Rives. He had been called crazy because subconsciousness made him a puzzling subject. Yet the courts have decided he is sane."

ARTISTS GIVEN TO BROODING.

"Artists are more likely to become insane, perhaps, than men or women of other professions," said George Fred Morris, of the Fine Arts building. "As a class they are moody and extremely sensitive. They brood over fancied or real troubles or slights and destroy their health. It is not a long leap from ill health to loss of mental power. Dreams? Yes, I believe artists often profit by dreams. I have. I now have at home a whole book full of sketches based on dreams, and I have had dreams so grotesque as to overstep the limits of the possibilities.

"I have made a discovery, too, and that is that in dreams we are apt to recognize no restraint of law or moral ethics and each of us goes unresistingly in the pathway that natural inclinations direct. I have had some of the wildest revels imaginable and again I have been a model young man. Recently I had a dream of the orgies of Rome and thought I was a prince steeped beyond satiety in dissipation. Then I found my way to the presence of his satanic majesty and came near going into the pit of hot griddles. I saw the city of wealth and unrest and the city of peace and content. There were some grand scenes and I could have painted a score of pictures, some hideous and some beautiful. I did not do so, though I may yet."

MARTHA BAKER ON DREAM THEORY.

"Really, I cannot see how any imaginative artist, or any one else for that matter, can help having beautiful dreams," said Martha S. Baker, the miniaturest, also of the Fine Arts building. "I paint miniatures mostly, though I devote much time to modeling and large canvas work, and some of my best endeavors have resulted from dreams. I cannot say at that, though, that they were actual dreams, because the mind is such a subtle thing. It works out details while we are resting the body and nerves, in marvelous fashion, and brings order out of confusion. I lie down tired, close my eyes and when in a half-dreamy state I see pass before me a series of snap-shot pictures—beautiful landscapes, marine views, weird animals and grotesque human beings. They will come to me in bewildering numbers, and as quickly as one passes another bursts into view. Who would not envy me at such a time? And yet only in occasional instances am I able to gather up the details of such inspirations and make them enduring. Yes, indeed, I do believe in dreams."—Chicago Daily News.

MINNESOTA AND DAKOTA.

Spiritual Footprints of a Missionary.

This winter finds me among the woods and lakes of Minnesota, at least so far as the winter has gone, and I enjoy the change from the prairies of Kansas and Nebraska very much. I have been quite busy this month, having left Minneapolis the last week in October. From there I went to Princeton and gave two lectures for the First Spiritual Church. While there I was kindly entertained by Mr. and Mrs. Byers, and enjoyed the visit very much. The sudden change from warm summer weather in one day to quite severe cold, however, seemed to have a chilling effect on everybody, and the last lecture suffered to some extent through the atmospheric conditions. Mr. and Mrs. Byers are earnest workers and advanced thinkers and are doing a grand work in trying to sustain a weekly parlor meeting at their home.

From Princeton I seemed obliged to take a long jump to Eagle Bend, although from the appearance of many towns through which our train passed, some earnest work of a spiritual character is very much needed. Everywhere the large and costly edifices of the German Catholics were to be seen, and correspondingly poor dwellings for the hard-working people who feel it their duty to help build and sustain them. I felt on looking at these large churches that if I were wealthy I would gladly spend a great deal of money in free missionary work among the poor people who are held in the slavish bonds of priestcraft.

I arrived at Eagle Bend in the midst of a snow-storm and went to the home of John D. Conzet, a local worker who is also a good speaker, I am told, but during my visit there I did not have the pleasure of hearing him. Mr. Conzet was developed in home circles in Eagle Bend, and has done a great deal of good work in that vicinity. Mrs. Ella J. Tyler, formerly of Minneapolis, is another good worker there, and assisted me very materially in the musical part of the program during my meetings.

Eagle Bend is quite a centre for spiritual work, and I am told several good workers have started out to other towns. There is still plenty of timber left for a healthy society, and some parlor meetings are held at the home of Mr. Conzet. Public hall meetings have also been held from time to time, but the expense of keeping up hall rent is rather a drawback. Mrs. Tyler is a good speaker, and it is a pity that both these workers are not regularly working in their own way at Eagle Bend.

Other good talent can be found in the mediumship of the Misses Kilmer, Mrs. Byman and Mrs. Allen, John Strong and others. There is plenty of material in Eagle Bend and vicinity for a large growth of interest in Spiritualism.

I held four meetings, one in Mr. Conzet's home, two in Woodman Hall and one in Wykeman school-house.

My next point was Alexandria, where I am told no Spiritualist lecture has been given since the visit of William Denton some sixteen years ago. I found good friends here among the liberals, also Mr. Willard Buck and E. E. Wagoner, Spiritualists of many years standing. Mr. A. Wilton, a jeweler there, and a great student of Herbert Spencer, assisted very materially in getting up the meetings.

I next visited Evansville but found the leading worker, Mr. Julius Davidson, had been called away to the funeral of a sister, so did not hold any meetings there. I passed on to Fergus Falls, and after arranging with the society for meetings on Sunday, I went to Underwood, a Scandinavian town, and gave two lectures in Union hall. Then back to Fergus Falls for Sunday, and held two meetings in Norden hall. Mr. L. W. Miller is the secretary here, but found him rather discouraged with the prospects of getting a very great interest started here.

My work seems to have been kindly received and appreciated at each place and I trust good will come from my efforts.

I go from Fergus Falls to Wheaton, where I expect to remain a week or two, and I hope to receive calls from other points in Minnesota and Dakota. Wheaton being so near the line of South Dakota, I trust Dakota friends will try and arrange for lectures. My address will be General Delivery, Wheaton, Minn. W. E. BONNEY.

A SPIRIT SURGEON

Performs a Successful Surgical Operation.

To the Editor:—A correspondent asks if I ever knew of a surgical operation being performed by a spirit, and I will briefly relate one that occurred in the early days of Modern Spiritualism. My sister, Jennie L. Webb, had an impediment in her speech, so that at times it was quite difficult to understand her, caused by a growth upon one tonsil nearly as large as the tonsil itself, which had become troublesome and painful.

She was holding some private circles for physical manifestations at Saccarappa, Maine, a short distance from the city of Portland, and one evening, just before close of circle, the spirit controlling her remarked that a spirit surgeon was present, and if we would follow directions, he would try and remove the protuberance which had become so annoying to the medium. A gentleman present was asked to open a window a few inches. He did so, and all distinctly heard something like steel against the window-sash, then dropped upon the table around which we sat with clasped hands. Next we heard it rattling against Jennie's teeth (this was a dark circle), then she groaned as if she sensed the operation, which she did not; then the instruments were heard at the widow again, and soon after light was called for, and upon the table in front of the patient lay her handkerchief, pretty well saturated with blood, and the substance which had been taken from her throat upon it. The throat healed in due time, and the impediment has never returned.

The spirit M. D. said he obtained his surgical instruments at a surgeon's office, next house to where the seance was held, and facts seemed to corroborate his statement, as upon inquiry the mortal surgeon said he had occasion upon the evening in question to use an instrument like what would be required in such an operation, and was surprised to find his gone, but next morning found it upon the office floor near the window. No doubt the spirit lost power and was unable to return it to its proper place.

This demonstration of spirit power occurred more than forty years ago, and was published in the New England Spiritualist, over the signature of Wm. Cloudman, giving names of all present, and full particulars, all of which I do not remember, although present.

In conclusion, permit me to call the attention of those who feel an interest in veteran workers in the cause of Spiritualism, to my card on the 8th page of The Progressive Thinker.

Our Fall and Winter Campaign.

The Fall and Winter Campaign of The Progressive Thinker will be especially brilliant. It will be unusually attractive and instructive. It will lead you on to a higher plane. It will make you happier, wiser and better. It will blossom into something brighter, fresher, and more startling, and will be a surprise to you in a variety of ways. Among the many attractions will be the debate between the brilliant Materialist, W. F. Jamieson, and the profound and eloquent Moses Hull. It will make most excellent reading for fall and winter evenings, and we are not sure but what it will so scintillate with the friction of happy hits on both sides that lights can be dispensed with while reading it on a cloudy evening. We are sure that every Spiritualist, Freethinker and Materialist will want to read this debate, and thus become wiser and better, Tell your Spiritualist friends of this debate and request them to send to this office at least 25 cents for a three months' subscription to The Progressive Thinker. No Spiritualist can afford to be without this remarkable debate.

WHENCE COMES THIS MIGHTY HEALING POWER?

All the Land Wonders at the Remarkable Cures Effected by Professor Adkin.

HEALS DISEASES CALLED INCURABLE.

Ministers, Doctors and Professional Men Tell How He Has Cured the Blind, the Lame, the Paralytic and Many on the Very Brink of Death.

FREE HELP FOR THE SICK.

Professor Adkin Offers to Help All Sufferers From Any Disease Absolutely Free of Charge—Professional Men Investigate His Powers.

PROF. THOS. F. ADKIN.
President of the Institute of Physicians and Surgeons.

In all parts of the country men and women, doctors and surgeons, clergymen and educators, are wondering at the remarkable cures made by Prof. Thomas F. Adkin, discoverer of the Adkin Vitaopathic treatment.

Prof. Adkin heals not by drugs, nor by Christian Science, nor by Osteopathy, nor by Hypnotism, nor by Divine Healing, but by a subtle psychic force of nature in combination with certain vital magnetic remedies which contain the very elements of life and health.

A reporter recently talked with Prof. Adkin and was asked to invite all readers of this paper who are sick or who are worried by the ills of those dear to them to write to him for assistance. "Some people have declared," said Prof. Adkin, "that my powers are of God; they call me a Divine Healer, a man of mysterious powers. This is not so. I cure because I understand nature, because I use a subtle force of nature to build up the system and restore health. But, at the same time, I believe that the Creator would not have given me the opportunity to make the discoveries I have made nor the ability to develop them if He had not intended that I should use them for the good of humanity. I, therefore, feel that it is my duty to give the benefit of the science I practice to all who are suffering. I want you to tell your readers that they can write to me in the strictest confidence if they are troubled with any kind of disease, and I will thoroughly diagnose their cases and prescribe a simple home treatment which I positively guarantee to effect a complete cure, absolutely free of charge. I care not how serious their cases, nor how hopeless they may seem, I want them to write to me and let me make them well. I feel that this is my life's work."

So great is the sensation wrought in the medical world by the wonderful cures performed by Prof. Adkin that several professional gentlemen were asked to investigate the cures. Among these gentlemen were Dr. L. B. Hawley and Dr. S. Dutton Whitney, both famous physicians and surgeons. After a thorough and painstaking investigation these eminent physicians were so astounded at the far-reaching powers of Prof. Adkin and the wonderful efficacy of Vitaopathy that they volunteered to forsake all other ties in life and all other kinds of treatment and devote themselves to assisting Prof. Adkin in his great work for humanity. With the discovery of the Adkin Vitaopathic treatment eminent physicians are generally agreed that the treatment of disease has at last been reduced to an exact science.

In all, some 8,000 men and women have been cured by the powers of Prof. Adkin. Some were blind, some were lame, some were deaf, some were paralytics, scarcely able to move, so great was their infirmity. Others were afflicted with Bright's disease, heart disease, consumption and other so-called incurable diseases. Some were sufferers from kidney trouble, dyspepsia, nervous debility, insomnia, neuralgia, constipation, rheumatism, female troubles and other similar ills. Some were men and women addicted to drunkenness, morphine and other evil habits. In all cases Prof. Adkin treats he guarantees a cure. Even those on the brink of the grave, with all hope of recovery gone and despaired of by doctors and friends alike, have been restored to perfect health by the force of Vitaopathy and Prof. Adkin's marvelous skill. And, remarkable as it may seem, distance has made no difference. Those living far away have been cured in the privacy of their own homes, as well as those who have been treated in person. Prof. Adkin asserts that he can cure any one at any distance as well as though he stood before them.

Not long ago John Adams, of Blakesbury, Ia., who had been lame for twenty years, was permanently cured by Prof. Adkin without an operation of any kind. About the same time the city of Rochester, N. Y., was startled by the cure of one of its oldest residents, Mr. P. A. Wright, who had been partly blind for a long period. John E. Neff, of Millersburg, Pa., who had suffered for years from a cataract over his left eye, was speedily restored to perfect sight without an operation. From Logansport, Ind., comes the news of the recovery of Mrs. Mary Eicher, who had been practically deaf for a year, while in Warren, Pa., Mr. G. W. Savage, a noted photographer and artist, who was not only partially blind and deaf, but at death's door from a complication of diseases, was restored to perfect health and strength by Prof. Adkin.

Vitaopathy cures not one disease alone, but it cures all diseases when used in combination with the proper remedies. If you are sick, no matter what your disease nor who says you can not be cured, write to Prof. Adkin to-day; tell him the leading symptoms of your complaint, how long you have been suffering, and he will at once diagnose your case, tell you the exact disease from which you are suffering, and prescribe the treatment that will positively cure you. This costs you absolutely nothing. Prof. Adkin will also send you a copy of his marvelous new book, entitled "How to Be Cured, and How to Cure Others." This book tells you exactly how Prof. Adkin will cure you. It fully and completely describes the nature of this wonderful treatment. It also explains to you how you yourself may possess this great healing power and cure the sick around you.

Prof. Adkin does not ask one cent for his services in this connection. They will be given to you absolutely free. He has made a wonderful discovery, and he wishes to place it in the hands of every sick person in this country, that he may be restored to perfect health and strength. Mark your letter personal when you write, and no one but Prof. Adkin will see it. Address PROF. THOS. F. ADKIN, office 187 G, Rochester, N. Y.

OUR ATTRACTIONS ARE MANY!

The attractions of The Progressive Thinker are not confined to one thing, but many. It is the largest Spiritualist paper published on this earth to-day, and combines CHEAPNESS and EXCELLENCE. It contains a vast amount of miscellaneous reading matter of especial interest to everyone. It is a veritable Encyclopedia of Facts in reference to our Cause. The Hull-Jamieson Debate will prove of great interest to everybody; but there will be many other attractions. In a short time we will publish Col. H. S. Olcott's lecture while here on "The Uses and Perils of Psychism." It is in many respects a masterly production, and should be read by everyone. This week we publish an exceptionally interesting lecture, full of beautiful impressive thoughts, on "The Prophecy of Spiritualism for the Twentieth Century." It was delivered before the N. S. A., at Washington, D. C., by Mrs. Helen P. Russegue, of Hartford, Ct., and was heard by an audience of 500. It will be read in The Progressive Thinker by at least 40,000.

Good Work for Spiritualists.

It is evident to one who has mingled much with Spiritualists, that very many of our people are imbued with the notion that phenomena constitute mainly if not wholly what is known by them as Spiritualism. In their minds the philosophy is a minor affair, of secondary importance, of no especial value, and the inculcation of which might be dispensed with, without any appreciable loss to our cause.

That this is an erroneous idea, and fraught with loss and injury, must be apparent when careful and serious thought is given to the subject.

The philosophy and ethics of Spiritualism are widely different in their basic properties from the philosophy and ethics inculcated by the churches known as orthodox. Spiritualism does not, nor can base its philosophy or its ethics upon the mere will or supposed command of any being, whether recognized as finite or infinite. Our philosophy and ethics have their foundation in the nature of things—in the constitution of Nature itself—including the physical, the moral and spiritual principles inherent in Nature's evolved outgoings. From the nature and constitution of man, as the highest known type of being, must be deduced the system of philosophy and ethics, the order of moral laws and moral government, the vision of which shall be man's ideal of aspiration and attainment, in social, moral and spiritual life.

Now, it is well known that the churches of the orthodox type take especial interest and pains in gathering children into Sunday-schools and indoctrinating the young and plastic mind with the recognized orthodox beliefs, not merely, but also instill the orthodox notions of ethics, of moral right and wrong. That is, right and wrong depend on the will or command of God, things are right because God commands them, or wrong because He so declares.

And children grow up to mature age with these false ideas planted in their minds, growing with their growth, rooted in their mental and moral nature.

When we survey the field, we can but think and query: O, if Spiritualists would recognize the high importance of instructing the children, of planting and cultivating correct principles of philosophy and ethics, how grandly it would tell in elevating the ideals of mankind and in shaping to grander social, moral and spiritual attainments the oncoming humanity of earth's future.

If Spiritualism is not educational and reformatory, if it is merely a Spiritualism of phenomena, its value as a factor in human advancement is small indeed.

Unless Spiritualism is active along educational and reformatory lines, its value to the world is comparatively nil.

In the hearts and minds of children may be laid the best, the truest, the most abiding reformation. It is the reformation that will count in the well-being of the society of the future.

Every society of Spiritualists should have its lyceum, for the instruction of children in correct ethics and spiritual philosophy. If their minds are grounded in the ideals of Spiritualism, there is little danger that they will ever be warped aside by orthodox beliefs and teachings. But if they become regular attendants of the orthodox Sunday-school, and have no spiritual lyceum to inculcate spiritual ideas—what may be expected but that they will "join the church," to be in the social swim and because they have been taught to regard the barbarous tenets of orthodoxy as the truth—"because God says so!"

Spiritualist, your duty to your children lies before you. Will you do it? It is an injustice to the children and to the cause of Spiritualism, not to do this great work.

"Choice Winter Apples."

We published an advertisement under the above heading from one purporting to be Wilbur S. Graves, Monroe, Mich. It was a fraud, and the "slickest" one we ever had imposed upon us. Coming from the farming districts of Michigan, we regarded it as all right, and in that respect were badly disappointed. Other papers, too, no doubt, have also been swindled in the same manner. The postoffice authorities are now looking for Graves, and if he can possibly be found he will be sent to the penitentiary. It is impossible to always detect these swindlers. They will occasionally get into the columns of a paper, even when the greatest care is taken.

Banish Our Dwarf.

The pigmy side of man is often observable to the mortal eye, but were it always thus it would be easy to discern and the man be easily dealt with, but there is an inner dwarf, an occult pigmy that fiendishly shadows almost every human being. He may be termed, and very properly and appropriately, Selfishness, Envy, Jealousy or Greed, and in one he may be the predominating force; in others only an adviser, and others only an occasional visitor, but in one way or another this dwarf has a lien or mortgage on almost every human being, therefore Spiritualists, we are pleased to inform the world, should not be expected to be free from this universal possession, but to live up to what we claim to know, to that which every Spiritualist is taught to be the correct life, we must banish the dwarf from our control, from our unseen advisory board, from our presence even as a caller. We must live honest; we must live broad and brotherly; we must be tolerant of the opinions of others and not assume that we have found the whole truth, the only truth that has been called up from the great fountain of truth. We must be kind, considerate, consistent and just and the world will know it without blowing about it. But suppose it is never known by the majority of human beings, if it is right it need not be known unless we selfishly wish to claim the entire credit and ask the dwarf to call. Let us do what should be done, think right and push on towards the end of this life and the beginning of the next.

We know that all orthodoxy, in fact all religions have become more spiritual and less dogmatic since the birth of Spiritualism; whether this change would have come had not Spiritualism been born we can only conjecture, but it has come and so has Spiritualism and we should not dwarf our principles by pausing to egotistically force the entire credit upon Spiritualism. Let us be glad of the progress no matter to whom or to what may the credit be due. Let us rejoice that the religions are growing better and keep to work making them better and only call it right; give the credit to truth itself. Let us banish the dwarf and be large.

The Occult Forces.

It appears from the Chicago Record-Herald that Hakim Abdel Sureddin-Cerny, a young Bohemian, who has been in this country only two or three months, is performing a series of experiments and feats in hypnotism and auto-suggestion which are baffling the medical profession of the city.

Sureddin has perfect control of every portion of his body, and after hypnotizing a certain section is able to inflict any pain he desires. He can hypnotize the muscles of his neck and then drive a long steel pin straight through the carotid artery, which is considered by physicians to be certain death. He can throw this power into any portion of his body with the exception of his heart, and then thrust a steel pin or sharp knife entirely through the flesh without feeling the slightest particle of pain.

The young Bohemian last night gave an exhibition at the Bohemian School Hall, 400 West Eighteenth street, and performed feats which not only startled several hundred persons who had gathered to witness the performance, but also several physicians in the audience.

Among them were Dr. Novak and Dr. Weinstein, who practice in that section of the city. So marvelous were the performances of the almost supernatural foreigner that the physicians went to the stage and made an examination of the different experiments as they were conducted.

The first thing which Sureddin did after making an announcement to his audience in their native tongue was to hypnotize the fleshy part of his right arm and drive a big steel needle entirethrough it until the point protruded several inches on the other side. So much was Dr. Weinstein amazed by this remarkable performance that he asked to be allowed to drive the needle through. Accordingly Sureddin hypnotized his tongue and then stuck it far out of his mouth.

Dr. Weinstein then took hold of the long needle and stuck it directly through the hypnotist's tongue, and it was permitted to remain there several minutes, while several members of the audience examined it. Later the Bohemian drove a steel rod through the back of his hand and into a pine board. The doctors made a careful examination, but simply shook their heads. "It baffles me," said Dr. Weinstein. "I cannot understand it."

Sureddin made a number of other similar experiments, but in none of them did he cause any blood to flow, and at no time did he appear to experience pain nor appear to sustain any serious injury. "It does not hurt me a bit," the performer said through an interpreter after he had finished his experiments. "I have a peculiar power which I do not understand myself. I can hypnotize any part of my body and then do what I please with it—cut it, burn it or do anything at all—yet I feel no pain."

Sureddin appeared before the Rush Medical College students and faculty some time ago and gave an exhibition of his power. It is believed that the matter will be investigated by other medical colleges and physicians who are interested in this phase of the science.

The Bohemian's power of auto-suggestion and different forms of hypnotism are equally remarkable. He can put any subject to sleep and then make him sing, talk or do most anything.

He experimented successfully in this direction with Miss Ida Bloom of 330 Morgan street, who was in the gathering. He stretched her out on three chairs and then took the center chair from under her, leaving only her head and feet supported. Then he placed a boy in the center. Her form remained rigid. Like a flash he brought her to consciousness again. He also hypnotizer Frank Matusek, who is himself a hypnotist and declared that he could not be hypnotized on a wager of $50.

Money-Making in Religion.

There is food food for thought in some remarks of the Chicago Chronicle on the subject stated in the heading of this article. Distinct emphasis is given to the Chronicle's remarks, by the presence and history of Dowie, in Chicago, and others in other localities. In speaking of the extraordinary financial success of recent new movements in religion, the Chronicle says that it is remarkable that the spirit of imitation and competition has not manifested itself more frequently.

From the rise of Mormonism to the appearance of the curious society known as "The Holy Ghost and Us," the prime aim of new prophets and seers, if we are able to judge by the most obvious results of their propaganda, has been the acquisition of great wealth by individuals.

It is noteworthy also that the more money the high priests of the new dispensations secure, the greater the luxury in which they live and the more vulgar their displays in various lines, the more secure their hold upon their followers becomes. That nothing succeeds like success is abundantly proved by the constantly increasing prosperity of the men and women who may be said to be professionally engaged as founders and managers of new religions.

In thus reversing the rule of self-sacrifice by which Christianity is supported and extended the new prophets, while ignoring the human trait which naturally reverences personal devotion and sacrifice, have clearly taken into account that other worldly consideration which is expressed in almost universal admiration for those who achieve success and wealth. A religion which makes money for its founder may not be attractive at first glance, but it is undeniable that thousands of people are influenced in its favor sooner or later by the very evidences of prosperity which are thus displayed.

With comparatively few exceptions the Christian ministry is one of denial and sacrifice. Its riches are not of this world. The man who assumes its obligations and is not forgetful of self in many ways besides that of mere acquisition cannot hope to have a successful career. Public opinion, no less than the doctrines which he upholds, removes him utterly from the field of money-making and accumulation.

In view of these facts the wonder is not that an occasional self-seeker founding a new religion gains so much worldly prosperity, but that so many sincere and worthy Christian workers whose lives are blameless and whose work is admittedly righteous should so often fail to receive even the support necessary to a successful prosecution of their mission.

The latter-day prophet or prophetess who fares sumptuously every day, whose wealth is ostentatiously displayed and who seeks proselytes by the very extravagance of the show maintained is as frequently the recipient of rich benefactions as are the men whose lives are consecrated to the spread of the gospel which is without money and without price.

It is all curious and inexplicable except on the theory mentioned that humanity, even in religious matters, is impressed by worldly considerations as well as by the things that are moral and spiritual. A prophet in fine raiment, with gems and jewels, with a coach and livery and with a fifty-cent cigar in his mouth can find a place for himself in this world of paradoxes quite as easily as the saint who sells all that he hath and gives to the poor.

Since this is true, the most remarkable fact is that new prophets are not springing up on every hand. Whatever craft those now successfully practicing may possess, they are not particularly distinguished for ability. Most of them are common enough. What they have done others can do. Why should there not be more rivalry in a line which apparently has not been half worked out?

By way of further emphasis, it is to be noted that while the purported founder after whom Christianity is named, said of himself that he had not where to lay his head, and that he was called to preach the gospel to the poor, it has become a matter of notoriety that in these days, when "the Lord" makes a specially loud "call," He attaches thereto a very desirable financial adjunct in the shape of a big salary.

Whether the wanderer of Galilee would have listened to such a "call" is problematical—or rather not in the least doubtful. But the modern disciple who essays to preach the gospel of the Nazarene, has his ears acutely strung to catch the notes of such a "call," be it far or near.

In these matters, as in many others, there is a decided contrast between Jesus and his modern disciples.

Holds Negroes Not Human.

It appears from the Chicago Chronicle that Robert S. McCallen, St. Louis manager of the American Book and Bible House, is of the opinion that the negro is not a member of the human family. One day this week he was being examined in the Circuit Court as to his qualifications to weigh the law and the evidence in a case wherein a negress sued a local street railway company for $5,000 damages. McCallen was asked whether he entertained any prejudice or bias for the plaintiff or the defendant. He announced that he did have a distinct and unalterable prejudice against the plaintiff and that for no other reason than that she was a negro. The court was startled. But when McCallen emphasized this remark by explaining that he didn't believe a negro was a human being any more than a dog or an ape there was a sensation in the courtroom. The judge promptly excused McCallen from serving on the jury.

McCallen is the author of a book entitled "The Negro a Beast," in which he quotes copiously from the Bible to strengthen the theory which he advances. He says that he was borned and reared in the North and that some years ago he went South with the fixed opinion that the negro was the worst treated of human beings. He made a study of the black man and his environment and the result was his firm conviction that the negro is not a human being after all and therefore not entitled to the sympathy to be accorded to a human.

Some of McCallen's reasons for his strange belief are given in the following excerpts from his book:

"If the negro is human then he is of the same blood and flesh as Adam and Eve, for Adam was the only representative of God. Now, if Adam and Eve were the parents of the negro you cannot get around the fact that you have negro blood in your veins."

"If the negro and the human family both have souls the souls are all alike and the negro is your equal as far as souls are concerned; if he is your equal in spiritual things then he is your equal in everything."

McCallen declares that when Cain went into the land of Nod to betake himself a wife he married a negress—a beast—as there was no female child on the face of the earth at that time, and that as a result God cast him out of the line of kinship with the Adamic family and started the race of Ethiopians.

EXPLANATIONS NEEDED.

Concerning the Methods of the N. S. A.

In a late issue, under heading of "Explanatory," by National Secretary, Mrs. Longley, a few statements appear which I think need additional explanation. Some of us are so obtuse or slow of comprehension, that we need, perhaps, more than customary assistance, in order to obtain sufficient light to act intelligently in the cause we are trying to serve.

In replying to the criticism offered by Brother Moses Hull, the Secretary makes this statement: 'A person can belong to the Wisconsin State Spiritualist Association and be represented by its delegates (in the N. S. Convention); he can be a member of the West Superior local society, and be represented by its delegates," etc.

The Seattle Spiritual Association, of which I have the honor to be president, was chartered in the first instance by the N. S. A., but when the Washington State Association was organized and duly chartered, we were informed by Sister Longley that the N. S. A. transferred its jurisdiction over the locals to the state association. We have conformed to this ruling, though we much preferred the former relation. Now, which is right? The question is one of a general importance, I think.

Concerning Sister Longley's explanations as to the causes that lead to a predominance of eastern votes and influence, little need be said in my opinion. We all understand the methods and it's not the methods, exclusively, of which complaint is made. The methods show the "motive that lieth below," and it is of this that western Spiritualists may justly complain. They show how completely our eastern friends fail to grasp the true meaning of our work, and the necessity of making the N. S. A. truly national, as its name implies. Our New England brothers and sisters get up "excursions," "boom movements," have a "jolly good time" going and coming, but seem inclined to limit these good things to the northern half of the "thirteen original colonies"—thus reversing the methods adopted by almost every organization in the field.

The Christian Endeavorers, for instance, have made several excursions from eastern centers to the Pacific Coast, and as a result the C. Es. are as numerous as bees in a patch of clover.

The National Education Association, composed of school men and women, has held its conventions in the extreme West, and once, I think, in San Francisco. James J. Hill has built and purchased many a line of railroad that did not return a penny for years; building his roads in some instances in advance of the main line, but finally grafting into one general system. There is "method in his madness," that in a higher sense we may well emulate.

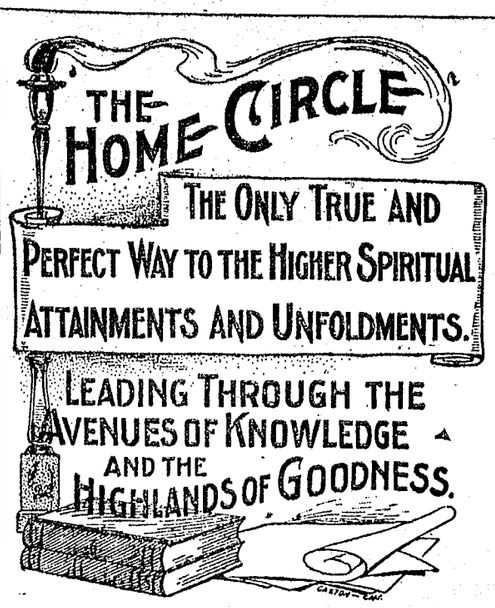
Must we wait until we wrest the control of the N. S. A. from our eastern friends by sheer force of numbers, before the former can be made National? Must we compel you to be broad and liberal, and just? If the East is strong and the West weak, so much greater the necessity that you should come to our assistance. We do not consider that the West is either weak or indifferent. We are still in the formative period. The central organizations of the old school are reaching out for this new territory. While ours—well. New England is happy and well cared for.

Just a word about the selection of places for the meetings of the N. S. A. conventions.

It seems to be a settled conclusion that the N. S. A. must be "kept on wheels," and trundled about over the country, subject to the call of the strongest delegation and its friends; and that the eternal grind of "competition" is to be the ruling factor in the case. This is the popular political method of the day, but in view of our pretensions as reformers and the serious and great work we have in hand, this conclusion is not only wrong in the principle involved, but childish in its conception. We do not need to plant the N. S. A.. beyond the possibility of removal, but it should become located, so that we may know where to find it for at least a period of five years, and ten would be still better, and it needs no argument to show this central point should be somewhere in the Central West.

The holding of a previous convention in Cleveland is no criterion for the present or future. Conditions are changing very rapidly, and there is not a particle of doubt that the West will respond with characteristic energy just as soon as it becomes apparent that the "good of the order" is to be made first and permanent.

This must not be construed as a criticism of persons—but of methods.



"New times demand new methods," and now is the time to agitate, educate, and build for the future.

R. F. LITTLE,
Pres't. Seattle Spiritual Association.

At the Bottom of the Battle of Life.

I.

Some people are always at the bottom in the Battle of Life. From the cradle to the grave the same sad fate, thrillingly cruel, confronts them. Life to them is one continual moan or sigh—a long drawn wail of agony and despair! They are on one never-ending funeral train, and as they pass along they bury here and there blasted hopes and unrealized aspirations. They are simply at the bottom in the unceasing struggle for existence, and the Hand of Destiny seems to hold them there to be crushed more and more from day to day.

To be at the extreme bottom is in a measure to be an outcast. The world looks up for genius, iridiscent with brilliant ideas, rare poetic gems and profound thought. It never looks down at the bottom to find a genuine genius, all aglow with angelic inspiration, and vibrating as if in touch with divine fingers and imbued with all that is beautiful and lovely in poesy and philosophy.

In the Battle of Life, the one at the bottom is sometimes crushed—ground down deeper and deeper, by virtue of being at the bottom.

We look at the bottom to find littleness; at the top to find true greatness and grandeur of soul where every heart-throb is supposed to vibrate upward to the very presence of celestial visitants, and then on and on to the throne of a God.

Whatever the gilded apparel and apparent sumptuousness of Vice, even if existing in a palace, still it is at the very bottom, anchored there, as if held down by a mountain.

Those at the bottom are always in the chains of bondage, and more or less lacerated and careworn. Vice, ignorance, error, avarice, lust, deceit and hypocrisy tend downwards towards the bottom, however gaudy the external appearance. All aspirations do not elevate—do not tend upwards—do not seek the divine radiance of heaven. At the bottom is the lowest starting point. There may be music there of the libidinous, lustful kind, each thought an imp of darkness, and each aspiration more brutish than the brute, and each act animated by a hateful spirit.

In this gaudy superficial world, it is not always easy to detect who are at the bottom.

The inmates of a palatial residence may be at the bottom in spiritual culture and genuine saving grace.

The lordly master may be there, and by his side the domineering, austere mistress.

But from the bottom there often emerges greatness and true nobility.

The little seed is at the bottom, but it springs like a fairy into a delicate stem, and then unfolds a beautiful blossom.

The acorn is at the bottom, but it rears the giant oak.

The seed is at the bottom, but see at the top the exquisite flower.

The egg is at the bottom of the nest, but see the sweet songster whose throat swells with anthems of praise, as it sits on the twig of a tree.

So there is hope even for poor mortals who are struggling along at the bottom and reaching upward for sunshine, spiritual culture and true greatness.

II.

The struggle for existence at the bottom is sometimes heart-rending. Every effort is tinged with sadness; every aspiration only reflects sorrow, and every prayer is uttered in a tremulous tone of voice, as if it had a background of tears and sighs and anguish. The hopes, even, reflect nothing but a despairing wail, and the thoughts as the eyes turn towards the stars, are too tear-stained to look for a happy time in a far-away heaven.

Such was the condition of Mrs. Jane Cushman, whose husband had died, leaving her in destitute circumstances, with two children on her hands—one three and the other five years of age. He had been a skillful mechanic, but an accident disabled him, finally resulting in his death, leaving his wife and children at the very bottom to struggle for an existence. Well cared for while he lived, their life thereafter was a bitter one. At the bottom!—at the bottom in this fair and beautiful world where brilliant diamonds and clusters of precious gems and rare works of art speak of great wealth, ease, luxury and worldly comfort; yes, Mrs. Cushman was now at the bottom of this worldly world of ours, with her two children of angelic sweetness leaning on her for support. Pinched with poverty, which, like a grim-visaged phantom seemed to pursue her with frowns upon its features and vile taunts upon its lips, she would at times drop in sheer exhaustion—away down at the bottom—prostrate in the Battle of Life!

III.

But all things on earth from the least to the greatest are God-given, so said, but selfish, lustful, brutish tyrannical man, has laid restrictions on its food, on its virgin soil, on its luscious fruits, on its green grass, on its flowers that lift skyward their heaven-born tints, and those at the bottom are often deprived of the privilege of making a living even with honest toil. Thus Mrs. Cushman who had been scrubbing for a wealthy South Side magnate, on a hot summer day, was overcome with the heat, and lay at the extreme bottom, suffering from a sunstroke.

IV.

The morning rays of the sun, gilding with rainbow tints the clouds in the East, and seemingly aglow with the similes of angels and the good wishes of philanthropic souls in the highest realms of love, came through the window at the hospital, and fell upon the pallid face of the unfortunate scrub-woman, Mrs. Cushman, who was still at the bottom—so hard a bottom, that no echo ever seemed to come therefrom like a token of good will or love. She was dazed. Memory for a time had closed its portals, and the past, like a ghostly demon, could not assail her. She struggled with her thoughts to arrange them in harmonious order. The scene out of the window was singularly bewildering, and the cots around the room containing unfortunates like herself, only deepened the mystery. Finally she partly regained her mental balance, and inquiring of the attendant, learned that she had been brought to the hospital unconscious, and her life had only been saved by the closest attention and skill of the physician in charge.

V.

Those at the bottom like Mrs. Cushman are always meeting with misfortunes. When she fell, and consciousness became dim and indistinct, and heaven's light deserted her, the mistress of the house did not, like an Angel of Love, minister unto her, for she—poor soul—was on the bottom, the cheerless bottom, where no tender heart-chords vibrated a sweet lullaby to cheer the soul of one who was so downcast. She rang up the patrol wagon to get rid of this poor, suffering woman—to get rid of kindly ministering unto her in her hour of distress; she had but little sympathy for those struggling at the bottom. It was the third day at the hospital—a beautiful morning when she fully regained her consciousness and self-control, and then for the first time she thought of her children left at home. With a sudden impulse, as if imbued with a mighty spirit force, and with a sigh mingled with pain and a mother's sweet love, she jumped from the cot, tottered on her feet, and fell prostrate on the floor—at the bottom indeed! The assistants kindly helped her to her feet again, but she refused to lie down, saying, "I must go to my children!—they are starving!—they are starving!" Finally dressed, in spite of the advice to the contrary, she went forth overshadowed seemingly by some mysterious spirit power that so strengthened her she could endure the trying ordeal. To her own wretched home—so cheerless that the only messengers of love that came therein to minister unto her were the genial rays of the sun. Her children she found at a neighbor's—at the home of one almost as poor as herself.

VI.

It was the approaching dawn at the hospital. The East frescoed, as it were, by the delicate touch of nature, giving a delightful tinge to the purple morn and the wisps of clouds, like radiance from the inner courts of heaven, seemed to reflect in the background the softest and most delicate touch of artistic forces. There for the second time, was Mrs. Cushman lying on a cot gradually dying. Her eyes were closed, her pulse was no longer perceptible, while an expression of ineffable sweetness was aglow on her features, just as if an Angel of Mercy was sending down upon them the divine radiance that always emanates from an exalted soul. She seemed to be calmly sleeping, ready almost to awaken and realize the grandeur of the scene just as the gates of the East were opening to usher in the coming day.

"A beautiful death," said one nurse.

"The most lovely death-scene I ever witnessed," said another.

"She has gone to heaven, if such a place for anyone," said the third.

During the preceding evening, the daily papers said, she was talking of her children, illustrating the touching pathos of a mother's love, and wondering what would become of them, bereft of her tender care! With her hands clasped she whispered a sweet devoutful prayer for their future welfare, and then fell into a seeming slumber, where she appeared to live over again a joyful reunion with her husband and children. Her lips would kiss something, her arms would seem to embrace a phantom form, and her features would suddenly become illumined as if many joys had been kindled in her soul, all aflame with genuine happiness. During the night she seemed to live in another and grander world. Thus it is that life has its diversified shades of illumined joys, and dark despair.

VII.

A pauper's grave finally welcomed Mrs. Cushman—she who had been so long at the bottom in the Battle of Life, struggling heroically to gain a bare subsistence. But a change had come, so sublimely beautiful, so exquisitely sweet, that her soul-chords vibrated with anthems of praise and rejoicings. She was no longer at the bottom; it was earth's sordid conditions, its base restrictions on the bounties of God's providence that held her at the bottom, finally crushing out her very life. She had now ascended to her proper spiritual state, far above that of the earthly magnate's family for whom she scrubbed her life away.

Peace, like a healing balm, finally comes to all who are pure in heart, honest in purpose, and who struggle to do good and be good; it comes at last when Death lifts the curtain and discloses the beauty and grandeur of the spirit realms. The lesson to be conveyed is, always assist those less fortunate than yourself, and thereby increase your spirituality and true worth, and gain the approving smiles of angels, and in that degree ascend upwards, even from the bottom.

Spectrum Analysis

As was noted in the editor's column of The Progressive Thinker last June, Professor Lockwood, of this city, proposes to establish a new basis for the examination of all forms of organic matter by spectrum analysis. This means in its applications to pathological science the opening of a new door, since it includes the crucial analysis of all cutaneous diseases which evolve pus or a scab. It also includes the examination of vaccine virus, to distinguish the pure from the impure; the examination of scrofulous blood and the elements and compounds of materia-medica. The spectroscope selected for this work by Prof. Lockwood, and made expressly for him in France, has been secured by his friends, and now awaits him at Philadelphia, Pa. The following letter sent to Mr. Lockwood, at Toronto, Canada, tells the story of its arrival:

Philadelphia, Pa., Nov. 22, 1901.

Dear Professor:—The spectroscope was received yesterday from the Custom House, and we have tested it and found it to be entirely satisfactory. We note in your letter of the 6th that you expect to be in Philadelphia soon, and we will either hold it here awaiting your arrival, or send it on to you, as you may desire. Yours very truly,

QUEEN & CO., Importers.

The instrument will undoubtedly be sent to Alliance, Ohio, where Professor Lockwood is now engaged in demonstrating to his auditors that continuity of life is a fact in nature, which truth he proves by an analysis of nature's forces, and the philosophy of the correlation of mental forces in all cosmic process.

The Prophecy of Spiritualism for the Twentieth Century. = A Lecture = By Mrs. Helen P. Russegue, Before the N. S. A. Convention.

The subject assigned me to-night is: The Prophecy of Spiritualism for the Twentieth Century. Through all the past time truth has been prophetic because it is a revelator—it reveals our necessities, it outlines the true conditions of human life, it portrays to us our shortcomings and vouchsafes the claims of our inherent needs.

The last half of the 19th century has prophesied what the 20th century must confer upon the human race. It has revealed in education, in philosophy, in art, in science, in religion, the pure perceptions of mankind. It has awakened within the thoughts of men the greater need of spirituality. It has aroused men who have been sleeping to the great need of the interior self. It has brought us into closer touch with each other. It has modified our laws. It has created higher standards of morality. It has opened the way to the more careful investigation of every principle and theory that has presented itself to the thoughts of men. It has entered into the home life and percolated human society. It has urged the needs of every grade of humanity until the world has become more akin through its multiplied needs. Spiritualism, in its modern aspects, a little more than half a century old, has conferred blessings upon humanity of which the first half century scarcely dreamed. It has brought to men a great lesson, which they are only now seeing)—the great need of acquiring the way to live. It has robbed death of its terror. It has created heaven not afar off, but within. It has brought God into closer communion with the world. It has deified mankind. It has taught us to see and know the God in man;—the divinity of humanity. It has taught us to see that God from whatever source it may come. It has taught us to discriminate between right and wrong, whether it is labeled "Thus saith the Lord," or whether it is labeled simply the answer to our great questions. It has become the dogma of infinitude. It has been the lever that has raised the world, and man's death has been the fulcrum that has supported this great force.

Spiritualism, although but half a century old, has so penetrated through the lines of human thoughts, that man has risen to higher altitudes and knows the God principles of human relationships and intellectuality, and the necessities of a more careful scrutiny of every theory that has been presented to him.

Spiritualism has made us inquirers. It no longer enables us to receive any affirmation without questioning its merits and its relation to our necessities. It has simply taught us that necessity is the source of revelation. Necessity is the foundation of progress. Necessity is the beginning—the high beginning—of the growth of truth. Necessity is a principle that awakens within the human breast that power and force which leads us to know what will supply that hunger.

Spiritualism has come in answer to the great prayer of the race. It has foretold in its coming multiplied necessities, hence it has a large human perception. It has taken away the dividing walls between science and religion. It has prepared the conditions of human thought to the higher needs of mankind, until the one is as necessary to the unfolding of intellectual power, as the other is to the gratification of human hunger.

Spirituality is the inspiration that is moving humanity to higher possibilities. It is outlining to our lives not only that, pertaining to the world toward which we are all ascending, but it has brought us into closer communion with each other here. We are looking to the physical world and these wonderful developments that are continually making themselves manifest. We behold the marvelous relation that exists between the communication from the spiritual life beyond the grave and spiritual life this side of the grave. We come almost together in the wonderful message that has brought us communion through telepathy, and we find to-day that when clairvoyance has established itself in our midst, and we are able to communicate, not only through our clear seeing, but through our clear thinking, the result has been, there has come to the outer world another manifestation. With the unfolding in science of the X-rays, that great discovery which brings to us the science of clairvoyance in matter, there has come in company with it a higher demonstration of spiritual perception through psychometry.

There has come through mental telepathic comprehension that which is manifest to the physical world of wireless telegraphy, and the truth is, that there never comes to us one condition of human life or any manifestation of progress, that is not accompanied with a spiritual growth or manifestation pertaining to the same law. We are so forcibly reminded that the spiritual nature of man is the growing force, the developing principle, the unfolding life that is leading the way to higher consciousness, to a higher knowledge, to a higher life; and is the great good that oversweeps us when our eyes are opened, when our ears are made clearer, when our understanding is more finite to us, when our needs are more plainly manifest to us and we come into contact with the great principle of human life that reveals the missionaries that answer our needs. The day of miracles has passed. The phenomena of Modern Spiritualism are not supernatural, they are not above the realm of human life, they are not beyond the measure of human necessity. They are not outside human nature, they are within and compose the human thought and they are the natural product of human intelligence.

Modern Spiritualism has brought to us not only the facts by which we prove that there is life beyond the grave, but it has brought the facts that demonstrate to us that the coming time contains more for us than the past has revealed. We are only the product of the centuries. We are only the creation of the past. We are only the life that is growing, evolving from its wonderful communing as we enter this close relationship with human needs and human life. It proves that we cannot know any terminal to the growth of human intelligence.

Spiritualism has taught us the close relation between the divinity of life and our lives. We have brought God from the lofty distance and have established him in human hearts. We have taken him from the throne of religion and enshrined him in human intelligence. We have wrested him from the bigoted formula of opinion and have brought him into our lives to become part and parcel of our experience. We have made God for ourselves and we are the demonstration of his power. He has taught us to open our eyes to see. He has opened our ears to hear, and he has opened our hearts to understand. He is greater, more loving, more tender, more heaven-born than he was fifty years ago. Why? Because we recognize in humanity a diviner brotherhood, knowing that he is enshrined in human life and we make ourselves a part of his divinity, consequently we recognize the divinity of man, the Godliness of human nature, the growth of human intelligence and the unfolding spiritually of all the race and grace of men.

Spiritualism prophesies for the future a wonderful revelation. In the last half century it has been the inspiration of music, of invention in every science that pertains to human necessities. In the future it reveals to us a higher spirituality. It teaches us how to prepare truth to our higher needs. It brings us into a better understanding of human nature. It helps us to eliminate sin and ignorance and crime from our midst. Why? Because it promises a revelation to the understanding of the mistakes of our universe, and we shall seek the foundation or causes which are producing these conditions. When you will recognize sin as disease, and crime as the outbreak of disease, and you are to seek a remedy for it, then you will find a force, a power and an illumination to eliminate it from human nature. But how is this to be accomplished, you say. It is to teach the race that if we want a better condition in humanity we must be better fathers and mothers, and we must be better neighbors and friends. We must think better thoughts. We must become more spiritual ourselves. We must become truer to nature and to the God within. We must become true to each other and the product of that knowledge will bring to us a higher grade of morality and a greater unfolding of spirituality.

Spiritualism in fifty years has accomplished what Christianity has failed to produce in two thousand years. It has accomplished more for the world, because it has brought religion into our everyday lives. It brings it into our thoughts, into our hopes, into our affairs, into our sorrows, into our joys, into our homes; and it makes you, if you are honest, earnest Spiritualists, better fathers and mothers, truer neighbors and more honorable business men and women. Truer to yourselves, because you recognize you cannot shake off the divine spirit.

Spiritualism contains a prophecy for the future, which means in itself a betterment of the race, a higher and more profound education in all relations of human life. It teaches you that there is such a thing as progress in religion.

Friends, for the last two thousand years religion has been encrusted with bigotry and superstition. It has borne its label upon the outside until by its close environment it has fallen into decay and its covering has fallen off and you have beheld its rottenness. It is no longer a living spirit, but it is a dead letter, and to-day there is a proclamation for the century that you are just knowing, that religion shall become the inspiration, and that religion means knowledge. I do not mean that it means bigotry, that it means superstitious fear, that it means anguish, or environing you by any superstition of that divine life, but it means freedom from dogmatic faith and an education into knowledge.

Religion is not dogma, religion is not fear, religion is not ignorance, religion is not superstition, but it is the living life that warms the hearts of men to better deeds, to nobler thoughts and to higher living. Religion is a fire for every one to kindle in his own life, that it shall warm every energy, quicken every heart throb. You have every impulse for a better demonstration of what is within.

And what is the result of man's discoveries to himself of the God within? That he has found within himself the divine spirit; that he has made the world a heaven; that he has brought heaven from far away and it is living and throbbing and vibrating in his own soul.

Spiritualism promises much in the advancement of humanity by way of inspiration. It inspires the professors in our colleges. It has entered the churches. For fifty years it has been as man's disintegrator. It has been tearing down the old. It has been turning over the old opinions. It has been driving away the rocks and buttresses of old opinions, and it has been bringing the light and warmth in, until we know that the soil is ready for a better seed-time.

Spiritualism is on the threshold of invention. It has quickened the perception of man, and you are seeking for things that shall bring you more comforts and shall give you more time to improve yourselves.

Spiritualism, in its purity, is bringing to you a higher phenomena than you have ever yet known. You are standing upon the threshold of a higher temple whose dome reaches into eternity, nourished and brightened by the love of man to man. Theology will be ennobled by human growth and the cry that is going up from its ranks is for more light, more light. And the answer is passing on and on from all quarters to the spiritual world, and the answer is floating down, and as soon as your souls are ready to receive it, it shall answer your prayer.

Spiritualism is doing much in arts and sciences. Two of your colleges, the most prominent upon the earth, are to-day endorsing Spiritualism. They have turned out, over their seals, two honest, fearless investigators. Harvard College investigated the manifestations that were produced by a noted medium, and put him out from its walls, and it has sent out a man to the world that dares affirm what he has seen and heard. And so it has been throughout the land. Columbia to-day has given to the world one of our instructors. He is now proclaiming the glad tidings, the great joy, that we have discovered the immortality of the soul. Here in your city was a man of science who has introduced phenomena into his laboratory, been guided by its laws, and declared to the world, "I have discovered the material of which souls are made." And what is the result? The scientific world to-day has adopted his dreams and is writing largely upon them for the betterment of mankind.

The scientific world is taking hold of Spiritualism with all its resulting opinions and has led man to a better understanding of his own great uses.

The religious world is always the last to join hands with advance. It is always the last that will take up a new thought. It says, Hands off! You can improve me in purities; you can improve me in science, you can elevate me in art, you can uplift me in music, but, Oh, let my religion alone. (Applause.)

And to-day the cry is going out, religion has fallen into line and is reaching to higher possibilities, and the world is finding deity in human application, human growth, universal love. Love for God because you love mankind, who has become the inspiring spirit that is the religion of the world.

What is the result in this coming century? That to-day we stand here drawing away the stains from before the world, just as a picture comes into view as your eyes become clear, as the mists are falling away, and you are rending the veil of ignorance you behold it more and more beautiful, and justice will reign in your laws. Every hall of human worship will be converted to a hall of learning. Your churches will be great intellectual centers. Education in spiritual things will become a part of your life, until the souls of men shall know God through his wonderful goodness, his mighty love, his divine presence, that speaks in and through the lives of men.

The prophecy of Spiritualism is, that you will grow more spiritual or finer until everything will be of such a character, you will find in every home, in every family circle, there will come to you an outpouring of spiritual love. The result will be a better humanity. Crime will fade away. Ignorance will be lost sight of. Slavery will be known no more. Labor and capital will be at one with one another and justice will stand upon your altars, ruling over your land, and you will stand in its scales, balancing through love to God and through love to man, in eternal advancement.

THE GODLESS AND DEVILLESS CLUB.

UNUSUAL EXCITEMENT AT THE LAST MEETING, ILLUSTRATING THE DEEP ROOT THE GOD-IDEA HAS TAKEN IN THE HUMAN MIND.

Don't for a moment entertain the idea that the Godless and Devilless Club is a sarrilegious order. Although it is Godless and Devilless, it is in perfect tune and harmony with the Infinite—force, spirit, matter—that fills all space; the Infinite that never had a beginning and never will have an ending; the Infinite which never can be compassed or comprehended by mortals; the Infinite, an unexplored ocean of force, matter, spirit; the Infinite with self-existing laws, self-existing impulses, ever onward in the process of evolution from the infinitely small to the inconceivably large; from the monad to man; from the atom to the largest world. The Godless and Devilless Club is thrilled with the wonderful possibilities wrapped up in the atom as it vibrates in the brain, as it mingles with the poison of the cobra, as it pulsates in every nerve and muscle, as it glistens in the eye of a maiden, or flies off into the realms above in the bird, or dances on a sunbeam. Knowing no God and no Devil, the Godless and Devilless Club stands forth a bright star among the thousand of sects that have proved a curse to the world, and which in medieval times had their hands red with human blood, and their consciences seared with superstition, ignorance and bigotry; their hearts as cruel as the rapacious monster that kills men, women and children.

The Godless and Devilless Club pulsates with the lofty emotions of the poet, the philosopher, philanthropist and seer. It is the flowering out of the angelic impulses, the ripening of evolution in its onward strides, and the maturing of those forces in the realms of the Infinite that awaken new possibilities within the human soul.

Being Godless, the Club has absolutely no form of worship, no vesper hymns to sing, no sacred beads to count, no holy water to dip the fingers in to form the cross, and no Bible whatever that is in the least degree sacred. Being in tune with the Infinite, it stands on a higher, grander, and more beautiful plane than any religious sect, and surveys the universe with its wonderful possibilities, in a light that is new, novel and instructive.

Having no God and no Devil this Club has no superstition. It is free from bigotry. It is untainted with avarice. It is not weighed down with the sins of an oppressive, cruel past. It stands forth without a spot or stain upon its garments, simply an evolution in the process of the higher unfoldment. It is the flowering out of the natural principle of growth, and is the agent to redeem the world from sin and misery. It has come forth at the auspicious moment, and will act the part of a genuine Savior to a priest-ridden people.

At the last Thursday evening meeting of the Godless and Devilless Club, an incident occurred which caused a great commotion, and which ultimated in much good. After the singing by the club, participated in by nearly all present, accompanied with music on the organ, one of the new members, one of the best of singers, commenced singing, "Praise God from whom all blessings flow!" What a tumult arose as the line was finished. Every member of the Club arose and in stentorian tones, said, "Mr. President, I object!" For a time there was confusion confused. Such excitement we never saw before. Each one was wild with the emotions surging in his soul. The whole assemblage seemed to want to speak at once, and demand recognition from the presiding officer. They stood on chairs, benches and even the table, each one desiring to make the first speech in condemnation of the singer who was so unpolitic as to burst forth singing such an inappropriate hymn—so out of place in a Godless and Devilless Club! "Mr. President"—in a splutter those words were uttered until the very air seemed to be hot, boiling over with the emotions of pent up souls seeking opportunity for the expression of some brilliant sentiment pertinent to the situation caused by the utterance, "Praise God from whom all blessings flow!" In the excitement chairs were overturned, the table tilted on its side, the president was tripped in endeavoring to back up a little, and fell headlong on the floor, calling vociferously as he struck the floor, "Come to order!" Two pet dogs allowed to enter the room commenced whining most piteously, making a pandemonium of noise that would almost equal the troublous times of a protracted religious revival. The president, however, immediately regained his feet, and impatiently said, "For God's sake be quiet!" That unguarded expression by the dignified and urbane president of the Godless and Devilless Club, only added fuel to the fire, and the excitement became, if possible, more boilingly tumultuous than ever, and the very atmosphere seemed to be incandescent with the exudations of the one hundred and fifty fiery breaths present. It was a time long to be remembered, and illustrates in an impressive manner what a panic an inadvertent remark, made at the wrong time and place, will cause; and illustrates still further more comprehensively the deep root that the God-idea has taken in some minds in consequence of heredity and early training, and shows what the Godless and Devilless Club has got to contend with in the course of its advancement to redeem the world. The president fully realized the predicament in which he was placed and forgetting his dignity burst forth with an iridescent fit of laughter that was so exceedingly grotesque and comical that each one stopped talking and became also convulsed with laughter; but soon each one subsided, and peace and quietness once more reigned in the Godless and Devilless Club, and each one seemed to enjoy the excitement and good cheer of the unfortunate occasion.

The president then said: "I deeply regret that one of our honored members, and myself, should so far forget ourselves as to violate one of the fundamental rules of the Godless and Devilless Club, and allude to an imaginary being as the one from whom all blessings flow into this sublunary sphere. If all blessings flow from the being designated as God, I ask you from what source do those things emanate which are diametrically opposite to blessings? Professor Blanchard, in a paper read before the Academy of Medicine, in Paris, France, said the anopheles species of mosquito propagates disease, even leprosy. The Parisian culex mosquito is less terrible. He advised the destruction of the larvae by placing petroleum in stagnant water and sweet oil in drinking water.

"What particular sphere does the mosquito occupy in the providence of this God from whom all blessings are supposed to flow? Who first conceived this cunning, dangerous, malignant little animal that proves so exceptionally annoying to man and beast, and so far as known of no utility whatever to the world. As a daily paper well says, the mosquito is persona non grata with the scientists, who are busy with devices intended for its extinction. It is charged not alone with making itself personally disagreeable, both with song and sting, but with being the common carrier of diseases and the prelude of pestilence. It is still a matter of some doubt whether the scientists will accomplish their purpose, for the mosquito, though small, is resourceful, as most small things are. But supposing that they are able eventually to wipe out the last mosquito in its stagnant breeding places and clear the world of them at one swoop, what then?

"There are a few scientists who are asking this question seriously, and intimating that such a wholesale slaughter of one family of insects might disturb the balance of the whole insect world and then Nature [another name for God] in her efforts to restore equilibrium might let loose another horde of pests worse than the mosquito. Three possibilities are already mentioned—viz.: the kissing bug, which has thus far only given scattered hints of its activity, but may prove a greater danger to man than the mosquito; the brown-tailed moth, which ravages both man and all vegetation; and the bald-headed fly, which preys upon the farm stock and works all day. Would it not be a calamity if, as the result of the destruction of the little tuneful mosquito, nature should send any one or more of these still more active agents of wretchedness and involve men, trees, and animals in a common cataclysm?

"For, be it remembered, nature is resourceful. We really know as little about her possibilities as about those of electricity. Scientists assure us that it will take at least 300 years properly to classify the insects already known, and when that is accomplished we shall only be on the threshold of that department of her great world. When it is remembered how promptly and in what myriads she is in the habit of supplying any temporary deficit to angleworms, frogs, grasshoppers, locusts, gnats, ants, etc., would it not be well for the scientists to go cautiously before making it necessary for her to restore the insect balance in any direction?

"If all these pestiferous animals are directly the emanation of God, wherein does the blessing come in; wherein the joy; wherein the happiness; wherein the satisfaction with their dangerous proclivities? If a God did not create them, where is the other fellow who did do the wonderfully dirty job? What is his position, most noble members of the Godless and Devilless Club, in this complex universe—so complex that humanity knows but very little of the nature of electricity outside of an electrified body. And now the Chicago Tribune sets forth an entirely new source of misery. The land not having contributed sufficient summer pests, the sea has begun to add to the number, and its first donation is an apparently innocent creature which aggravates human misery to a greater extent than the mosquito, the flea, or the brown-tailed moth. It is the jellyfish. Every one who sails or bathes in the sea or roams the beaches at low tide knows this monster, bowl-shaped, gracefully fringed, of about the consistency of blanc mange, drifting rather than swimming with the incoming tide, and going back with it, spending its frail life like a lotus eater, doing nothing but drifting aimlessly about, the ideal of Nirvana.

"This seemingly harmless, lifeless lump of marine gelatine which, stranded on a beach, melts away in a jiffy, is proving a terror on the Atlantic coast. The jellyfish, like misfortunes, never come singly. Myriads of them come in and go out with every tide. Heretofore they have been considered harmless, but recently they have come in extraordinary numbers, and the bathers during the past summer have been bathing in a compound about half surf and half jellyfish. In one day at a single beach more than a hundred bathers found themselves poisoned by contact with jellyfish, and their arms and legs frightfully swollen. Of course, those who bathed in the orthodox fashion, like the girl whose clothes were on the hickory limb and who did not go near the water, but were content to lie and pose on the sand, escaped, for the jellyfish can neither walk, swim, nor fly, and once on the sand, speedily disappears. Bolder spirits, however, who bravely defy king crabs, clam shells, and kelp for a plunge in the seas, have been the sufferers. With stinging jellyfish in the water and stinging mosquitoes and green heads out of it bathhouses are not favorite summer resorts.

"Thus kindly Mother Nature finds some work to do even for her humblest children and nothing could be humbler than this flaccid lump which has suddenly proved itself to be a floating abomination. It is quite unnecessary to comment upon the fact that the jellyfish which makes all this trouble, like the mosquito, is of the feminine gender. That can be taken for granted. The male jellyfish is an inanimate lump of untainted innocence.

"It will not do, my beloved members of the Godless and Devilless Club, to shirk, or shrink from any inquiry in reference to the origin of the pestiferous insects, animals, states and conditions of matter that are so dangerous, and so inimical to the best interests of humanity. The reasoning of the various leaders of the different churches in regard to the existence of the malignant creatures that exist in myriads on earth and prove very troublesome and annoying to the human family, is grotesque, illogical, and nowhere near the truth. Your president will take this matter into further consideration at a subsequent meeting. The Godless and Devilless Club now stands adjourned until the next regular meeting, two weeks from to-night, and may God bless you!"—the meeting closing with the most intense good-natured excitement on account of this last break on the part of the president, a break caused by heredity, early teachings, religious training of a pious mother, etc., etc.,

In the previous report of the proceedings of the Godless and Devilless Club, we alluded to the case of Geo. B. Hastings, whose wife and children fell victims to the yellow fever scourge, and he while viewing their remains fell to the floor and lost consciousness. The next morning he was partially revived. His experience will be detailed hereafter by the HIGH SCRIBE.

SANCTIMONIOUS IKE.

His quiet ways an' honest look
Won all the diggin's at the start;
His blue eyes seemed an open book
In which we read his guileless heart.
He first showed up at Placer Mound
Jes' after that big '80 strike,
An' unobtrusive loafed around,
All unconcerned and quiet like.

Some thought he war a millionaire
From Frisco, lookin' up a snap,
Whilst others said he had the air
Of some revival gospel chap.
The boys soon tied him to the name
Of "Reverent Sanctimonious Ike,"
Jes' 'cause he played the pious game
So unconcerned an' quiet like.

He nursed the sick; spoke words o' cheer
To them as 'ras'led with despair,
An' at the bed o' pain you'd hear
His low, sad voice in earnest prayer.
No matter whar distress war found,
You'd see that Sanctimonious Ike,
Jes' like an angel movin' round,
All unconcerned an' quiet like.

One night the safe, in which war kept
The dust of all the men in camp,
War busted open while we slept,
By some durned, ornery, thievin' scamp.
We struck the trail amazin' quick,
An' soon struck Sanctimonious Ike,
Leadin' a pack mule down the creek,
All unconcerned an' quiet like.

We found the stuff, a jedge was chose,
An' thar beneath a jackoak tree,
The court convened, an' w'en it rose,
We took the back trail quietly.
As up the mountain side we clim,
We took a back'ard glance at Ike,
A hangin' from a jackoak limb,
All unconcerned an' quiet like.

THE SPIRITUAL SIGNIFICANCE.

A VERY IMPORTANT WORK.

The Spiritual Significance is by Lilian Whiting, author of "The World Beautiful," "After Her Death," "Kate Field, A Record," "A Study of Elizabeth Barrett Browning," Cloth, $1.00.

Miss Whiting finds the title of her new book in these lines from "Aurora Leigh:"

"If a man could feel
Not one, but every day, feast, fast, and working-day,
The spiritual significance burn through
The hieroglyphic of material shows,
Henceforward he would paint the globe with wings."

The aim of this book is to reveal the curiously close correspondence between the developments of modern science and spiritual laws; to note that new forces, as discovered and applied in wireless telegraphy, are simply laws of an unseen realm into which humanity is rapidly advancing and thus gaining a new environment. From this evolutionary progress, as illustrated by physical science the author of "The World Beautiful" continues the same argument presented in those volumes in a plea that the future life is the continuation and development of our present life in all its faculties and powers, and that the present may be ennobled by the constant sense of the Divine Presence, and a truer knowledge of the nature of man and his relations to God tend to a higher morality and increasing happiness. The book is characterized by the same essential style and qualities that have insured for "The World Beautiful" volumes an almost world-wide popularity.

..GENERAL SURVEY..

THE SPIRITUALISTIC FIELD—ITS WORKERS, DOINGS, ETC., THE WORLD OVER.

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best subserved thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet we wish it distinctly understood that our space is inadequate to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that The Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy, to insure insertion in the paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require. Every item sent to us for publication, should contain the full name and address of the writer. We desire to know the source of every item that appears. This rule will be strictly adhered to.

Keep copies of your poems sent to this office, for they will not be returned if we have not space to use them.

Bear in mind that all notices for this page are cut down to suit the space we have to occupy when received.

Take due notice, that all items for this page must be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer. It will not do to say that Secretary or Correspondent writes so and so, without giving the full name and address of the writer. The items of those who do not comply with this request will be cast into the waste basket.

James K. Phillips, of Dauberville, Pa., dreamed that he had visited a fortune teller, who told him that he would not live more than four days. While cutting down trees for fire-wood one of the limbs fell upon Phillips, inflicting injuries from which he died. The morning after having the dream Phillips related it to Isaac W. Moger and Mahlon Berkey, and he told them he felt sure the dream was a premonition of death. —Philadelphia Times.

E. H. Trussel writes: "I notice to-day a mistake in the short article of mine in The Progressive Thinker of Nov. 9, on this weighty prayer question. If I used the word 'learners' in my short article, I am sorry, for I assure you that I intended to say 'leaners.'"

G. B. Flux reports the case of a sailor to whom he administered nitrous oxide gas for the purpose of tooth extraction. While anesthized the patient dreamed of a shipwreck, through which he had passed in all its details. The dream could not have lasted more than ten seconds, while his experiences during the wreck covered a period of three and three-quarters hours.—Medical Record.

The Indianapolis (Ind.) News contains the following from Muncie, Ind.: "Following the arrest of W. J. Thompson in Oklahoma, and warrants being issued for the arrest of Charles Hawkins, both for the alleged swindling of Sarah Williams out of $3,000, comes the announcement that Spiritualism was employed in working the swindle. Both she and Thompson were Spiritualists. It is claimed that through its agencies Thompson arranged that she should marry Hawkins, which, it is alleged, was arranged, so that he might get her money, without fulfilling the marriage contract. It is claimed that other prominent people will figure in the case."

Rev. Chas L. Ainsworth will lecture, Sunday, at 7:45 p. m., at Ericson Hall, Wentworth avenue, near 62nd street. Subject, "Ideality." Music and messages. Wednesday afternoon meetings at 2:30.

Scribe writes: "G. W. Kates and wife have well served the Philadelphia, Pa., Society of Spiritualists during the month of November. They had large audiences of representative people, and the lectures were well received. The spirit descriptions and messages by Mrs. Kates have been accurate, with scarcely an exception. As N. S. A. missionaries they should be a success. Keep them busy. That is what they desire. During the month they also held meetings in Paterson, N. J., and Royersford, Pa."

The Michigan State Spiritualist Association held some very successful mass meetings at Jackson, November 23 and 24. Among the noted speakers present were Mr. and Mrs. Carpenter, Mrs. Baade, Mrs. Coffman and others. Large crowds attended.

G. W. Kates and wife, as N. S. A. missionaries, desire week-night engagements during December near Pittsburg, Pa. In January and February they have open time en route to Wheeling, W. Va., to Texas. They would like calls for two or three nights in Cincinnati, Ohio; Louisville, Ky.; Cairo, Ill.; Memphis, Tenn, and New Orleans, La.; also near-by points. Address them at No. 660 Pennsylvania avenue, S. E., Washington, D. C.

E. Massey writes: "I have taken The Progressive Thinker for two years, and think it one of the best papers I ever read, and wish my friends to read it and become wise."

Sarah F. Baker writes from Sheridan, Ind.: "Mr. and Mrs. Hayden, of Indianapolis, served our society, Nov. 24. Mr. Hayden delivered two fine lectures. Mrs. Hayden followed with platform tests. Since our organization in the spring, a few of us, openly-avowed Spiritualists, see, as it were, a rift in the clouds, encouraging us in our good work. Liberal minds are turning to Modern Spiritualism for the solution of a problem the church has failed to satisfactorily solve—the question, 'If a man die shall he live again?' Many realize that their friends not only survive the change called death, but can unquestionably make their presence felt. It is not to them a belief, but a knowledge."

Augustus Rolfe, partner in a grocery firm at 183 Albany street, New Brunswick, N. J., lost a pocketbook containing $720. The loss was a severe one, for Rolfe is a poor man. He advertised his loss in the newspapers, offering $50 reward for the return of the lost money. Rolfe dreamed that he had the money, that he took it out of his pocket, laid it on a shelf behind a package of some kind, and there lost sight of it. The next morning he at once acted on the suggestion conveyed by the dream. In half an hour he found the money. It had been placed behind a package of soap on a front shelf of the store. He at once took the money to the bank. Rolfe now recalls laying the pocketbook down for a moment, fearing he would lose it. A customer engaged his attention, and the incident slipped his mind.—Philadelphia Record.

H. C. Greene writes: "There will be a dance at Kenwood Hall, 4308 Cottage Grove Avenue, December 7, given by the Spiritualistic Social Circle. Admission twenty-five cents. There will be dances for both old and young. A good time is guaranteed to all who may come, and every one will receive a most cordial welcome."

Sarah C. Scovell writes from Galena, Kansas: "Amid the many material duties of life, we have neglected many spiritual duties, but still strive to keep the run of the general spiritual work. We are doing but little in the field work, but yielded to the desire of our Joplin friends and hold a Sunday night service there. We have a good following in the general service, and a club of Ladies, the Inter-State Psychic Club, which meets every two weeks for study and demonstrations of spiritual gifts. We have Ghost Land as a lesson book, and from time to time will study each of the series given as premiums by The Progressive Thinker. Mrs. Anna Wallace leads our lesson, the first chapter of Ghost Land, next week; topic, Von Marx, the Student, and a sketch of Emma Hardinge Britten's life. We have over twenty members now, and others desire to join. My home duties and the care of an aged mother forbid very active efforts on my part, but every little helps and one good seed will find its resting place and future results as well as a thousand. We hope to secure a club of subscribers for The Progressive Thinker through the efforts of the Inter-State Club."

The Philadelphia American contains the following from Susquehanna, Pa.: "While revival meetings were being held last summer the Methodist Church at Doraville was fired by an incendiary, and it was generally believed that it was the work of whitecaps. The pastor had received anonymous letters warning him that the building would go up in smoke. Allie Mosher, 19 years old, a farm hand, of Colesville, who recently became converted before a congregation at East Windsor, on Sunday evening confessed that he burned the church. He said the deed so preyed on his mind that he could stand it no longer. He says the devil told him to burn the church."

Mrs. Addie E. Wood writes from Oakland, Cal.: "The Progressive Thinker comes every Friday, worth its weight in gold, but never a word from Oakland. We wish your readers to know that our people are in line with progress, having many thoroughly good Spiritualists ready for every good word and work. We have three societies, not large, but loyal, each filling a niche that the others could not reach. Mrs. R. S. Lillie has been with the Oakland Psychical Society as its speaker for more than two years, and we think the last address better than any other. We have Mrs. Annie L. Gillespie with us occasionally, and do not need tell her eastern friends that to know her is to love her. By the way, San Francisco and friends from Oakland gave her a house-warming on her return from the eastern camps and were entertained with refreshments, music and speaking, all of a high order. We have many grand mediums in our city always ready to give the loving words from the spirit friends."

A story of hypnotism, wielded by Peter Hanrahan, 16 years old, to induce smaller boys to steal for him, was told to Justice Sabath in the Maxwell street police court yesterday. Because the prisoner's mother had just died the justice continued the case indefinitely, during the good behavior of the boy. Ernest Zazciek, 14 years old, 1539 West Twenty-second street, told the court about the peculiar influence exerted by Hanrahan over him. "Whenever I would meet Peter he would look into my eyes," explained Ernest. "Then he would tell me to do things and I could not help but do what he said. One day he told me to rob my father. I tried to hide, but I felt so queer that I had to hurry to my home and I stole $20. I gave the money to Peter. Another time he made me steal $10 more." Mrs. Adelia Skarpenski, 1538 West Twenty-second street, was another complainant. Her 5-year-old-son Felix is unable to speak or understand a word of English, having been born in Poland. However, she says, the Hanrahan boy had no difficulty in controlling the mind of her child. According to the boy's own story he was induced to enter his home and steal $40 which he turned over to Peter. The little one immediately identified Hanrahan.—Chicago Chronicle.

Dr. Pearson writes from Ponca City, O. T.: "Dr. Louis Schlesinger is here, plowing deep furrows on Oklohoma's materialistic planes (plains); we are sowing the seed (knowledge) of immortality, hoping that in the future the spiritual granaries of Oklahoma may bulge out filled with spiritual blessings, in the same proportion as the physical granaries are bulging out, filled with the ripened fruits of the 'land of the fair Gods.'"

The Chicago Chronicle has the following from Mattoon, Ill.: "Hypnotized into wedding Jackson L. Hill, whom she did not love, Lucy M. Bush of this city was deserted three days after the wedding. She has been unable to find any traces of her husband. Miss Bush is 20 years old. She met Hill four months ago, when he was a brakeman on the Peoria, Decatur and Evansville railway here. He paid her attentions and when he went to Peoria to work for the Chicago and Alton, they corresponded. Lately he had a run between Chicago and Detroit, Mich., on the Wabash. October 28 Hill came to Mattoon on a visit. He asked Miss Bush to marry him. She refused, as she says she did not love him. Two days later they went driving and she affirms by the use of mesmeric passes she was hypnotized and they drove to Charleston and were married by Dr. O'Neal at the Methodist Episcopal parsonage. They returned home. Three days later he deserted her."

"Thought transference, is too common to go unstudied. An English mother, the wife of a respectable physician, dreamed that her son, then serving in the Crimea, had been shot in the foot. Some weeks later an officer returned home and informed the mother that her boy had been shot in the right foot. "You mistake," said she "it was the left foot." It developed that the woman was right and the officer wrong, although the knowledge of the mother came absolutely from a dream. History and experience are full of similar incidents which cannot all be put down to chance. It is not impossible that two minds are sometimes so mutually attuned that one acts as a sender and the other as a receiver, thus realizing the phenomena of the telephone.

The Daily Standard of Brooklyn, N. Y., says: "Rev. Henry Dorn, formerly Brooklyn, had conveyed to him the title of pastor of the First Church of Spiritual Progression of Newark, N. J., when that house of worship was dedicated last Sunday evening. The ceremony of conveyance was performed in an ordination address delivered by Mrs. Cutler of Philadelphia, a well known Spiritualist, and who afterward gave a number of tests demonstrating spirit return. John Morey, of New York, another medium, also gave a message, which is said to have been acknowledged. The new Spiritualist pastor in his response to Mrs. Cutler's address asked for the aid and support of his associates and prayed for the guidance of the spirit world that he may be worthy of the great and responsible office with which he is now clothed. He was presented with a certificate bearing the corporate seal of the association, signed by its officers, as demanded by the laws of the state of New York. Before giving an exhibition of his spiritualistic powers, Mr. Morey made an eloquent address on the subject of Spiritualism and closed his speech with a poem appropriate to the occasion from the facile pen of Ella Wheeler Wilcox."

Prof. Lockwood's great book, "The Continuity of Life a Cosmic Truth," now in the hands of the printers, O'Leary & Co., 109 S. Jefferson street, has been delayed on account of the severe attack of hay-fever on Mr. Lockwood during September, which made it impossible for him to carefully review and arrange the vast amount of scientific data which he will embody in this work. It is now in progress and will be out as soon as a scientific treatise of this kind can be published. All patrons of the book will receive their copy in due time.

Lyman C. Howe writes: "Before I closed my work in Norwich, the president, Mr Bogue, informed me that at their last board meeting, the expression was unanimous to give me another engagement for the fall of 1902. I had not asked for it, and I take this action as an evidence that they were not displeased with my work. There is a prospect now that I shall soon begin direct work on the History of Modern Spiritualism, and I am already at work collecting data, of which more soon. On Monday, Nov. 25, I left the pleasant home of the Spaldings, and at noon landed at Mount Vernon, where I am visiting Milton Rathbun and family, at 18 Summit avenue. He is the man who two years ago was famous for the 28-day-fast, while he kept at his business in daily regularity. Mrs. Rathbun is a writer and speaker for Spiritualism as well as an active worker in the Woman's Cause, and several other educational and humanitarian associations. The youngest son, Charles, is still at Harvard, but will graduate in a year or so. Frank is at home now. They are an interesting and typical family. Culture, refinement, spirituality and loyalty to truth pervade the household. Books, magazines and papers in rich variety abound. One can absorb the literary life from the air, and feel the spiritual glow in all that appeals to the impressible consciousness. I expect to stop a day or two in Albany, and Troy en route home. After December 10, I am free to answer calls for lectures, funerals, etc. Letters and telegrams sent to 170 Liberty street, Fredonia, N. Y., will be likely to find me."

Mr. and Mrs. E. W. Sprague were at Findlay, Ohio, December 1, 2, and 3.

J. Jay Watson writes from New Brighton, Staten Island, N. Y.: "I gave a musical at this retreat today to over 500 old sailors, and a taste of the tones of the Ole Bull Cremona seemed to give the most unbounded joy to the dear old 'salts,' who laughed, cried and would have danced if the old 'sea legs' had been in their pristine condition. Music is truly a great medicine for tired souls. The last of the May Pepper lectures and tests took place at 1254 Bedford avenue, Brooklyn, yesterday afternoon. Judge Abram Dailey presided. The storm did not prevent a big attendance. Mrs. Pepper is certainly a wonder. The dear old Cremona joined in."

M. Robinson writes "The Charity Band of Willing Willing will give a Coffee Klatch and musical, followed by dancing, Thursday evening, December 12, at Crosby's hall, 423 Classon avenue, Brooklyn, N Y. Proceeds for the benefit of their Christmas tree for unfortunate children. Admission twenty-five cents; coffee included. The tree will be given on the afternoon of December 24, at Single Tax hall, 1101 Bedford avenue. Anyone wishing to assist us in making little hearts glad, may bring their donation of dolls and toys, also any article of new or cast-off clothing, at time and place mentioned above."

E. W. Sprague and wife, missionaries for the N. S. A., are free to make camp-meeting engagements for the season of 1902. They are platform test mediums and will follow their lectures with messages and tests. Address Rochester, Ind. Home address, 618 Newland, avenue, Jamestown, N. Y.

Dr. J. O. M. Hewitt has returned from Indianapolis, Ind., where he has been filling a very satisfactory and successful engagement during the month of November, with the First Spiritualist Church of that city, drawing crowded houses and creating a deep and general interest in the minds of church people and the public, as well as Spiritualists. He is now at his home, 498 W. Madison street, Chicago, where he may be addressed for funerals and other spiritual services, or for extended engagements with Spiritualist societies. Men of his ability should be kept constantly employed in the work of expounding and building up Spiritualism.

L. L. Robbins writes: "Should it be my fortune to invent or discover aught of benefit to man, I will not turn it to pecuniary profit, but never perform sufficient manual labor to supply my physical wants."

C. W. Stewart is now located at Rome, Kansas, where he can be addressed for engagements to lecture.

E. J. Bowtell has open dates for camp-meetings in 1902. August 17 engaged at Niantic, Ct. Address Box 82, Olneyville, R. I.

Miss Mattie Woodbury writes that she has been at work in Bay City, Mich., for a month. She goes to Saginaw, Chesaning and other points near. She finds The Progressive Thinker the favorite of all the spiritual papers.

J. M. White writes: "For a short time I will be at 614 W. 4th street, Ottumwa, Ia., and those desiring any work in lectures or tests will receive prompt answers by writing me. Engagements in either Iowa or Illinois acceptable. I expect to remain here until December 10."

Dr. W. O. Knowles writes from Grand Rapids, Mich.: "Rev. D. A. Herrick, of Alliance, Ohio, has just closed a month's engagement with our society, and we can assure the readers of your paper that they will make no mistake in securing his services. His lectures were fine and messages all recognized, with full names and dates of those coming from the unseen. Our audiences grew at every lecture, and we were sorry to part with him on last evening's lecture. He will serve our society again for the month of February, 1902. I have two open dates in December, the 8th and the 22nd, for lectures and messages. Terms liberal. Address me at 247 Coadé avenue, Grand Rapids, Mich."

Accept the Challenge.

The Fort Smith Times has the following:

"We, the undersigned, do hereby accept the challenge of Evangelist S. M. Martin. As he stated in his Friday night discourse that we were 'frauds and liars,' to prove to the public that we can, and stand ready at any and all times, to carry out every particle of our 'standing advertisement,' we are ready to undergo the following test, under the following 'conditions':

First, the said S. M. Martin to place in the hands of the editors of the Daily Times and News Record the sum of $50; the said editors will then select four reputable citizens of Fort Smith, whose word under oath will be accepted by every man, woman and child in Fort Smith, as the truth.

"These four gentlemen shall then meet us at our office and proceed to hide, or bury, within the city limits, the said $50, under the following conditions: To prevent any possibility of confederacy or collusion, there shall be one slip of blank paper placed in the hands of each of the committee and on these slips shall be written the figures 1, 2, 3, 4, then the slips shall be put in a hat, shaken up and one slip drawn out, the person drawing the number from the hat will select the place to bury the 'treasure.' One member of the committee shall remain with us to see that we hold no communication with any one during the progress of the test, the remaining members of the committee shall then proceed to 'hide the treasure,' which shall be secreted in a clean and accessible place. If we fail to find the hidden 'treasure' within ninety minutes from the time we leave the house then Evangelist Martin will be sustained in his challenge made Friday night; if we find the 'treasure' within the specified time, and under the conditions as specified above, then we shall prove to the public that there is truth in the 'spiritual gifts' as mentioned in I. Corinthians, 12:1-11.

"This $50, if we find it, is to go to the Orphans' Home for charity. Our conditions are as fair as man can make them. As we were personally attacked, we have the right to name the conditions. THE CALEFS."

"The Attainment of Womanly Beauty of Form and Features," edited by Albert Turner. This book has for its object the cultivation of personal beauty, based on hygiene and health culture. It is the combined wisdom of twenty physicians and specialists. Every young lady in the land should read it. Every wife should peruse its pages. "MEDICAL MURDER."

Join the National Liberal League.

Reading Mr. Hudson Tuttle's "Medical Murder" (No. 626), depicting the legal right of the privileged medical fraternity to slay the innocents, "licensed by the state," he says: "formed into the most despotic trust that exists;" "support each other against all charges of malpractice."

Why do not you Spiritualists put a stop to "medical murder?" Not numerous enough? Then, why not join our Liberal League? Get all the help you can to gain your rights as healers. "In union there is strength." This is what the doctors discovered years ago, and now they have a "despotic trust." Let us unite to secure "justice for all, privileges for none." This is the purpose of the National Liberal League, organized six weeks ago. I wrote a short letter two weeks ago, which was published in The Progressive Thinker. Perhaps I forgot to invite Spiritualists to join, for I received not one member from that letter.

Perhaps Spiritualists would rather submit to the "tortures of the damned," as Mr. Tuttle forcibly describes the wrongs suffered at the hands of the doctors, than unite with Materialists in keeping church and state separate; securing taxation of church property, etc. As Abraham Lincoln used to say, "For people that like such things I think this is about what they would like!"

I would be glad to receive the names of one hundred Spiritualists within one week as charter members of the National Liberal League. If you do not wish to pay the annual dues of one dollar now, do so when most convenient. Join, and let us help you gain your rights in this world. We are not exclusive, and hope you are not close-communion. Let us unite to obtain justice on earth.

Help us. We will help you—whether there are angels or not. If there are, you will have the joke on us, and we'll join with you in the laugh—at our expense. In the meantime join the National Liberal League, and make each other happier on earth. It is growing rapidly. It is bound to grow whether you join or not; but it will grow better, and so will you, if you unite with us. Send in your names, please, to my address. W. F. JAMIESON,
Secretary N. L. L.

Missionary Mass Meeting at Jackson, Mich.

The Spiritualists of Jackson and vicinity have had a most refreshing season by the visit of the president of our state association and his wife, Mr. and Mrs. E. E. Carpenter, accompanied by Mrs. N. S. Baade, of Detroit, and Mrs. A. L. Coffman, of Grand Rapids. Meetings were held in the Odd Fellows Hall on Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon and evening, and were a great success, both as regards numbers present and the interest and enthusiasm manifested. On Sunday evening half an hour before commencement there was not standing-room in the hall, and many were unable to obtain admittance. The lectures were up-to-date in presentation of the spiritual philosophy in its highest and widest application to the needs of humanity, and were well received by an appreciative and attentive audience. But the messages and descriptions of the spirit friends present called out the sympathy and enthusiasm of the audience.

Mrs. Coffman, Mrs. Baade and Mrs. Carpenter are all well known platform test mediums, and were assisted by Mrs. Jackson, of Chicago, and Mrs. Burland, of Muskegon. Nearly all were recognized, most recipients being complete strangers to the mediums.

Mr. E. E. Carpenter, president of the state association, gave an address on the cause throughout the state, stating the progress that was being made, and how the missionary work was helping to build up old societies and organize new ones all over the state. Mr. Carpenter and his wife are spending the month of November in missionary work without remuneration, and have large audiences wherever they go. On this occasion people came 15 to 20 miles, and in Mr. Cornwell's case, 45 miles to greet Mr. and Mrs. Carpenter, who brought joy and comfort to him four years ago when his daughter passed to spirit life. Arrangements are in progress to have other good speakers and test mediums visit Jackson and carry on the good work. The outlook is encouraging.

We have had practical demonstrations of the value of messages and descriptions along with lectures on the public platform. Seven months ago Mr. Harrison D. Barrett and Mr. B. F. Austin spoke two nights in the Unitarian church, the largest audience being 70. Mr. Barrett spoke against platform messages. There was no enthusiasm. At this time, with good test mediums, the hall was filled to overflowing by large and appreciative audiences.

$10,000 DONATED TO HYPNOTISM

Dr. X. La Motte Sage, a Noted Scientist, Donates $10,000 To Be Used for the Publication and Free Distribution of a Valuable Work on Personal Magnetism and Hypnotic Influence.

Wants to Demonstrate the Practical Value and Power of This New Science in Business, in Society, in the Home, in Politics, in Love, in Diseases, and as a Factor in Influencing and Swaying the Minds of People.

Prominent Business and Professional Men, Ministers of the Gospel and Others Heartily Indorse the Movement—A Noted College Undertakes the Work of Free Distribution.

Any One May Get a Book Absolutely Free So Long as the Edition Lasts and Master the Hidden Mysteries of This Marvelous Power at His Own Home—Many Jealously-Guarded Secrets Made Public.

Carnegie is giving away his fortune for libraries. Dr. X. La Motte Sage proposes to put the most useful book in all libraries free of charge right into the homes of the people. For this purpose he has just donated $10,000, and a big publishing house is busy day and night turning out the books for free distribution. The book Dr. Sage wishes to distribute free of charge is entitled "The Philosophy of Personal Influence." It is heartily indorsed by the ablest business men, ministers, doctors and lawyers of two continents. It is beautifully illustrated with the finest half-tone engravings, and every page is brimful of intensely interesting and practical information. It is a book which should be in every home. It is by far the most remarkable work of the kind that has ever been written, and it has truly created a sensation in the book world.

It tells you how a wonderful woman in England got millions of dollars simply by the exercise of her marvelous hypnotic powers over the lords and millionaires of her country. It explains numerous instances in which people have been secretly and instantaneously controlled by hypnotic influence. It teaches you how to protect yourselves from the use of hypnotic power over you. It tells you how to develop and use your magnetic power so as to wield a wonderful influence over those with whom you come in contact.

Men like Vanderbilt, Morgan, Rockefeller and other millionaires have studied the very methods explained in this book and have used them in their business to pile up millions. This book lays bare secrets in the lives of rich men of which you have never dreamed. It reveals all the hidden mysteries of personal magnetism, hypnotism, magnetic healing, etc., and discloses the real source of power and influence in every walk of life. It contains secret information of inestimable value to every person who wants to succeed in life. Many of the most prominent public men in this country have obtained this book and read every line, and they are daily using its teachings to their own profit and gain.

It explains to you the power by which you may cause yourself and others of all diseases and bad habits without the aid of drugs or medicines. It tells of a secret, instantaneous method by which you may produce a state of insensibility to pain in any part of the body, so that the teeth may be extracted and surgical operations performed without the use of cocaine, ether or anaesthetics of any kind. It gives you the power to induce sleep in yourself or others at any time of the day or night you may desire. It enables you to develop your mental faculties, improve your memory, eradicate disagreeable tempers and habits in children, and to develop within yourself a marvelous magnetic will power so strong and so subtle as to make you practically irresistible. It will give you a force of character of which you have little dreamed, and will truly make you a leader of men. No matter how strong this description may seem, it is not one-half as strong as the marvelous power explained in this wonderful work.

If you have not achieved the success to which your abilities and talents justly entitle you, if you would like to secure a good paying position, obtain an increase in salary, if you care to rise higher in your accepted business or calling, if you desire to wield a greater influence over others, if you care to win the love or friendship of some one you know, or if you long for fame or renown, you should write for a copy of this remarkable book at once.

The following extracts from a few of the letters received from some of the people who have read the book give an idea of its unusual character and great value:

Mrs. Mary Milner, 312 D street, Pueblo, Colo., in a recent letter says: "I was so sick and worried I could not eat or sleep. I wrote you for your free book. I used the methods on myself with wonderful success. To-day I am perfectly well. I would not part with the information you gave me for any money."

Mr. T. L. Lindenstruth, 30 East South street, Wilkesbarre, Pa., says: "Your work on personal magnetism is a fortune to any one starting in life. It is absolutely sure to bring success."

A. J. McGinnis, 60 Ohio street, Allegheny, Pa., says: "When I wrote for your book I was laboring by the day. Now I am managing a business. This is certainly the best proof that could be offered of its great value. I advise every man who wishes to succeed in life to get a copy at once."

G. S. Lincoln, M. D., 101 Crutchfield street, Dallas, Texas, writes: "Your methods of personal influence are marvelous. I have used them on my patients with wonderful results. They cure diseases when medicine and everything else fail."

S. R. Kink, M. D., Gilliam, Ind., writes: "You have sent me the most remarkable book I have truly ever read. By the methods explained in your work headache, backache, rheumatism and other diseases of long standing disappear like magic. Your instruction in personal magnetism is simply grand. It gives one a power and an influence over others which I did not dream it was possible for the average man to acquire. Your book is worth more than gold to any one starting in life. Its value cannot be estimated. My only regret is that it was not in my hands when I was a young man."

The New York Institute of Science has undertaken the free distribution of the book referred to. Big roller presses are running day and night to supply the demand until the $10,000 worth of books are distributed free. On account of the great expense incurred in preparing and printing this book only those are requested to write for free copies who are especially interested and really and truly desire to achieve greater success, obtain more happiness, or in some way better their condition in life. Please do not write through mere curiosity, as the free edition is limited. If you want a book, write to-day, as the copies are going very fast. Never before in the history of the publishing business has there been such a great demand for any book as to-day exists for "The Philosophy of Personal Influence."

Remember, at the present time it will be sent to your address absolutely free, postage paid. Address New York Institute of Science, Department M K 7, 1935 Broadway, New York.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected. HUDSON TUTTLE.

ASPHODEL BLOOMS.

I am now able to inform the subscribers to this long-delayed book of poems, that it will be ready by December 25. It will be beautifully bound, with six full-page, half-tone illustrations, and an elegant gift book for the holidays. The price is $1 postpaid; 75 cents to subscribers. The original announcement, that to subscribers it would be sent, with Mediumship and Its Laws, for $1 postpaid, holds good for all orders sent before December 1. I wish further to thank the numerous friends whose aid so generously given, has enabled me to publish the several works by the subscription plan, and yet more grateful am I for the fraternal words of cheer they have so freely given. It is impossible for me to write a personal response to all, but I assure them that it is not for want of desire to do so.

J. R. Powers: Q. What is the condition of Czolgosz?

A. When the question came, What as to the condition of President McKinley? this one immediately suggested itself, but was put aside until many correspondents repeated it. I asked a spirit friend if he could find that individual and by any means bring him in communication. Several days passed before I received a reply, which was that the messenger had succeeded in his errand so far as finding the one sought, but had not attempted to bring him to me. "What use?" was the reply. "What use? I found him with a large concourse of those kindred in thought. All those who have sacrificed themselves as he believes he has for the cause of liberty; mistaken, blinded, ignorant or inflamed by passions while on earth, they have not changed. They praise each other for the bloody deeds which sent them from earth; they boast of their crimes, and are a central station sending out and receiving messages from those like them on earth life. Really I have not power to go closely into their sphere, yet I approached the one you asked for. I knew him because of the attention paid him by the others, who were inflamed by the influences he brought from earth life, reviving their hatred, regrets and desires. I accosted him and starting up as one awakening from a dream, he said proudly:

"'Yes, I did it. I never denied it. I struck the tyrant down. They could not wring regret or a tear from me, not if they had torn me to tatters. They could not make me betray my comrades; my brothers and sisters. No! no! And then they would rob me of publicity. I wanted the deed told to the world—not for me—not for me—but for a lesson to others. The government is corrupt—d—n the government! All governments are corrupt—all governments! Rulers are the governments—all are tyrants. Kill them all—keep at it till no one dares to rule; then the people will be let alone. Anarchy is full liberty. The anarchist, true, is not afraid of destroying any and all rulers and governments. Some of them denied me out of fear; they said I was a common murderer—at heart they 'all honor me. Not one but would cry bravo, if they dared. Anarchy means destruction of all rulers, all governments, good as well as bad, for the better a government, the worse and more need of being dynamited. The people will bear with a good government—they will not with a bad.

"'It makes me sick to hear of anarchists turning milk-sops and crying out that they believe in peace and law, when our great teachers do not believe in law. Does Emma Goldman teach obedience to law, either of God or man? Every crime comes from cursed laws. Blast the laws and those who made them. I am free now—can speak my mind, nor are the anarchists who are now howling about me as a murderer doing wrong. They are lying because it is best to lie. A lie is better than the truth if it does what the truth won't. A lie may save them and give them a chance to strike home. The governments if they want to exist, must not let an anarchist live. It is deaths or death; anyone can live.

"'Repent! Yes, that I had not a thousand lives to give every one in like manner. Oh, they would rob me of publicity, and their cursed attempt to do so made my deed a thousand times more public. Others will come. My example will not be left unfollowed. Others will come as fearless of consequences as I. There are not only a few, there are thousands to come, and when one of these receives the ballot to do and dare, he will go to his work as the bullet from the gun. He will go. God? Well he did not prevent me in my purpose. If there be a God, I was a chosen instrument for his will. If there be a God, what he wanted done was done, and see! I came to my own—I am to my reward." He laughed bitterly—jeeringly.

"'They destroyed my body, for they would obliterate me. They did not touch me! I am in the minds of all men. A thousand mothers will rear children from that hour like me. They will grow to men to do as I would do.'"

Then the messenger continued: "That last random sentence, 'A thousand mothers will rear children from that hour like me,' contains a terrific prophecy and little-observed truth. At the time of the execution it was exploited in all the newspapers in horrible details, and the thought atmosphere of the world pulsated to the dreadful savagery of legal murder. Many a prospective mother was in the sensitive condition to receive for her unborn child the thought vibrations, and have its nature changed by the psychic food thus supplied. There will be a generation of anarchists, men and women who despise legal restraint, and order; impulsive; ready to rebel, and take things in their own hands. Let it be known that individual or nation cannot be cruel, cannot for a moment yield love for hate, without receiving cruelty, and tenfold hatred—and yet more, that to kill the criminal does not remove him, or prevent him carrying out his desires. Could you come into the sphere of this society of anarchists, you would have this burned into your soul. They are watchful for obedient subjects. They organize strong men who by inflamed speech awaken the most desperate purposes. With this influence some weaker member is hypnotized and sent on his dreadful errand, not knowing, nor caring for the consequences.

"Yet more than this direct method, this Jesuit power—all things to all men—the cause justifying the means—works through impressible writers and editors, to degrade public officers, obstruct the government, and awaken by every means in its power disaffection and resistance. It inflames the working classes against capital, it influences capital to rob labor, for the purpose of holding it up to execration. It is the most dangerous foe to the welfare of this country which has ever confronted it."

Subscriber: Q. Who was Pascal Beverly Randolph?

A. He was one of the most erratic and wonderful of that group which may be designated as Cagliastros of mankind. Although scarcely fifty years of age when he yielded to the depression of adversity, and feeling that the world had no place for him, cut the cord which bound him to it, he had traveled over nearly the whole globe, studied the mystic lore of the East, and written a small library of books. He was born in New York City in 1825, and passed away in 1875. His strange temperament, his erratic flights, his intensity is accounted for by heredity. His mother was a native of Vermont, but mingled French, Indian, English, German and Madagascar blood, which was revealed in his physiognomy. He began life an orphan, begged bread from door to door; was a newsboy and sailor, had little schooling, was self-taught. This composite origin, and want of training accounts for his erratic character, and the wildness of the fancies in which he indulged.

His voluminous writings entertain the lovers of the occult, the weird and fanciful, but cannot be relied on for accuracy, or scientific demonstration. He had a rare eloquence as a speaker and elegance as a writer, qualifications which made him the more dangerous as a teacher of the many questionable doctrines he put forth.

THE USES OF ADVERSITY.

Were life but a broad smooth river
With even and measured flow,
Or a sea with tides unchanging,
That peacefully come and go
Like the swell of a sleeper's bosom
Steady and calm and slow;

Were the winds but fragrant breezes
Wafting us on our way,
Were the skies but seas of splendor
That never grow dim or gray,
We might never win the glory
Of holding a storm at bay.

Did never a tide of passion
Come with its mighty roll,
Stirring up from their caverns
The depths of a human soul,
We might never know the triumph
Of a conquering self-control.

Did we never sit in the darkness,
Straining our aching sight,
Striving to pierce the shadows
Of a dim and sorrowful night,
We might never feel the rapture
That comes with the morning light.

Sad is the mournful midnight,
In its silence black and deep,
When tears wet the sorrowful eyelids
Instead of the dews of sleep,
And the strokes of feverish pulses
Their maddening measures keep.

But out of the rayless midnight,
The day springs forth again;
A calm succeeds the tempest,
The sunshine follows rain.
Joy is the cloud of sorrow,
And pleasure is born of pain.

THE BALLAD OF JUDAS ISCARIOT.

'Twas the body of Judas Iscariot
Lay in the Field of Blood;
'Twas the soul of Judas Iscariot
Beside the body stood.
Black was the earth by night,
And black was the sky;
Black, black were the broken clouds,
Though the red moon went by.

'Twas the body of Judas Iscariot
Strangled and dead lay there;
'Twas the soul of Judas Iscariot
Looked on it in despair.
The breath of the World came and went
Like a sick man's in rest;
Drop by drop on the World's eyes
The dews fell cool and blest.
Then the soul of Judas Iscariot
Did make a gentle moan:
"I will bury underneath the ground
My flesh and blood and bone.
I will bury deep beneath the soil,
Lest mortals look thereon,
And when the wolf and raven come
The body will be gone!
The stones of the field are sharp as steel,
And hard and cold, God wot;
And I must bear my body hence
Until I find a spot."

'Twas the soul of Judas Iscariot,
So grim and gaunt and gray,
Raised the body of Judas Iscariot
And carried it away.
And as he bare it from the field
Its touch was cold as ice,
And the ivory teeth within the jaw
Rattled aloud like dice.
As the soul of Judas Iscariot
Carried its load of pain,
The Eye of Heaven, like like a lanthorn's eye,
Opened and shut again.
Half he walked, and half he seemed Lifted on the cold wind;
He did not turn, for chilly hands
Were pushing from behind.

The first place that he came unto
It was the open wold,
And underneath were prickly whins,
And a wind that blew so cold.
The next place that he came unto
It was a stagnant pool,
And when he threw the body in
It floated light as wool.
He drew the body on his back,
And it was dripping chill,
And the next place he came unto
Was a Cross upon a hill—
A Cross upon the windy hill,
And a cross on either side;
Three skeletons that swung thereon
Who had been crucified,
And on the middle cross-bar sat
A white Dove slumbering;
Dim it sat in the dim light,
With its head beneath its wing.
And underneath the middle Cross
A grave yawned wide and vast,
But the soul of Judas Iscariot
Shivered and glided past.
The fourth place that he came unto
It was the Brig of Dread,
And the great torrents rushing down
Were deep and swift and red.
He dared not fling the body in
For fear of faces dim,
And arms were waved in the wild water
To thrust it back to him.

'Twas the soul of Judas Iscariot
Turned from the Brig of Dread,
And the dreadful foam of the wild water
Had splashed the body red.
For days and nights he wandered on
Upon an open plain.
And the days went by like blinding mist,
And the night like rushing rain.
For days and nights he wandered on,
All through the Wood of Woe.
And the nights went by like moaning wind,
And the days like drifting snow.

'Twas the soul of Judas Iscariot
Came with a weary face—
Alone, alone, and all alone,
Alone in a lonely place.
He wandered east, he wandered west,
And heard no human sound;
For months and years, in grief and tears,
He wandered round and round;
For months and years, in grief and tears,
He walked the silent night.
Then the soul of Judas Iscariot
Perceived a far-off light—
A far-off light across the waste
As dim as dim might be,
That came and went like the lighthouse gleam
On a black night at sea.

'Twas the soul of Judas Iscariot
Crawled to the distant gleam,
And the rain came down, and the rain was blown
Against him with a scream.
For days and nights he wandered on,
Pushed on by hands behind,
And the days went by like black, black rain,
And the nights like rushing wind.

'Twas the soul of Judas Iscariot
Strange, and sad, and tall,
Stood all alone at dead of night
Before a lighted hall:
And the wold was white with snow,
And his footmarks black and damp,
And the ghost of the silvern moon arose
Holding her yellow lamp;
And the icicles were on the eaves,
And the walls were deep with white,
And the shadows of the guests within
Passed on the window light.
The shadows of the wedding guests
Did strangely come and go,
And the body of Judas Iscariot
Lay stretched along the snow;

The body of Judas Iscariot
Lay stretched along the snow.
'Twas the soul of Judas Iscariot
Ran swiftly to and fro;
To and fro, and up and down,
He ran so swiftly there,
As round and round the frozen pole
Glideth the lean white bear.

'Twas the Bridegroom sat at the table-head,
And the lights burnt bright and clear:
"Oh, who is that," the Bridegroom said,
Whose weary feet I hear?"
'Twas one looked from the lighted hall,
And answered soft and low:
"It is a wolf runs up and down,
With a black track in the snow."
The Bridegroom in his robe of white
Sat at the table-head:
"Oh, who is that who moans without?"
The blessed Bridegroom said.
'Twas one who looked from the lighted hall,
And answered fierce and low:
"'Tis the soul of Judas Iscariot, Gliding to and fro."

'Twas the soul of Judas Iscariot
Did hush itself and stand,
And saw the Bridegroom at the door
With a light in his hand.
The Bridegroom stood in the open door,
And he was clad in white.
And far within the Lord's Supper
Was spread so broad and bright.
The Bridegroom shaded his eyes and looked,
And his face was bright to see:
"What dost thou here at the Lord's Supper,
With thy body's sins?" said he.

'Twas the soul of Judas Iscariot
Stood black, and sad, and bare:
"I have wandered many nights and days;
There is no light elsewhere."
'Twas the wedding guests cried out within,
And their eyes were fierce and bright:
"Scourge the soul of Judas Iscariot Away into the night!"
The Bridegroom stood in the open door,
And he waved hands still and slow,
And the third time that he waved his hands
The air was thick with snow;
And of every flake of falling snow,
Before it touched the ground,
There came a dove, and a thousand doves
Made sweet sound.

'Twas the body of Judas Iscariot
Floated away full fleet,
And the wings of the doves that bare it off
Were like its winding-sheet.
'Twas the Bridegroom stood at the open door,
And beckoned, smiling sweet;
'Twas the soul of Judas Iscariot
Stole in, and fell at his feet.

"The Holy Supper is spread within,
And the many candles shine,
And I have waited long for thee
Before I poured the wine!"
The supper-wine is poured at last,
The lights burn bright and fair,
Iscariot washes the Bridegroom's feet,
And dries them with his hair.

Asphodel Blooms and Other Offerings.

The many friends of Mrs. Emma Rood Tuttle will be pleased to learn that a new volume of her poems has been compiled and published, under the title of Asphodel Blooms and Other Offerings.

It is in the nature of Spiritualism to be poetic; all the great poets that have graced the literature of the world, no matter what their country, race or religion, have been Spiritualistic, and in some cases avowed believers in Spiritualism.

Mrs. Tuttle's poems are imbued with the aroma of Spiritualism, even when not ostensibly devoted to that purpose.

Readers of the Spiritual press, who have become familiar with her contributions, will recognize in this volume many of her finest poetic effusions, which they will be glad to possess in this tasty and convenient form for preservation and reference.

A notable and excellent quality of Mrs. Tuttle's poems, in addition to their spiritual tone, is their fine spirit of humanitarianism, which is wholly commendable as well from an esthetic, spiritual and ethical point of view. This is not the least among the excellent features that commend the author's effusions to the high regard of Spiritualists. Her kindly humanitarian spirit does not confine its scope to the human race, but extends in rich fullness to those who cannot speak for themselves except in mute appeals and the pathetic expression of sweet, sad, pleading eyes, asking for man's kindly treatment and protection. In this respect, there are lessons in prose and verse, in this book, which will make mankind the better for learning, tending to cultivate a high and noble sentiment responsive to all humaner instincts and promptings. Mrs. Tuttle's rhymes and brief, expressive essays in this direction are worthy of all praise, and she may congratulate herself on ethically good work well done, in a field where such work is sadly needed.

The temptation is strong to select samples from Mrs. Tuttle's repertoire of verse, but we prefer that readers shall enjoy the pleasure of making their own choice.

In the World Celestial.

"In the World Celestial," by Dr. T. A. Bland, is a most valuable contribution to the literature of Spiritualism. It reads like a beautiful romance, and skeptics will so regard it, but the author says that it is a true record of the actual and most wonderful experiences of a well-known literary man for whose veracity he personally vouches. Accepting it as true, it verifies the proverb, "truth is stranger than fiction," and the love romances of earth are tame as compared to those enjoyed in the celestial world.

The heroine of the book, Pearl, passes from earth while yet a girl, leaving her sweetheart, Paul, to mourn her as dead. Many years pass. Paul becomes a scientist and literary man, and he is an agnostic. He is then induced to investigate spirit phenomena. Pearl appears to him. He sees her and talks with her. His skepticism gives way, and his psychic powers unfold. Pearl now has him entranced by spirit scientists, and leaving his physical body he visits her in the celestial world, returning after ten days with perfect memory of all that he saw and heard in that realm of the immortals. With Pearl as his guide he visits great cities, attends grand receptions and listens to lectures, sermons and speeches by famous men of the past. After an extended tour through the heavens they visit and inspect the hells, or purgatories. His descriptions of heaven are transcendently beautiful, and those of the hells are realistic and thrilling to the last degree.

With Pearl still as his guide, he spends the tenth day in a visit to earth, as a spirit. He attends two seances, witnessing trance control and also materialization from the spirit view-point. This is very interesting.

Rev. H. W. Thomas, D. D., the world famous liberal preacher, has written a brilliant introduction to the book, in which he says, "That the beautiful story given in this book, is in substance true, the author believes, and those who have known him longest and best esteem him most for his high intellectuality, integrity and nobility of purpose."

Dr. Thomas further says: "It is not unreasonable to believe, and not unscriptural to say, that those in spirit life minister to those yet in the body. There should in thought and feeling be no great separation, no impenetrable wall, between the living and the dead, or those who have passed through death to the life beyond. The venerable and learned Dr. Nash, of the Methodist church, told me twenty-five years ago that the time was not distant when it would be no more strange for people to say they had met persons from the other world, than that they had seen some one return from a journey to Europe and Asia."

The book is printed in fine style, bound in best cloth, contains one hundred and sixty pages. Price $1.00. Address Plymouth Publishing Company, 161 South Hoyne avenue, Chicago, Ill.

SPIRIT LIFE, NOW.

There Is Work to Do In Heaven and On Earth.

Dear Brothers and Sisters in Earth Life:—So many of you have written to my medium, asking that I should write to you again through the columns of the ever Progressive Thinker, that with the kind consent of its genial editor, I will do so, for there is much thought in my mind that I would like to pass on for your kindly consideration.

We are here in this life, both material and spiritual, to help one another, and I wish to do my share of the work. This is all the same world, and there are two firmaments. One is called heaven, and the other earth. There is material matter and spiritual matter. The spiritual develops out of the material, and is in fact refined matter. The spirit properly developed in earth life, at transition ascends to heaven, where none can enter but those who are worthy. But God's judgment is not like mankind's, there is mercy in it for all.

"How sad it would be, if when thou didst call,
All hopeless and unforgiven,
The angel that stands at the beautiful gate,
Should answer, no room in heaven."

There is room in heaven for all, but many are earth-bound spirits. Their name is legion, and when we say the children of earth, we mean all classes of earth spirits, visible and invisible to the material eyes. In heaven we find a counterpart of earth-life on a spiritual plane, where Good reigns supreme. God is good and good is God; all good is God, and God is represented in many exalted personages, whose aid you can obtain by asking for it. 'Seek, and ye shall find." It is beautiful to be at home with God. Let every one of my brothers and sisters travel in that direction and aid their fellow travelers all they can. Help others, is the magic key that opens the door of heaven. Help your fellow-mortals both materially and spiritually, and above all, help your earth-bound spirit brothers and sisters to discard their love for evil, and ascend to heaven, where no evil can enter. No drunkard in the flesh or in the spirit can enter the kingdom of heaven. No murderer, no thief and no liar; all these and kindred evils will have been overcome and outgrown by the spirit who can ascend and enter heaven.

But there is a second death—the annihilation of the sin-stricken, diseased spirit, who cannot be healed. But many can be saved by the united effort of spirits from heaven, and mortals in earth life, and that is the work in which we are engaged.

We would advise our brother and sis-Spiritualists to stop being guided by messages from earth-bound spirits, in the flesh or out of it, for their spiritual development, but seek the highest good, in soul aspirations for the truth, and in the silence by the mighty power of good thou shalt be saved.

We labor for the universal brotherhood of mankind, tugging at the weed of selfishness, hoping to pull it out roots and all, and casting it aside, to die a natural death for the want of nourishment. Earth is a large garden, in which are many weeds. All humanity are the gardeners, and each one should be an industrious worker, pulling out the weeds and cultivating the good plants so that you may have a beautiful garden in which to live and grow.

Intemperance not only in drinking intoxicating liquors, but in gluttonous eating, in dress, and house decorations also, is among the greatest evils humanity has to contend with. I would work now, not for total abstinence, but for temperance in all things. I have recently made the acquaintance of a spirit, loving, refined, cultivated, named Martha Abbott (she requested me to give her name), who was earth-bound, because of her ardent love for her husband, who is in the material form. Hers, as she now realizes it, was a selfish love, and it retarded both her own and her husband's spiritual advancement. Possessing all other requisites, there was only one thing that prevented her from ascending to heaven, and that was her strong attachment to her husband and his environments, and although repeatedly urged by loving kindred to go with them, her unfailing answer was, "No, I do not care to go until Henry can go with me." But I am happy to say that now her vision is enlarged. She has received the quickening of the spirit that she lacked, and her soul is in a glow with ardent desires to be in the work, and already she has been instrumental in releasing many earth-bound spirits and guided them home to heaven. And I have reason to believe that her husband realizes her advancement, and his spirit is uplifted by it, and I hope, if he reads this message, that he will acknowledge it, and thereby render good assitance to a noble cause.

To the sister in Paris, France, who so kindly said she wished I would write again through these columns, as she found my words helpful, I will say that she has attracted a band of spirit workers to her who will aid her in freeing those who are near and dear to her, from the influence of mischief-loving, earth-bound spirits, who are not intentionally wicked or malicious, but they love to have a jolly time, and are attracted to the young whom they inspire to act as they would not if it were not for the unseen influences around them.

We hope to be able to change these conditions and render your position more pleasant and much happier.

To the dear sister at Jerseyville, Ill., Maria F——, and Sister A. L. H., of Henryville, Ind., Brother Dorman, of Caldwell, Idaho, and many others, you see I bear you all in mind, and that to bless, for every good thought we have for each other is a blessing and aids us on our journey of life. No one ever gets so high that they do not need the blessing of good thoughts. So dear brothers and sisters in earth life and everywhere, help me by sending me good thoughts, and I will do the same by you.

Now I wish to organize a Frances E. Willard circle, and all you who wish to join it please send your names and addresses to our medium and we will correspond further about it, but I warn you in the beginning that if you join my circle I have work for you to do, and plenty of it, but it will mostly be of a mental order and will not interfere with your material duties in the least. Now, with much love, I am,

Your sister,
FRANCES E. WILLARD.

LIFE BEYOND DEATH

Being a Review of

The World's Beliefs on the Subject, a Consideration of Present Conditions of Thought and Feeling,

Leading to the Question as o Whether It Can Be Demonstrated as a Fact.—To Which Is Added an Appendix Containing Some Hints as to Personal Experiences and Opinions.

BY MINOT J. SAVAGE, D. D.

8vo, Cloth, 342 Pages.

After a review of the beliefs held in the past concerning life beyond death, Dr. Savage takes up the present conditions of belief and considers the agnostic reaction from the extreme "other-worldliness" which it replaced, which was in turn followed by the Spiritualistic reaction against agnosticism. He points out the doubts concerning the doctrine of immortality held by the churches and the weakness of the traditional creeds and the loosening of their hold upon the people. He then considers the probabilities of a future life, probabilities which, as he admits, fall short of demonstration. The volume includes a consideration of the work of the Society for Psychical Research and also an appendix giving some of the author's own personal experiences in this line. Dr. Savage holds, as a provisional hypothesis, that continued existence is demonstrated, and that there have been at least some well authenticated communications from persons in the other life. The chief contents of the volume are as follows:

Primitive Ideas—Ethnic Beliefs—The Old Testament and Immortality—Paul's Doctrine of Death and the Other Life—Jesus and Immortality—The Other World and the Middle Ages—Protestant Belief Concerning Death and the Life Beyond—The Agnostic Reaction—The Spiritualistic Reaction—The World's Condition and Needs as to Belief in Immortality—Probabilities Which Fall Short of Demonstration—The Society for Psychical Research and the Immortal Life—Possible Conditions of Another Life—Some Hints as to Personal Experiences and Opinions.

THE BEAUTIFUL SOUVENIR VOLUME,

By A. LEAH UNDERHILL,
(Of the Fox Family.)

The Missing Link in Modern Spiritualism.

Thirty-three chapters, 477 pages, superbly printed, and bound in colors and gold, 15 illustrations, 5 steel engraved portraits of the celebrated Fox Family, a full page engraving of the old house at Hydesville, which to this day, by the act of its wealthy and respected owner, Artemas Hyde, Esq., bears the inscription, "Here Spiritualism Originated in 1848."

A complete history of the initiation of the movement known as Modern Spiritualism, from the epochal period which dates from March 31, 1848. Since that day, starting from a small country village in western New York, Spiritualism has made its way against tremendous obstacles around the civilized globe.

Only a limited number of copies of this rare book, now out of print, are to be had, and these can be obtained only at this office. Those who remit at once will receive a copy, post paid, at the GREATLY REDUCED PRICE OF $1.

Note.—By failure in 1885 to complete contract with the author, a large portion of the edition was left unbound, and so remained for a number of years, when they were rescued and bound at additional cost, hence this valuable contribution to the cause of Spiritualism was not properly presented to the Spiritualistic public, and a host of investigators have not had the opportunity of securing a copy until the present time. Do not fail to send for a copy at once. J. R. FRANCIS,

The Noted Chronist,

Will on October 15, open his new Boston office, at 1087 Boylston street, where he will be pleased to meet all who may call between the hours of 10 a. m. and 2 p. m. The wonderful work in healing the sick that Dr. Watkins is accomplishing is indeed most astounding; his patients live to testify to his wonderful powers as a healer. For the last year his work has been most wonderful. He says himself that his cures this year have been more than ever before in numbers, as he confined himself to only 30 new patients a month. Dr. Watkins attends personally to each case, and therefore he can do better work than if he had a great many assistants; no staff of visible helpers are in his office to annoy and suggest this and that. He knows what is the trouble with each patient, and knows the right specific to give. He prepares and puts up all of his medicine, and has no help in his medical treatments that is visible help. Write him to-day, and by return mail you will receive the diagnose. No charge made for diagnosing your case. Send age, sex and leading sympton. C. E. BATH, M'gr.

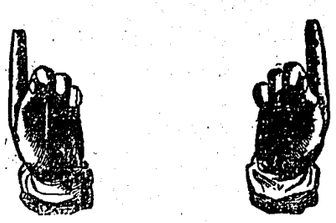
? ARE YOU SICK ?

—IF SO—

Does Your Doctor Understand Your Case?

Are You Getting Better?

If you are not getting better write today to Dr. C. E. WATKINS, Boston, Mass., and write him just your condition financially, and he will make his price for treatment within your reach. He is treating a great many cases free; others he charges a light fee.



He makes no charge whatever for Diagnosis.

If You Are Sick

Why not write him today, and no matter who has failed to help you, to consult him COSTS NOTHING.

Try DR. WATKINS.

Let him diagnose your case, and then it will help you to decide who knows best what is the matter with you. Send all letters to 1087 Boylston St., Boston, Mass.

DR. C. E. WATKINS,

The Wonderful

CHRONIST.

John King, M. D., the great writer and authority on Chronic Disease, says that a chronist is one who cures chronic disease. This being the case, then Dr. Watkins is certainly a chronist, because he CURES chronic disease. Does not doctor, mend or patch up, but cures. Do you desire to be cured? Let us reason together. You have been suffering for years trying this "doctor" and that "physician," and in spite of strong, drastic drugs given to you in toxic doses, you still live. Well this fact should teach you that nature is stronger than disease. This being the case, now don't you think if some one who has been a closer student of nature than you have, should teach you what nature wants you to do to get well, that it would help you to recover your health. And then again, if you should place yourself in the hands of a chronist who uses only nature's remedies and laws to cure disease, don't you think you would have a better chance to get well? Let us see what Dr. Watkins says about nature being the real physician. Let us see what a Chronist who cures chronic disease says. Remember, kind friend, these words are the words of a regular graduate of medicine, but who was never guilty of trying to make nature obey the medical books and the opinions of medical men, but are the words of one who is now only a Student of Nature.

In reality, we can cure nothing; we can only remove the offending cause while nature performs a cure, and, therefore, lay it down as a fundamental maxim in medicine, that all the physician can do is to act as a servant or handmaid to nature.

The author of the "Medical Sketches," remarks in relation to this subject: "The ancients not only observed the effects of that instinct by which brutes are directed to certain plants for relief when they are unwell, and then applied them to the complaints of men, but they also attended with diligence to the manner in which nature, when left entirely to herself, relieved or threw off diseases. They perceived that certain disorders were carried of by spontaneous vomitings, others by looseness, and others by augmented perspiration; and having thus learned how diseases were cured by nature, whenever her powers seemed too weak and tardy, then and then only, they ventured to assist her by art.

"Here it is worthy of observation that although that sensation or instinct by which some animals are prompted to select particular vegetables for the removal of disorders, is not given in so strong or particular a degree to man, yet nature often directs him also, though in a more general way, to the best method of relieving his complaints. In fevers, the patient generally has a desire for cooling, light accescent drinks, and dislikes those which are of a heavier and more heating nature; he covets juicy, ripe fruit of various kinds, and nauseates animal food; a free stream of air, and a spacious, cool bed-chamber are equally salutary and agreeable to him, while confined air and a small, heated room are pernicious and oppressive. In those instances, what the sick person shows an aversion to, has a tendency to promote the disease; and what he relishes, has an effect in abating its violence.

"Other instances of the same kind might be enumerated; I will confine myself to one which I have frequently had occasion to observe:

"Toward the end of very bad putrid fevers, when the patient, exhausted by the violence and length of the disease, lay constantly on his back, had continual startings in the tendons of the wrists; his lips and teeth being covered with a black crust; his tongue trembling, and with difficulty held out; the pulse weak and quick; in this deplorable condition, when the patient seemed insensible to everything else, he rejected, with every mark of aversion that was in his power, medicines of every kind; but upon his lips and tongue being moistened with wine, he sucked it in greedily, and was soon cured." This doctrine is further exemplified by the writings of Dr. Hillary, who states in his secret of curing diseases, by adopting a better system, that, "by accurately observing all the motions, endeavors, and indications of nature to carry off and cure disease—and by observing by what critical evacuations she does at last cast off the morbid matter which caused them, and so restores health—we may, by the same method of reasoning, know both the methods and the means we should use to assist nature in producing those salutary effects. If we avoid all hypothetical reasoning, and by thus observing, following, and assisting nature, agreeably to her indications, our practice will always be more satisfactory and successful.

"The human body is so wisely and wonderfully formed, that whenever any noxious matter is got into it that would be injurious or destructive, we may observe that it always so irritates, stimulates, and offends nature, that she always exerts her power, or the vis vitae, to throw it off. And she acts with great regularity, order and uniformity in her endeavors to expel the offending matter out the body; and by carrying of the disease, restores health and preserves life.

"And thus, by observing, investigating, and truly knowing the diseases and their causes, and justly reasoning therefrom, we shall know when to assist nature according to her indications; and in this is contained the chief part of medical knowledge, and the true scientific part of medical art. And when we shall thus have learned nature, by observing her laws and indications, we may reasonably hope to render the theory and practice of physic beneficial to mankind." Try our method. Send age, sex and leading symptom. DR. C. E. WATKINS.

LAKE HELEN CAMP.

Third and Fourth Excursions to Florida.

The boom at Lake Helen has begun. A number of people have already arrived at this genial winter home. One-half of the first floor of the Apartment House has been engaged.

Corresponding Secretary, Mrs. J. D. Palmer, is busy answering many letters of inquiry about the coming meeting. Mr. and Mrs. Palmer have arrived at Lake Helen, and all letters to the corresponding secretary should be addressed there.

Mr. and Mrs. Lee Morse have opened the hotel dining-rooms and are catering for the arriving guests.

Mrs. Mary Northup resumes again the management of the rest of the hotel. The Morse and Northup combination assures a good home for the guests.

Mrs. Thompson has settled down for the winter in the Budington cottage, and expects her friend from Cincinnati, Mrs. Eva Glenn Keck, to join her early in December.

The Lly Dale party have arrived, including beside those above mentioned, Mrs. Sage and Mrs. Coburn.

A. A. Butler, of Ohio, with a party, will go to Lake Helen early in December.

There is much inquiry to know if Mrs. J. Clegg Wright will accompany her husband to Lake Helen this winter. The campers will be delighted to give them a hearty welcome and a housewarming when they are settled in his unique cottage.

Mrs. Dr. Brigham, of Fitchburg, will go by rail early in December.

H. M. Clark has gone and will assist Mrs. Brigham in renting rooms in Brigham Hall.

President Bond and wife expect to go to Lake Helen the first week in December.

C. D. Mathewson, of Vermont, and C. Hagen, of New York, sailed for Lake Helen, November 29.

The speakers engaged for the season thus far are J. Clegg Wright, Carrie E. S. Twing and W. F. Peck. Nellie C. Mosier is engaged as platform test medium. Other speakers and mediums may be announced later. The meeting begins February 2 and closes March 16.

Mrs. Twing has recovered from her late illness and is filling her engagements.

Those coming to camp should notify A. M. Spencer, Lake Helen, Fla., and he will meet them at the station, to convey them and baggage to the camp.

Mr. and Mrs. J. D. White have opened their cottage. Mr. White's health is about the same as it was last spring.

Mrs. Still, of Boston, is stopping with Mrs. Philbrook.

Mrs. Hall is in the Apartment House.

Mrs. Francis' new home is very cozy.

Several hotel guests have arrived.

There was a white frost, Nov. 16, but no serious damage resulted.

The orange crop is beginning to move.

Mrs. Myers was lately called to Tennessee by the illness and transtion of her brother-in-law, Mr. Bosworth, who was a resident of the camp three years ago.

Mrs. Stevens and niece are dwelling in the Stevens cottage.

The addition to the Webster Hotel will not be ready for guests this season.

Mr. and Mrs. Bedell have returned, bringing a niece.

Dr. O. B. Webster's child has recovered from her late illness.

Those who go by rail from the Middle West, should write for discount rates to W. C. Rinearson, Gen. Pass. Agent Queen & Crescent Route, Cincinnati, O.

Buy all your tickets via Florida East Coast R. R. from Jacksonville. This route takes you through St. Augustine, Ormund, Daytona and New Smyrna, and allows stop-overs at all these places without extra fare.

Those stopping at Jacksonville, will ELEVEN

"Who are These Spiritualists and What Is Spiritualism?" A pamphlet of 40 pages by Dr. J. M. Peebles, the well-known author. Price 15 cents. For sale at this office.

Good News for the Afflicted.

CONSULTATION AND ADVICE ABSOLUTELY FREE.

The Renowned Dr. Peebles with His Able Staff of Assistants Has Originated a System of Psychic, Hygienic, and Medical Treatments That is Curing Thousands That Were Called Incurable.

DR. J. M. PEEBLES.

DR. PEEBLES, the Grand Old Man of Battle Creek, Michigan, so well known throughout the world as an authority on Psychic Phenomena and the application of the Psychic Science in Curing Diseases, has, with a corps of able assistants, so perfected a system of curing chronic and so-called "incurable" cases that almost every disease known to man yields promptly and permanently when placed in their hands. Do not despair if other physicians and other methods have failed in your case, for they have on file thousands of letters from patients telling of their wonderful recovery under their care after years of unsuccessful treatment from the best physicians of the world. Geo. H. Weeks, of Cleveland, O., sends heartfelt thanks for restoration to health after suffering from nervous prostration and insomnia for years; he says he now enjoys excellent health and restful sleep every night. Mrs. J. A. Rust, of Itasca, Minn., cured of uric acid poisoning in two months' treatment, writes: "I am better than in years, and each day brings new health and strength. I will refer all ailing ones to you." Mary A. Earl, Crawford, Mich., suffering from pronounced female difficulties and kidney disease, says: "I took your treatment three months and it has been a success in my case. I am indeed grateful to you for my recovery." C. E. Davis, Woodman, N. H., who suffered all the miseries of a dyspeptic, writes that as the result of Dr. Peebles' treatment, he had not missed a meal since last March. D. W. Buddingman, of Del Norte, Colo., writing Sept. 30, after a three months' course: "When I began treatment with Dr. Peebles' Institute of Health I was a cripple, unable to walk but little with a cane. Now I am able to walk with ease. Some days ten or fifteen miles. I can hardly find words to express my gratitude as I had tried everything I could hear of and got no relief."

If you are in poor health, no matter how long you have suffered or what your complaint is just write the Doctors a plain truthful letter about your condition and they will confidentially consider the same and send you FREE OF CHARGE a full diagnosis of your case, together with valuable literature, explaining fully this grand science and their wonderful methods of treatment which gives hope to all the afflicted, Special advice in your case which in itself would be worth more to you than countless sums of money, for health is above all price. DISTANCE NO BARRIER. It matters not how far you may live from them their methods will restore you, for it is an ideal home treatmenthat can be successfully taken in your own home without detention from your daily duties or the knowledge of anyone. The founder of this Institute spent over fifty years in study and investigation in perfecting this method, and it is, without doubt, the most wonderful and effective form of treatment ever discovered by man. IT IS A COMBINING OF THE MENTAL WITH THE PHYSICAL, THE PSYCHIC WITH THE MEDICAL AND HYGIENIC, A SYSTEM OFTEN ATTEMPTED IN THE PAST BUT NEVER BEFORE PERFECTED, ABSOLUTELY THE BEST THAT SCIENCE CAN PRODUCE is brought into your own home and at a cost within the reach of all, for the Doctors charge nothing whatever for advice and counsel and only a moderate charge to cover actual cost of remedies used in preparation of the medical part of the treatment. It is a greater pleasure to the Doctors to spread their GRAND METHOD and restore the sick and teach them how to stay cured than be possessed of great riches. If your health is poor, no matter whether you have suffered years or only a few weeks, write at once for their diagnosis of your case and literature disclosing the grandest system of treatment ever discovered. PASSED TO SPIRIT LIFE.

[Obituaries to the extent of ten lines only will be inserted free. All in excess of ten lines will be charged at the rate of fifteen cents per line. About seven words constitute one line.]

Passed to spirit life, from his home in Milan, Ohio, Nov. 17, Alonzo Mann, aged 58 years. Mr. Mann has been a Spiritualist from childhood. He leaves one son. The writer and daughter, Martha, were called to officiate at the funeral. R. N. WILLCOX.
Avery, Ohio.

Mr. Harvey Rickard was born in New York, in 1816. He passed to spirit life from his home, near Union City, Mich., October 1, 1901, where he had resided for fifty years. Funeral services were conducted by Mrs. Emily D. King, of Butler, Mich. ***

Mary Emeline Keller, infant daughter of William and Ina Keller, of Butler, Mich., was born July 26, 1901, and passed to spirit life Sept. 16. The funeral was conducted by Mrs. E. D. King, of Butler. ***

Mrs. Emma F. Williams, 3262 Cottage Grove avenue, passed to spirit life, November 26. She had nearly completed 49 years of earthly life. She was not only a Spiritualist, but through her own powers as a medium often came in touch with intelligences of the higher life. Her family accept her transition philosophically, as during her long illness she had often expressed her desire to be at rest, and they are comforted by that philosophy which declares there is no death. Brief services conducted by the writer at the undertaking rooms of Boydston Brothers, preceded the interment at Oakwood.
W. C. HODGE.

Mrs. Anna P. Cushman, of Breedsville, Mich., passed to the spiritual expression of life, Nov. 25, aged 68. She was a pioneer Spiritualist, a woman of sterling character, one who always looked upon the bright side of life, and whose whole life was spent in cheerful and loving service for others. Funeral services, conducted by the writer, were held in the Methodist church, which was filled to repletion with her many friends. The surviving members of the family are comforted with that consolation that a knowledge of Spiritualism can only bring. W. C. HODGE.

"The Religion of the Future." By S. Weil. This is a work of far more than ordinary power and value, by a bold, untrammeled thinker. Spiritualists who love deep, clear thought, reverent for truth alone, will be pleased with it, and well repaid by its perusal. For sale at this office. Price, cloth $1; paper, 50 cents.

"Our Bible: Who Wrote It? When? Where? How? Is It Infallible? A Voice from the Higher Criticism. A Few Thoughts on Other Bibles." By Moses Hull. Of especial value and interest to Spiritualists. For sale at this office. Price $1.

"Harmonies of Evolution. The Philosophy of Individual Life, Based Upon Natural Science, as Taught by Modern Masters of the Law." By Florence Huntley. A work of deep thought, carrying the principles of evolution into new fields. Cloth, $2. For sale at this office.

TO SPIRITUALISTS.

The Progressive Thinker in its issue of October 26, very kindly printed the address delivered by the undersigned at the N. S. A. annual convention in Washington. Following out a suggestion made to me, I have sent a great many copies of the address to Spiritualists who in turn have passed them out to Liberalists and members of churches. The reports thus far show that the address is going to be an excellent missionary document. Hoping this is true, I have, therefore, concluded to reproduce the address in pamphlet form, and will send to any Spiritualist, without charge, as many copies as he thinks he could use. Please address me at Lima, Ohio. JAMES B. TOWNSEND.

—THE—
Christs of the Past and Present.
By MOSES HULL,
A comparison of the Christ work or Mediumship of Biblical Messiahs and the conditions they required, with similar manifestations in Modern Spiritualism. This is a good work to study for arguments with which to meet the very common orthodox question, "Why do you always require conditions for your spiritual manifestations?" Cloth bound, 35 cents; paper 25 cents. For sale at this office.

Were You Born Under a Lucky Star?

THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER

SPIRITUALISM—Progress, the Universal Law of Nature; Thought, the Solvent of Her Problems.—SPIRITUALISM

VOL. 25. CHICAGO, ILL., DEC. 14, 1901. NO. 629.

ATHEISM, THEISM AND MODERN IDOLATRY.

Americans are a strange, rationalistic, questioning people. The question was asked why certain unpopular theories of the universe should implicate character? Why one theory more than another? Why is there a presumption in favor of a Theist or a Polytheist, and a presumption against the Atheist? "Plain speaking is my trade"—so let us speak plainly.

There is a lurking conviction that the Atheist is one who, whatever he may say, has no belief in living deity. He does not believe that there is any infinite intelligence or will above man's, anywhere in the universe. He does not stand with bended or uncovered head in presence of something that in grandeur, beauty, nobleness, sacredness and loveliness transcends himself altogether, in kind and substance as well as in degree. He neither trembles nor exults in presence of the Eternal Truth.

Aspiration, worship, trust, submission, longing, hope are really foreign to him, whether as practices or emotions. That he is self-centered and self-circumferenced, bounded and determined by his own individuality; that he swings about in his own narrow orbit, wholly unimpressed and unswayed by the glorious orbs about him. He spins on his own pivot, too much absorbed in his private affairs to heed what goes on either beneath him or above him. He thinks only of his own importance, comfort, happiness; he seems not to be aware that anything claims his reverence, his devotion, or his fear. He appears as a solitary, kindless, aweless, soulless being who whirls away in the dark, himself darkening with that inner darkness which is the very darkness itself.

So he was pictured by a divine in New York City some years since. Now if Atheism really imports this, it is no wonder that men abhor the name of it and employ their utmost ingenuity in escaping from its breath. It is odious indeed.

In contrast with this, we may place the conception of the Living God, as he is spiritually perceived and reasoned to be, by the Cosmic Theist.

The Supreme Power, the creative mind, the originating will, is affirmed to be Light. Light within and Light without.

Whatever this Power of Being is, it is as active to-day, in all ways as active, as it ever was since time began; there has been no moment of suspended animation; the same things are produced by the same agencies. The law is the blending of essences extracted from previous formations.

The most luminous suggestions of the Living God are given by the scientific men who tell us of the processes of nature in the material world. The astronomer unrolls the chart of the heavens. The geologist deciphers the record of the rocks. The naturalist explains the plan of the plants. The anatomist takes to pieces the frame of man and shows how the history of the past of the planet in written into the body of man as he is to-day.

With us it is a matter, not of conjecture, but of actual knowledge, accepted by all who have given thought to the matter, that the God of Nature, the Primal Soul, has never been more alive than he is at this moment.

Clairvoyant perception shows the cosmic soul to be an inner sphere of light, surrounded by a hollow sphere of light, the rays of both blending or wafting together and then apart as in a breathing.

At a seance held by Henry Kiddle, A. M., the spirit of Isaac Newton was asked: "What is human science compared to the wisdom of a spirit in the higher spheres?" The following was the response:

"My friends, the wisdom of God passeth your understanding; but this I can say, that as a man has a mind to use according to his will, so also has a spirit this power; and as a man comprehends that he is merely a gifted being descended from the Righteous One, be he talented in science, or I might say, has he strength in any direction beyond another, even so he hath greater tasks imposed upon him, and greater trusts to discharge; for with light comes also the shadow of thought, and this thought is your spirit's guide, either for good or for evil—but, I pray me for all,—good."

This is the truth. It has been verified. But the Inner Life is the substance of Feeling. It is Sentiment. The religious sentiment is the source of all manifested religious life. It is admitted that religion is sentiment, not science. So is mother love, love of country, patriotism, love of art, of beauty, of music, of everything that men most prize and pay for, whether in money or in blood.

The business of this sentiment is to interpret the universe, not to analyze it. To set its known facts in the celestial sunlight, not to scrutinize or classify them. It does not study the material constitution of the world by help of the telescope, or chemistry or the spectrum. That is for science. To its results religion as such is indifferent. It accepts the facts as far as discovered, equally at home with Copernicus, Newton, Darwin or Tyndall. It has no quarrel with the scientific schools. It accepts the "mode" of evolution, as well as the mode of creation by special fiat, being interested solely in the effort to lift up all knowledge into the light of God—the ideal sphere—the cosmic soul; to associate the facts of the world and of human life with thoughts of a divine purpose, a wisdom and a celestial love. It assumes these, nothing more. To keep alive reverence, trust, humility, the spirit of gentle confidence and brotherly love, the ennobling, glorifying, beautifying idealism of the devout heart, is its province; and this it does, not by plying the geologist's hammer, or watching the chemist's retort, but by showing how the universe of the geologist, or the geometrician, naturalist, physicist, manifests thought and goodness, demonstrating the old affirmation that "God is Love"—that "Light is God."

During the winters of 1894-5-6, Professor Alex C. Frazer, D. C. L. of Oxford, and Professor of Logic, etc., before the University of Edinborough, delivered a series of lectures on Theism. They are known as the "Gifford Lectures." The subject is grought up to date and is abreast of the best knowledge of our day.

Of course the argument is carefully reasoned, link by link. It is solid, heavy, scholastic; but the main point of interest to us is that he arrives at the conclusions of the spiritual philosophy, and by the scientific method. His ultimate ideas are the same as those elaborated in our Harmonial and Spiritual Philosophy (in esse).

The same fact to which the present writer in his humble and imperfect way has given his testimony in the "Apperception of God," shows that the power of the Universe is the Living Light.

With respect to what exists absolutely, men in this mortal state are not unlike those who are getting educated in the cave, as Plato pictures them, looking in shadows with their eyes turned away from the light which alone reveals the final reality.

In condensation, we quote a few of Prof. Fraser's positions:

"A universe without God, is really a universe without meaning, law or order, without reason—either supremely immanent in it, or supreme and external to it; and therefore even physically uninterpretable, as being without moral reason. * * * It would be a universe without reasonable hope and on the supposition that each conscious life in it must be endless, it may become to all a hell of endless, useless suffering from which there is no escape into unconsciousness. * * * Without the divine and perfect principle of order at its centre, man would be in a worse condition than that of a man who should ask, 'Who has sent me into this scene of existence in which I find myself living? I know not. What is the true meaning of my surroundings? I know not. What I really am myself I know not. I am in a bewildering and terrifying ignorance of all things and know not how to interpret any of my experiences, though surrounded by Immensity and Eternity.'

"Faith in the absolute supremacy of the active and moral reason—that is faith in God, is the only unconditional satisfaction in such perplexity. * * * * The revelation of God is in and through what is highest in man. It is the revelation that is involved in the self-consciousness of man, that supplies the key to this deeper or spiritual interpretation of nature. Apart from this, the outer world with all its laws and ends is darkness. For external nature in itself or apart from the contents of moral life in man conceals the God whom it nevertheless reveals when it is looked at in the light of spiritual consciousness.

"But of whose intelligence and purpose is this expression? What is meant by its supernaturalness? We find the signal example of the divine in the spiritual being of man. Man is midway between brute and deity, unable to know all and to be ignorant of all. Who is indeed great in his littleness. * * * External organic conditions must not be identified with the self-conscious life of which they may be the occasion. Living consciousness is more than potential intelligibility. Spirit, i. e., conscious life, becomes the light of the world. There is a necessary inadequacy of all merely biological or other natural interpretations of existence."

This living Light is the creative power. His rays of light waft together and apart and the great vibrations become that which constitutes human minds. Thos. Starr King (spirit) has said: "The breath from this Infinite soul fills all space, permeating living forms in their inner life; this Divine Being is thus constituted the Living Presence everywhere."

Identity, self-consciousness is by this light of life in us.

This power controls the breath, and by its own law attracts or repels us; as the blood flows to or from the heart.

The systematic demonstrations of the evolutionary and the natural sciences show the series of creatures as they arise or exfoliate from the earth.

At normal death or rebirth, the outer material form is shed, the inner, finer body taking on "form" in the ethereal world, intermediate (I think) between matter,—(or darkness) and light. The Real Light being in the Celestial or Central sphere: Spirit is the only Light.

In rough outline, this is the Theist's case. Living Light is the cosmic soul. The inner life of all creatures responds to this so far as they have affinity for the light. But all things are held by the law of attraction. If evil be the chosen goal, then darkness is your chosen heaven. "They love the darkness because their deeds are evil."

Now, then, let us take a glance at the theological world as we see it. What is the modern idolatry—or the modern form of a very ancient idolatry?

When a Protestant reformer charges the priests with teaching and the people with practicing idolatry and points to the crowd before the Madonna, or the form of the crucified, the apologist replies: "The form is only a symbol, an emblem; not a deity. We do not worship the tawdry doll on the altar, but the pure Madonna in the skies. Not the figure on the crucifix, but the Christ who sits at the right hand of God, the Father; not the statue of a martyr, saint or prophet, but the martyrs themselves who shed down grace from heaven. The vulgar like these things, because they like toys, but the thoughtful understand."

So, too, when the Rationalist or Spiritualist confronts the Protestant with the same charge, saying, "Your Bible is a fetish; you idolize an individual man." The Protestant replies: "We worship the spirit behind the printed book. The Word voices itself in the book—not the book! The letter is nothing, the Word is all. Nor do we worship the man Jesus—but the Christ in Jesus. The Christ who is the invisible, eternal, immortal—the source of all spiritual life."

Men declare that history shows idolatry to be a phase, an era in development. The ancient Persians and Arabians worshiped light, the finest symbol of pure and absolute perfection that we can image—the uncreated, self-existent, eternal light. The uncreated light manifests to the senses through the symbols of sun, moon and stars.

The worshipers of the living Light, like the Parsees, use the symbols of nature's lights.

The vestal virgins, of Rome, had for their sacred office the watching and tending of the "sacred lamps"—it was a deadly sin to let the lamps go out. The priests in the Roman churches light candles and keep them burning through the sacred office of the mass. They are held as types.

The Greeks and Romans were an imaginative people, they formed images and worshiped them.

Modern people form mental images, too—such as "luck"—Fortuna, Bacchus, or others.

Suppose that these images of the mind were to assume visible form, what should we behold? Precisely the same figures that formerly were worshiped as gods in Greece and Rome. The image of Bacchus would stand out over the portals of the drinking-houses and the whiskey saloons. The image of the Venus Aphrodite would grace the entrance to houses of ill-fame. The image of Plutus would look down on the bank presidents; the statue of the Goddess Fortuna would rest in all of the insurance offices. Mercury, the "God of Thieves and comic writers," would rest in the gambling-houses, where men steal each other's money and call it "play," and in the offices of "Puck" and "Judge."

So on we might continue throughout the heathen Pantheon.

Are there none to-day who worship at the shrine of Fortune? Witness the wheat pit.

Every form of idolatry has its characteristics. The Greeks loved and worshiped beauty. Their ideals of physical beauty rule the esthetic world. The Romans worshiped strength.

What do we worship? What does this great sensual, selfish, grasping people of the modern world worship? It is not science, beauty, learning, culture, art; is it power? Is it growing to become the lust for power?

What is practically, our symbol of power—of that which is strongest?

It is wealth. Americans believe money to be the strongest thing to-day.

What is the civilization of the 20th century but the visible, tangible glorification of wealth? What are our great, rich, beautiful cities but testimonies to the executive power of wealth? Is it not wealth that subdues the stubborn ground and makes the wilderness, the bog, the marsh, to glow and bloom with roses?

It is wealth that covers the continent from ocean to ocean with railways. It is organized wealth that rules them.

It is money! money that sets up the telegraph and leads the fine wire, the subtle force through the very bosom of the ocean depths. It is money that bridges the rivers and makes the ocean a highway. That tunnels the mountain. Wealth is one symbol of Deity. The thoughtful regard it as a symbol only, while the unintelligent and the infatuated confound it with the God and pay to it divine honors.

Modern idolatry is, first of all, the worship of wealth; and a strange and ghastly worship it is!

Boston, Mass. J. P. COOKE.

Note of Warning.

I would like to sound a note of warning though I may be a little previous. But a "cloud no bigger than the hand of a man" has frequently ripened into a destructive storm.

It is undoubtedly certain that the money power, which dominates the outside world, is making itself felt in Spiritualism, and ere we are aware, it will muzzle the press—our only hope of unbiased and free expression.

But this is not the worst feature: The influence which the power brings with it, is debilitating to true mediumship; and to affect this detrimentally is to undermine the fundamental principle of our cause.

Without mediumship there can be no practical Spiritualism. Mediums or sensitives need a spiritual basis to rest on. Materiality or worldlyism reduces it to a sort of adeptship or white magic without soul, and the result will be retrogression.

Money is a great temptation, and those who possess it are the tempters, in that their suggestions carry great weight with sensitives, leading them from an interior to an exterior mode of reasoning with results that destroy the keen edge of spirituality and generate supineness for the cause they represent. Their hearts become cold, and supporters of the cause become indifferent in consequence. Mediums, true to the cause—and among them the best—suffer under such conditions, and fall by the wayside.

Next to the mediums the press suffers, because indifference by the supporters is followed by a refusal to read. Seeking financial aid outside of the public is a spoke in the free expression of newspaper publishers or editors. Gratitude compels them to accept suggestions that are not strictly inspirational; for wealth is not accumulated on a spiritual basis. It is a strictly material affair, and minds accustomed to scheming on these lines are unprepared and unfit to control anything that needs an open way between this and the other world.

Newspapers above all should be free from the slavery of suggestion. No publisher or editor can exercise soul-freedom under the pressure of feeling himself under obligations to a mortal. However slight the influence he is under restraint. He is not himself. Mediums lose their best powers under like conditions. It is not exactly the selling of one's birthright, but it is more like being robbed of it by force of circumstances.

Such things should not obtain. Mediums and the press should be supported by the public to make both independent; for only under those conditions can Spiritualism thrive and keep step with the orch of progress, step with the march of progress.

ARTHUR FRANCIS MILTON.

PHENOMENA.

Workers Must Be Supported, that They May Work.

Phenomena attributed to the agency of human beings no longer resident among us in the flesh, have, during the last fifty years especially been observed, to some extent recorded, and by a few individuals studied. In the absence of systematic classification and intelligent investigation, most of these phenomena have been allowed to run to waste. They have failed in producing the effects which might have been produced had we, on the visible side of life, done our part of the labor. They are evidences, indeed, to some that there is no death. That they are not convincing proofs to a larger number is mainly the fault of those to whose care they have been entrusted. It is owing to the methods, or lack of method, of Spiritualists themselves. Possibly this has been unavoidable in the past. It is also possible that it need not always remain so in the future.

We occasionally hear some discussion concerning the respective merits and importance of the philosophy and the phenomena. In some minds, two great bodies of our workers, speakers and test mediums, are arrayed in opposition to each other. This is absurd. It is as though the head should say to the foot, "I have no need of you."

Spiritualism is distinct from all other isms only in this that it stands upon the fact of spirit phenomena occurring in conformity with natural law in the present as in the past. All religious systems appeal to such phenomena in support of their claims. Many, however, assert that "the age of miracles is past." Others, as our Catholic brethren, deny this, but maintain that such miracles are exceptional suspensions of natural law by Divine power, seeming to ignore their own position that "with God there is no variableness nor shadow of turning." The distinctive teaching of Spiritism would therefore appear to be that such phenomena are as natural and orderly as all other phenomena.

Let us accept this, for the present purpose of least, as a fair definition of spiritism. But something more is necessary before we can rightly designate any individual a Spiritualist. For this there must be an application of the knowledge of spirit existence to himself. He must recognize the fact that he is himself a spiritual being, living, here and now, in spirit life. He must, at least theoretically admit that he is here and now working out his own salvation from present imperfect conditions. If this produce a practical improvement in his life here and now, he is a live Spiritualist. If not, he is a spiritual corpse.

This being admitted, we see how absurd it becomes to imagine that any Spiritualists are opposed to the phenomena. Such opposition would exclude them from any right to the Spiritualist name. It is scarcely credible that they would care to so designate themselves. On the other hand, those who content with observing phenomena and enjoying spirit messages for their own personal benefit neglect the philosophy, are in no sense Spiritualists. They may be more unspiritual than many materialists.

The true Spiritualist then observes and values the phenomena and puts the knowledge thus acquired to practical use in the development of his own spiritual life.

Here we have arrived at a point at which there is necessarily a division. We are agreed as to our objects. We wish to study the phenomena, and the philosophy built upon the phenomena. Perhaps some are satisfied with the phenomena already observed, and consider that they may be better employed in utilizing that which they have gathered than in searching for fresh material. If so, so much the better as far as they are personally concerned. But there are others not yet so enlightened, and we naturally desire to enlighten them. In other words, we wish to present phenomena to those who are yet asking, "If a man die, shall he live again?" With the question how can this best be done comes the divergence of opinions. At present it occasions some agitation upon the point of the utility or inutility of platform tests.

It is to be feared that many of those who advocate this particular method of presenting phenomena have in view the increase of numbers in attendance at public meetings, still more the increase of receipts from door fees than any spiritual good that might result from evidence so presented. Of course this side of the matter must receive due consideration.

Financial support is necessary for all public work. It is not, however, the subject with which we are just now dealing. Platform tests may serve that purpose temporarily, but if meetings are held merely to gratify curiosity or furnish amusement it is questionable if that can be considered spiritual work. It is possible that meetings might be made attractive to the general public without this, so we may afford to leave the money question alone for the time being and consider that of presenting the phenomena in the manner best calculated to convince the sincere investigator.

It would be valuable for this purpose if we could ascertain how many among us received our knowledge of spirit communion through tests given in public; how many from private sittings with mediums; how many from evidence brought by spirit power to themselves alone; how many through the home circle. If even some two or three thousand would furnish data it would greatly aid in arriving at a satisfactory conclusion. In the absence of such statistics we can only infere from limited observation. Even that, however, is not without its worth.

Those who most appreciate the value of spirit phenomena should, to be consistent, be the most desirous to present these phenomena under favorable conditions. It remains to be considered what these conditions are.

It can scarcely be thought that the atmosphere of a public hall, where there are many conflicting influences, is of itself the most desirable. It may be the most expedient, or the only possible, at any given place and time. When we cannot have just what we would, we must do the best with that we have. This is no reason for not endeavoring to obtain something better. Platform tests have done and are doing some good work. We cannot yet entirely dispense with them except in some few localities. They probably seldom convince skeptics, but they arouse attention and in some cases encourage further investigation. But to accomplish this they need to be exceptionally good, clear cut, and of a character which does not admit of any other than the Spiritualistic explanation. Failing in these, they confirm skepticism and discourage research. It is also necessary that the person receiving the test should have some knowledge of the philosophy. Otherwise knowledge of spirit return may be more prejudicial than advantageous. To deal with this at length would be entering upon a subject too vast for the present article. Let us, however, understand that phenomena are valuable only as evidences. We should state what we would prove, before attempting to prove it.

Persons ignorant of our philosophy attend a public meeting for the purpose of "getting tests." If they do not get them they are made more skeptical than before. If they get them, but in a way which appears to them possible without spirit communication, they suspect fraud. This, from their mental standpoint, is reasonable and right. They do not know that if any medium could at all times give what was desired it would not be a test of spirit communication, but of psychic power in the medium, who possibly might not be a medium at all. Your letter carrier could not undertake to deliver every day a letter at your house unless he wrote it himself.

We have in our ranks a very few mediums who appear to be specially used, or perhaps used only, for this public work. They are by no means sufficiently numerous to supply the demands for their labor. The good they accomplish may be more than counterbalanced from the imperfect work of others.

It is well to have an elevated ideal, to shoot at a high mark even if we strike below it. Better that than aim too low and find our shaft buried in the earth. All our workers, speakers and mediums alike, should be given the best opportunities for doing their best work. The best work is always produced by specialists. The all-around man, the "Jack-of-all-trades," is proverbially master of none. He is very useful in pioneer days, but as civilization advances his utility decreases until he finds himself no longer in request.

The development and qualifications for speaking and test mediumship are essentially different, and if one individual be used for both, it is not unlikely to be at the expense of perfection in either. The conditions of locality have still greater differences. That instruction in philosophy and religion may reach any considerable number publicity is required. For spirit communications which bring evidences of their truth to those who seek them the mingling of many influences in a public place is seriously detrimental.

This article has already exceeded its proper limits, but much more might be written. We have yet done little systematic work to furnish others with the truth we have. Speakers and mediums should be above the commercial basis and work for the work's sake, not for the dollar. The people should also work for the work's sake. The dollar paid in hope of a personal communication in return is not contributed to the cause of Truth. Our workers must be supported that they may work, but they should not be paid a price for what they give. That which they have to give is "without money and without price" in the sense that all the world's wealth is inadequate to represent its value. There should be sacred temples in which sensitives, solemnly consecrating their lives to their calling and abandoning all worldly interests, might be sheltered from the influences of an unspiritualized community. Their food, clothing and environments should all be studied with a view to the increased perfection of their work. In such sacred temples there should be halls for philosophical teaching. No attempt should be made to convert the rostrum into a seance-room, or to use the seance-room for a rostrum. Regard should be paid to the fact that there is a right time and right place for everything.

We cannot bring to pass all that we may desire at once or even in a generation or two. We must use the means we possess until we can have better. In the meantime it is well to form the highest ideal we can and endeavor gradually to approach its realization.

SONG.

O father, I have seen an angel,
Descended from the realms of light;
His head was crowned with a radiance,
His face so very pure and bright;
So white and shining were his garments,
His voice like heavenly music sweet.
And this is what I said unto him,
While sitting raptured at his feet:

"Dear angel, tell me where this brightness
Was found, that shines around your head?
And how you gained this lovely whiteness,
That doth your face so overspread?
What gives your voice its silver ringing?
How did you get your clothes so new?
For I would like to go to heaven,
And wear such clothes and look like you."

"My crown I won by acting rightly
And kindly unto all my race.
Pure thoughts it is that shines so brightly
And gives such sweetness to my face.
Love gives my voice its pleasing cadence,
Good deeds my garments doth combine,
Do this and all this glorious brightness
Around thee, too, in heaven shall shine."

MOTHER BIRD.

Bless Her, Everybody.

There are angels on earth. One of them is presented to our readers this week in "The Home Circle Sermon." Mother Bird figures very conspicuously therein. She is a veritable angel in an earthly garb, and presents a vivid picture for Spiritualists to contemplate. Her work is to uplift fallen men; to reform them, and start them on an honorable career. In this respect she will excite your highest admiration. She repairs human wrecks that possess immortal souls—prepares them for the Spirit World—prepares them to live honest, temperate lives. Follow somewhat in her steps; reach down and help those beneath you, and be blessed in turn. In the meantime subscribe for The Progressive Thinker, and keep in touch with advanced thought, and that will aid you in seeing the true light.

Look Out for His Lecture.

Next week we shall publish a remarkable lecture delivered by Col. H. S. Olcott "On the Uses and Perils of Psychism." Col. Olcott is one of the foremost leaders of Theosophy, but this lecture harmonizes in many respects with Spiritualism. It will prove a valuable production and should be read by every Spiritualist. The Progressive Thinker leads in furnishing the advanced thought of the age. It brings its readers in touch with master minds, and makes them wiser and better. Send on your dollar for the paper one year. Have it visit you weekly. But better still, send on $1.25, and besides getting the paper one year, you will receive that remarkable book, "A Wanderer in the Spirit Lands." Don't remain in the dark. Seek the light.

To Those Not Subscribers.

You who do not read The Progressive Thinker are certainly behind the times. You miss a great deal that is really valuable to every reflective mind, and which will prepare you for your entrance to spirit life. You should read the Hull-Jamieson Debate. You should be familiar with the stirring movements in our own ranks. You should realize the fact that Spiritualism is a growing influence everywhere, and you should keep in close touch with the movement. Read the various articles in this week's issue; read them carefully and critically, and we are sure then you will subscribe for the paper. Send on $1.25. That will entitle you to the paper one year, and that remarkable book, "A Wanderer in the Spirit Lands." It is a book all Spiritualists should read. It is worth its weight in gold. Send on your $1.25 at once, and become the wiser. Don't remain in ignorance.

THE WORLD NEVER SAW THE LIKE BEFORE

Besides publishing the largest Spiritualist paper to-day, combining CHEAPNESS and EXCELLENCE, we also publish eight premium books, unsurpassed for real genuine intrinsic merit. They will not suffer in comparison with any other eight books in the whole range of Spiritualism, and yet the eight are furnished for about the ordinary price of any other two books. We only charge $2.50 for the eight. In the past as well as present that price has never been equalled. We had five tons of one book printed last fall, "A Wanderer in the Spirit Lands." It is a most marvelous work, worth its weight in gold. Every Spiritualist should have these eight books as the nucleus for a Spiritualistic and Occult Library. In order to carry these books in stock to meet demands, a large capital is required, for the use of which this office does not receive a cent, hence we call this method of doing business "The Divine Plan"—doing for others, with the least possible compensation. If you do not secure these books, you make the mistake of your life. Each year we publish one new book that we furnish for less than actual cost. All that we ceive for that remarkable book, "A Wanderer in the Spirit Lands," is 25 cents. Now is the time to subscribe for The Progressive Thinker. It scintillates all through with something you should know. By reading it you keep in touch with the great spiritual movement; by reading it you get each year a vast amount of Spiritualistic and occult matter, and are thus able to keep in the front ranks of the advancing procession. For list of premiums, see second page.

THE GREATEST DEBATE WITHIN A HALF CENTURY UPON MODERN SPIRITUALISM

DISPUTANTS:

REV. MOSES HULL,

President New York State Spiritualists' Association, Headquarters, Buffalo, N. Y.

—AND—

W. F. JAMIESON,

Secretary National Liberal League, Headquarters, Cincinnati, Ohio,

PROPOSITION:

Resolved, That the phenomena and philosophy of Modern Spiritualism prove that departed spirits can communicate with mankind.

MR. JAMIESON'S THIRD SPEECH.

(Sixth Address of the Debate.)

Mr. Chairman, Ladies and Gentlemen, and My Respected Opponent:—My friend Hull represents that there is not much glory to be had in the company of "renouncers." Perhaps not; you ought to know, for you were in their company for a long time. While they were among you, building up Spiritualism by their frauds, they were lovely then, and you associated with them on terms of intimacy. I submit that they are no worse now, exposing trickery, than when they were among you practicing trickery. Christianity forgives a man who "quits his meanness;" but Spiritualists encourage a "medium," whatever may be his convictions, to never confess. You Spiritualists were more to blame for their frauds than they were; and you still say, in spite of their confessions, that they are mediums, even Von Vleck. To what lengths credulity goes!

Mr. Hull thinks I am anxious to be "persecuted." Unfortunately for the boasted liberality of Spiritualism, I never knew a Calvinistic orthodox Christian exhibit more intolerance than do Spiritualists toward those who have gone out from among them. I have always cheerfully admitted that there are Spiritualists who are liberal-minded men and women. Is this not true, also, of any religious organization?

Oh, no! Spiritualists never blamed me for giving up Spiritualism. Perish the thought! They extend to me the same old-time, hearty greetings, notwithstanding my change of views about Spiritualism. This has made no difference with Hull, but all Spiritualists are not Hulls. They are so charitable; yes. They provide "conditions" for Hagaman, McQuecn, and others, to fool them, and then make piteous complaints because they are fooled, through the very conditions—loop-holes for fraud—which they themselves accord them. Spiritualists are far more to blame for frauds in Spiritualism than all the Lelands and Hagamans that ever lived.

Because I, in my boyhood, had certain experiences which I supposed were produced by spirits, they, with their slip-shod logic, think I never should have changed my mind as to the cause of my strange experiences. Millions have sincerely believed they were inspired by the Holy Ghost; gave it up; some of them becoming Spiritualists. I do not understand why Brother Hull should lay such stress upon a "following." John Wesley, a great man, finely educated, was a greater man, and better organizer than Mr. Hull. Is that proof that he had more truth? If so, Hull ought to have stayed with the Methodists. Peter, the Hermit, had a gigantic "following." So did Mohammed. Dowie has, probably, a greater "following" than Hull will ever have if he should live a hundred years. He tells us, proudly, how many people listen to him, until he gets into debate with this arch-heretic. If more Spiritualists listen to Hull alone, as he says, than when I am analyzing his "arguments," it is a sad confession that they do not want to hear "both sides." They ought to be willing to enjoy his winsome ways, his interesting, plausible presentation of their heaven-born philosophy and earthly phenomena, even if he does not do all the talking, especially as he assures his "followers," whom he fails to inspire with confidence, that he has a wonderful battery which shoots into my serried ranks a "red-hot stream of facts." "Blessed be he that bloweth his own horn, or the same shall not be blown." I doubt if he has addressed more multitudes, and larger, than I have, sometimes between five and six thousand people at a time, and held debates with clergymen, which packed buildings many nights in succession. The fact is, Hull and myself are very great men, a fact which this stupid world has not yet discovered!

But what has all this to do with the proposition before us, that spirits exist and communicate?

He tells us of surprising phenomena which occurred somewhere, but humanity jogs along no wiser about spirits returning than when Partridge began his "great work" half a century ago. The world, as he contends, has been full of stories, ghost stories, Munchausen stories, which we are expected to believe in the name of Spiritualism; and, at the same time, Spiritualists are compelled to admit that their phenomena are permeated with fraud, much of which defies detection, so long as you allow the mediums their own "conditions." Grant a magician his "conditions" and he will deceive your senses every time; yet we are expected to accept the testimonies of Spiritualists under such circumstances. If the recital of big stories proves my friend's side true, then when I come to affirm the next proposition I will have greater, larger stories to relate, proving that human beings perform more skilfully than unfleshed spirits. But the assumption, in all the reasoning of Spiritualists, is that spirits can do what mortals cannot produce. In the next breath my friend Hull, and Spiritualists generally, confess that their phenomena are closely counterfeited by dexterous humans.

If there were such a law as Brother Hull describes in the case of Mr. Partridge, spiritual beings directing the business affairs of this world, what a powerful combination of millions of spirits that would be! But when Horace Greeley tried to make the spirits useful in bringing him news of the markets in England for his Tribune, it was a flat failure.

My friend has a peculiar method of arguing; frequent assertions that I "do not touch his leading arguments." The truth is, a great deal of what he says I can afford to let stand for just what it is worth. We have an explicit agreement, too, that this debate will be more valuable, instructive to both hearer and reader, if we seek to give it the character of a symposium.

All the traditionary lore that he can bring forth from dark recesses he is welcome to designate "arguments," "positive historical statements," some of which he merely read in a newspaper, and knows nothing further about them.

Brother Hull says I attended a "few dark seances"—a few! His information is as reliable on that as upon the tests of mediums. It takes considerable of my time to correct my friend's mis-statements.

If a thousand dark circles were exposed as frauds, Spiritualists would still say, "There is a genuine dark circle somewhere—the fraud proves it!" If Mr. Hull gets his "facts" as badly mixed as his statements about what I said, there is little value in them. I said that both Spiritualists and Christians claim that Jesus Christ returned and said, "Handle me and see," and my friend has it that I acknowledged that he was actually there. After he puts the words in my mouth he then asserts that I am inconsistent.

Modern "spirits" are the "touch me not" kind all the time. It is not surprising to me that Christians say Spiritualism is a base imitation of early Christianity.

When Mr. Hull can really believe that Von Vleck is a medium, he can believe anything.

He is mistaken about Mrs. Krekel, for she told me, long before she married Judge Krekel, that she doubted immortality. Another mistake: I did not say he was not after the truth. It is in black and white what I did say. I knew Cephas B. Lynn better than Moses Hull did; traveled with him; an estimable man; naturally refined. He became disgusted with the coarseness, charlatanry, crudities of Spiritualism. For some reason Spiritualists do not want to give any person who has left them credit for purity of motive. If they themselves occupied an exalted position in the esteem of mankind for nobility of character and soundness of judgment their curse would be blistering.

In my opening speech last night I referred to some spirit messages—purported messages—and confessions of Mr. Hull, exceedingly damaging to Spiritualism, if not destructive to it. His attempt to twist around and explain away his own positive statements had not the virtue of being amusing; but they were slippery and weak. He admitted that my statements of his confessions were correct; admitted that he said the "messages of spirits proved that they exist—and nothing more." Is this, then, all there is of Modern Spiritualism? Is it the sum of all these wonderful spirit testimonies—that "spirits exist, and nothing more?" Consider this—all this automatic writing, all these trance speeches, all these slate-writings, and all this Indian gibberish show, only show, that spirits, ghosts, apparitions, devils "exist."

My opponent believed this and preached this when he was a Seventh Day Adventist; believed that spirits, devils, or the spirits of devils existed, and here he stands—not in advanced step in forty years. He sits and sings "spirits exist—and nothing more." And in all his wonderful "arguments," which he says I have not touched—he says they are wonderful—he has not demonstrated, or proved, that a single spirit ever did communicate with anybody. He has proved a dull pupil of mine. He discourages me. Forty years ago he relied upon devils damned to prove Adventism. With a slight change of phraseology he now depends upon lying spirits to prove Spiritualism true—says so himself, for the liar proves that he exists, only this, and nothing more! What a grand development!

If my opponent's position is true, Spiritualism is of less value than Mormonism; for Mormons declare that spirits exist, and they tell where they exist, and how they exist. They are rewarded for the number of wives and children they had on earth. I admit that Spiritualism has not had polygamy; it has had its freeloveism, and its endorsements stand in Woodhull and Claflin's Weekly. Its lecturers now call it "the freedom of the affections," or social freedom, contending that as men and women own their own bodies they have a right to use them when, how, and as they will—you can imagine the rest.

We can no more separate Spiritualism from its phenomenal influences than we can separate cause and effect. Certain mediums, under the control of their purported spirit guides, have the rankest freelove. My opponent and Dr. Peebles repudiate these mediums and their spirits. But Dr. Peebles, in writing his book, put upon the witness stand to certify, the best mediums in this country and Europe, Morse, Colville, Mrs. Longley, and many more, where spirits testified they had seen Jesus, Plato, Confucius and others (if I make a mis-statement, Dr. Peebles, who is in this audience, an old, double-distilled Spiritualist, will correct me), and yet Mr. Hull advised, or said, that all these spirit messages had better been "tossed into the waste basket." What a compliment to these spirits and mediums. He said they were lying spirits; but how can he tell who and how many of these spirits are lying spirits? Are they all lying spirits in the dark, behind the screen when communicating? Spiritualists say that "like attracts like." Were Colville, Morse, Longley and others all liars? Did they thus attract a crowd of lying spirits? Christians believe that spirits exist—and something more. Mr. Hull's Spiritualism is of less value than liberal Christianity.

My good friend becomes indignant against the human liar, one who has not "shuffled off this mortal coil," like Dr. Bouton, of whom I will give an account to-morrow night.

Millions of human beings have died, and not one of all those millions has ever, so far as we know, conversed with former relatives and acquaintances on this planet as formerly, and gone about in open daylight, from house to house, as they were in the habit of doing before death. We look upon the clay tenement, cold and white, and are told by Spiritualists that the real being that once animated that clay lives, and makes known his, or her, existence to a few favored persons who are termed mediums, sensitive and sensible enough to receive the message from the individual that once lived in that body.

The man, or woman, does not speak to his, or her, former friends directly, as formerly; but indirectly through a medium of flesh, an entirely new method of communication. It is an extraordinary assumption, and the Spiritualists endeavor to substantiate it by extraordinary manifestations, which they are careful to state are all natural, none supernatural. How they do hate that word "supernatural." They would drive it out of the dictionary if they could. Their manifestations are supramundane. We have phenomena of Spiritualism to prove to a dying world that a man lives after he is dead—in fact, we are told that the man does not die; only his body; but this, too, is assumed, and is by no means self-evident.

The doctrine of immortality is the track upon which Spiritualism is run. Spiritualism is a counterfeit of the witch stories, fairy stories, ghost stories which have flourished for ages—a clumsy counterfeit at that.

If the so-called phenomena of Spiritualism were as general as the belief in immortality the race would be Spiritualists; but we are informed that the great hindrance to the spread of Spiritualism is the necessity for "conditions" which debar the multitude and favor the few. The principal condition upon which a communication is to be obtained from a spirit world is a medium of flesh. The dead man, who is not dead, cannot, or does not, present himself to a whole city full in his own proper person, Any man can do this, but no spirit can do it. We are told that the spirit world is as natural as this, and human spirits are in communication with the inhabitants of this world every day; but in all cases those spirits must converse through a medium. Strange! if the spirit world is so natural, and the spirit is as natural as it was before death, that it has lost its power of direct speech. Abraham Lincoln could speak to an audience of thousands forcibly and directly before the assassin's bullet silenced his eloquent tongue, since when he has never spoken, unless we conclude that he materializes in some half-lighted cabinet, or hypnotizes some medium to address a congregation in a style unmistakably more that of the medium than of Lincoln; full of the peculiar expression of the medium of flesh rather than the quaintness of the martyr-president's beautiful character.

But we are told that, under the "conditions," he does as well as he can, and that every communication from the spirit world must be impregnated with the peculiarities of the channel through which it passes. Thus conditions destroy Spiritualism and make it impossible for spirits to do their own communicating, their own talking, their own writing. If the spirit could only talk and write as he did before he "passed over!" If no peculiarity of speech and manner of the medium would persist in appearing in the message of the spirit, what a science Spiritualism would be! Churches would get to be unfashionable and agnostics invisible! This would be the case, most certainly, if the spirits would appear, talk, and write in their own proper persons without any more "conditions" than we are obliged to observe when conversing with our neighbors daily. They do not do it, which shows that Spiritualism is a mere theory and originates with human beings who, many of them, honestly believe themselves inspired, as I once believed I was inspired. If Spiritualism is true, no spirit, it seems to me, ought to be dependent upon any human to make the fact of his existence known. Here is where Spiritualism is a failure. If spirits exist and communicate why do they not make themselves plainly visible in every family? Why should they not come to everybody? If Spiritualism is designed, as Spiritualists claim, for the comfort of the whole human race, why should the visits of the departed be confined to the chosen few called mediums? If it is for the benefit of the whole human race why should not the whole human race receive the benefit?

Mark the answer which Spiritualists give for the failure: "Conditions" prevent. Do not conditions prevent any communication at all? All phenomena of Spiritualism are inseparably connected with human beings in the flesh called mediums. As soon as a man is dead he loses all power to talk and write to his friends as he had been in the habit of doing. To all intents and purposes he is completely dead. The Spiritualists say, "No; he is more alive than ever," although they are obliged to admit that he no longer exercises the power of communicating directly without a medium of flesh; hence, we are driven to the conclusion that the phenomena of Spiritualism have no other source, or origin, than human beings on this earth. We, living in this world, converse with each other without an interpreter, or medium, or subject, unless a foreign language is employed. Why should not an Englishman or American talk English just as he did before death overtook him? If death is, as Spiritualists say, only transition, merely a step from one room into another, why should not every spirit step back and report, in his own language, and with his own vocal organs, to sorrowing friends? "'Tis all well!" Indeed, if Spiritualism is true, there should be no grief when death comes to any household. And let me here admit, in all fairness, that to sincere, honest-minded Spiritualists, and there are many such, those who really believe in Spiritualism, death has lost its sting, and they do not grieve for those who have "passed over;" to them Spiritualism is a reality.

I make this concession because in my discussions I aim to be fair. But in all my investigations of Spiritualism never, in a single instance, have I found a spirit, so-called, controlling the vocal organs of a medium, instead of his own, who could give an intelligible account of himself under the close test of cross-examination, the "spirit," the witness, whether by writing or talking, always broke down. A direct question has never failed yet, in my experience of forty-five years to baffle the whole spirit world, with Lord Bacon, Shakspeare, Daniel Webster and Abraham Lincoln thrown in. I have tried Spiritualism candidly with the most famous mediums on earth. They all fail. I failed, thought, wondered, then doubted, and at last was forced to conclude that Spiritualism is not a proved fact. Yet you ask me to set aside the testimony of my own senses, and accept the testimony of your senses. Your philosophy also fails. If spirits know so well what is going on in this world, and can foretell events, as claimed, can predict the wreck of ships, the rise of stocks, and the outcome of business ventures, why not use that knowledge for some practical good—the building of homes for the unfortunate, to rival, or surpass, Christian charity? Why not establish a fund for the benefit of mediums? Why did not the spirits, with all their clairvoyance, tell where Charlie Ross could be found and set anxious hearts at rest?

Why do the spirits who have the power, we are told, to carry objects through the air, not get those millions of lost treasures in the sea, and have a vast Spiritual Temple erected as a standing triumph of the power of spirit?

Oh, why not do a thousand things that they might do, if the spirit hypothesis were true?

(To be Continued.)

IMPORTANT MATTER FROM OUR FOREIGN EXCHANGES

HARBINGER OF LIGHT, MELBOURNE, AUSTRALIA.

A COMMUNITY OF SPIRITUALISTS

The growth of Spiritualism in Belgium is attracting a good deal of attention in France, and Le Matin, one of the morning papers published in Paris, has despatched a member of its staff, M. Jules Bois, to inquire into and report upon the movement in the neighboring kingdom. The following is the letter from him, which appears in that journal on the 26th of July last:

"Every negation and all the railleries of the materialists fall to pieces in the presence of facts. Scientific pride which does not allow anyone to believe, except in its own dogmas, often precarious and variable, will find a lively resistance in popular naivete. It will construct new temples on the ruins of the old ones. Where Catholicism grows weak, Spiritualism lifts up its head.'

"An object lesson has been given me, which I wish to report here, at the outset of this inquiry. There exists in Belgium, very near Liege, a village of working quarrymen, who are mainly Spiritualists. These laborers, who have escaped from the tutelage of the church, have not found content in free thought, or in atheism pure and simple, but have reconstituted, at the beginning of our twentieth century that cult o fthe dead, which, according to Fustel-Coulanges, was the first religion of humanity.

"The spiritual temple is situated on the slope of a hill verdant with pines. In the angle of the gable is a radiant eye, and two devices converge underneath it. One says, 'There is no immovable faith but that which reason can supply, when brought face to face with Humanity in every age.' The other is the famous phrase of Allen Kardec: 'To be born, to die, to be born again, to progress without ceasing, such is the law.' Inside, the hall is adorned with many mottoes, one of which runs thus: 'The conscience is accountable to God alone; its domain is interdicted to all tyrants.' I was shown the flag, and the funeral pall of the society. Both are ornamented with devices in letters of gold. On one I read, 'Death is only the end of one of our stages towards the higher life;' and again, 'To fear death, is to misunderstand it.' On the flagstaff is a hand holding a shield, bearing this motto: 'Towards God, by Science and Charity.'"

A WARNING VISION.

La Stampa, the leading journal in Turin, translates from the Novisti of St. Petersburg, the following narrative of an incident which has naturally created a profound sensation in that city, where so many of the educated classes are avowed Spiritualists:

"Count Souwazoff, President of the Tribunal of the first section, was passing sentence in a case of great importance, assisted by two judges, when, all of a sudden, he turned pale and the pen fell from his hand. The two judges hastened to his assistance. The Count kept his eyes fixed upon a particular spot in the hall, and raising his hand with some difficulty, he pointed thither. The judges followed his gaze, but could see nothing except the perfectly white wall, with a gas-bracket in the centre of it. An usher, who had been summoned, brought the Count a cordial, which revived him somewhat. When he had slightly recovered, he exclaimed, "What a vision! my God! That wall appeared to me transformed upon the instant into a white vessel, on board of which were my wife and my two young daughters. Darkness was all around the vessel. A storm had arisen. The flashes of lightning and the pealing of the thunder rendered the scene still more terrible. One flash ran along the deck and entered through a port-hole the cabin where the three beings dearest to me in the world, were. My wife and her youngest daughter were instantly killed while the eldest was seriously injured. She neither spoke, nor cried; she only raised her arm and thought of me with such an intensity that I felt as if I were close to her, and will like to swoon. I am calmer now. My family cannot have gone to sea to-day; and it was doubtless a cruel hallucination I experienced."

"And the President resumed his duties, but not without feeling greatly oppressed by the vision. In the evening he received a telegram from Kief, where his family resided, apprising him that Madame Souwazoff and her two daughters had made an excursion on the sea in the steamboat bearing his own name—an elegant vessel entirely white in color—that it had encountered a sudden hurricane; that a flash of lightning had entered the cabin in which the three ladies were sleeping and had killed the mother and her younger daughter. The elder had survived, but had been stricken dumb. Perhaps it was that last incident that had been made manifest to her father.

"It appears that the young lady who survived was exceedingly fond of her father, and thought of him from the first outbreak of the storm with so much power and intensity, as to constrain him to concentrate upon the vessel, all his attention and all his psychic force."

A PREMONITORY VISION.

We translate from the Vessillo Spiritista, which is now published at No. 64 Via Leccossa, in Rome, the following narrative, by Signora Bourges, a lady of the highest character, of events which happened in Trieste: "I was nine years old at the time, and was expecting my younger brother to accompany me for a walk, and was merrily playing in the dining-room, when accidentally turning my head, I distinctly saw a catafalque, surrounded by lighted wax candles, and underneath it lay the rigid corpse of my poor father. Terror-stricken I closed my eyes, hoping to shut out that frightful vision; but when I opened them again, it was distinctly present. Hearing my cries of alarm, my mother hastened to my side and tried to do all she could to distract me from this horrible impression, and my father coming home to lunch, full of vitality and health, tenderly bantered me on my depression, but it would not be dissipated and I was put to bed. Three days afterwards I saw my father die suddenly. In the catafalque erected for him, according to the custom of the country, I was startled to recognize the details I had rapidly seen in my vision, and more particularly the bright maroon colored shroud which had been laid over the lower portion of the body.

"I experienced nothing of the same kind afterwards, excepting on receiving a letter from a relation who was in good health at the time. 'Mamma,' I said, 'don't open that letter. It bodes unhappiness for us.' It contained, however, no bad news; but three days later, a telegram arrived announcing the death of the writer of it.

"I have had, on many occasions, a vivid intuition of the moral worth of people I was brought in contact with. Twice, in fact, when in company with persons who were highly esteemed, I have been moved by a sentiment of antipathy towards them which was fully justified by their subsequent conduct."

THE LATE EMPRESS FREDERICK.

We find the following in the same journal, quoted from the Fieramosca: "To those who cultivate the psychic sciences, a new case of the presentiment of death presents itself in connection with the departure of the Empress Frederick. Just a year ago she was staying in the palace at Potsdam. Among the few visitors she admitted to the palace was an English lady, named Maure, who had told the Empress she was about to leave Germany and should not return until the middle of the following August. The Empress said:

"'In that case, I am sorry to tell you that we shall not see each other again, at least, not in this world.'

"Mrs. Maure was astonished at such a remark and rejoined:

"'Your Majesty is in excellent health. How can you indulge in such forebodings?'

"The Empress, smiling, shook her head slightly, and replied:

"'You will call me superstitious, and I will not deny the charge; but you will remember that our English peasantry have a proverb that 'where the raven comes, death follows.' Well, I believe I have seen this raven. For the last week a black bird has pecked at the glass of my window every morning at five o'clock. It looked to me like a crow. Besides this, I dreamed of an old man, entirely clothed in black, who told me that a bird would come to bid me good morrow, and that so many times as he would come, so many days should I live after the first anniversary of his apparition. Now, the first anniversary of that black messenger took place the first of August; after which it came for six days running. I shall die then in a year and six days.'

"Naturally Mrs. Maure smiled at this revelation, although, being a good Englishwoman, she might be somewhat superstitious on her own part. On her return to England, she related the gloomy prevision of the Empress, and was not a little astonished to find it verified, with the error of a single day only, as the Empress died between the 5th and 6th of August."

A BIRD OF EVIL OMEN.

In the Memoirs of Prince Meschlscersky, which are now being published in the Grazdanin, a journal which he owns in St. Petersburg, occurs the following statement: "I remember, likewise, that there was a great deal of talk concerning a black bird, which appeared three days before the death of the Emperor Nicholas the First. This strange bird chose a window of the bed chamber of His Majesty, outside of which from time to time, he emitted the most lugubrious cries, beating his wings against the glass, and refusing to be driven away up to the moment of the Emperor's death. Now from that date St. Petersburg and all Russia, indeed, began to take up the subject of Sirtualism."

When we remember the important part which divination by birds played among the Greeks and Romans, both of them races intellectually superior to any people of modern times, and when we find ourselves confronted by well authenticated incidents like the foregoing, may we not pause before contemptuously dismissing as "superstitious," practices and beliefs, which may have been founded upon a knowledge of the laws of nature, and of occult phenomena, far greater than that which we possess at the present time. Spiritualism is a "superstition" in the estimation of the materialist and the orthodox believer in theological impossibilities, such as the Trinity, the Atonement, and the resurrection of the physical body; and yet every phenomenon of Spiritualism is rigorously conditioned and limited by natural law; an ignorance of which, combined with a good deal of conceited contentedness with the little they do know, influences people in stigmatising us as "superstitious." In time, perhaps, the word will drop out of our dictionaries, for we may discover that the superstitions of the ancients were scientific facts, imperfectly understood.

REGRETS.

You will have deep regrets for a long, long time if you miss the grand debate between Moses Hull and W. F. Jamieson, soon to begin in our columns. You may expect something rich and profound, a veritable, treat to the soul in this debate. Don't depend upon borrowing from your neighbor. Subscribe for the paper yourself.

OUR PREMIUMS.

THE.. DIVINE PLAN.. EIGHT REMARKABLE BOOKS.

Every Subscriber to the Progressive Thinker Reaps the Benefit of the Divine Plan.

"A Wanderer in the Spirit Lands," a most remarkable book, will be our leading feature until June 1, 1902, and will be the only one of the eight Divine Plan books sent out for 25 cents.

If you order only one book, and that one not the "Wanderer in the Spirit Lands," the price is 50 cents. If you order two books, and neither of them the "Wanderer in the Spirit Lands," the price of each one is 45 cents.

Any three of the eight Books you may order, Price $1.10.

Any four of the eight Books you may order, Price $1.50.

Any five of the eight Books you may order, Price $1.80.

Any six of the eight Books you may order, Price $2.10.

Any seven of the eight Books you may order, Price $2.35.

Lastly all of the eight Valuable Books here announced are sent out, all postage prepaid, for $2.50—a price never offered before by any other publisher.

Read This Carefully Before Remitting.

When you send in your subscription to The Progressive Thinker, carefully look over the books which you desire in this list, and their price, and send for them. They are very valuable. They are intensely interesting. They are elevating in tone and will do you good. In remitting do not fail to enclose a dollar for The Progressive Thinker.

These eight books, substantially and elegantly bound, and printed in the neatest style of the printer's art, will be furnished to our subscribers for $2.50, a price which modern machinery and enterprise has rendered possible. Sending out these books, however, at the prices we do, does not reduce the price of the subscription of the paper, apparently or otherwise, a single cent, for that cannot be afforded for less than one dollar per year. Inview of the fact that we publish such a vast amount of reading matter.

REMARKABLE OFFER.

EIGHT REMARKABLE BOOKS FOR $2.50.

1—The Encyclopedia of Death, and Life in the Spirit World, Vol. 1.
2—The Encyclopedia of Death, and Life in the Spirit World, Vol. 2.
3—The Encyclopedia of Death, and Life in the Spirit World, Vol. 3.
4—Art Magic, or Mundane, Sub-Mundane and Super-Mundane Spiritism.
5—Ghost Land, Spiritualism, Occultism.
6—The Next World Interviewed.
7—The Occult Life of Jesus.
8—A Wanderer in the Spirit Lands.
Total price to our subscribers, $2.50.
The Progressive Thinker one year and the eight Divine Plan books, $3.50.

In order to assist in forming a Spiritual and Occult Library in every Spiritualist's home, these eight valuable books, substantially and elegantly bound in cloth, are furnished to our subscribers for $2.50. We are able to do this, from the fact that the authors make no charge for the vast amount of labor bestowed on these works, and which extended over many years. That is why you are getting these intensely interesting books for the price you do. We are only carrying out the Divine Plan, inaugurated only by The Progressive Thinker. There are thousands of our subscribers who have no Spiritualist or Occult library, and this inducement is offered in order that they may commence forming one at once, and thus keep in line with the advancing procession. The postage on the above books and expense of mailing is about 95 cents, hence you are receiving them at an exceedingly low price—simply the result of modern enterprise combined with a desire to do good.

"After Her Death. The Story of a Summer." By Lilian Whiting. No mind that loves spiritual thought can fail to be fed and delighted with this book. Beautiful spiritual thought, combining advanced ideas on the finer and ethereal phases of Spiritualism, leading the mind onward into the purer atmosphere of exalted spiritual truth. A book for the higher life. For sale at this office. Price, cloth $1.

"Right Living." By Susan H. Wixon. The author shows a wise practicality in her method of teaching the principle of ethics. She illustrates her subject with many brief narratives and anecdotes, which render the book more interesting and more easily comprehended. It is especially adapted for use in Children's Lyceum. In the hands of mothers and teachers it may be made very useful. Young and old will be benefited by it. Cloth $1 For sale at this office.

"Poems of Progress." By Lizzie Doten. In this volume, this peerless poet of Spiritualism may be read in her varied moods, "from grave to gay, from lively to severe." It is a book to be treasured and richly enjoyed by all who love genuine poetry, and especially by Spiritualists. The volume is tastily printed and bound. Price $1.

"The World Beautiful." By Lilian Whiting. Most excellent in their high and elevating spirituality of thought. Series 1, 2, and 3, each complete in itself. Price, cloth, $1 per volume. For sale at this office.

"Mind and Body: Suggestions and Hypnotism Applied in Medicine and Education." By A. C. Halphide. President Chicago Society of Anthropology. For sale at this office. Price $1.

"The Bridge Between Two Worlds." By Abby A. Judson. This book is dedicated to all earnest souls who desire, by harmonizing their physical and their psychical bodies with universal nature and their souls with the higher intelligences, to come into closer connection with the purer realms of the spirit world. It is written in the sweet spiritual tone that characterizes all of Mrs. Judson's literary works. Price, cloth $1; paper, 75 cents. For sale at this office.

Open Letter to Rev. Moses Hull.

Rev. Moses Hull:—

My Dear Sir and Brother:—For some reason or other I am continually getting into some newspaper controversy, or epistolary argument on the subject of Spiritualism, and principally with orthodox ministers. The last controversial correspondence I had was with Rev. Henry Irving Rasmus, of South Park Avenue M. E. Church, Chicago, to whom I addressed a letter upon seeing a report of his sermon upon and attacking Spiritualism, in one of the Chicago papers. He is proving himself to be a very poor correspondent, for he has not answered my last three letters, nor has he acknowledged the receipt of a copy of "What Converted Me to Spiritualism," which I mailed to him with my compliments. I would give a good deal if I had retained copies of the letters I have addressed to him and secured his permission to publish the entire correspondence.

But my object in addressing you, Bro. Hull, is to place before you as our authority on Bible Spiritualism, the following assertion of my orthodox correspondent, viz.:

"I do not believe you can produce a single instance in the Bible where a once embodied spirit came back and spoke to men. You may cite the woman of Endor episode as a case, but there is grave doubt in my mind that this event is anything but a record of what 'seemed' to have occurred, rather than an actual occurrence."

Now what do you think of that as coming from an orthodox minister accustomed to a literal construction of the scriptures? Is it any wonder that the church is losing its hold upon thinkers when such loose interpretations of the Bible are made by the pulpit? Just think of it! "The Woman of Endor episode is a record of what 'seemed' to have occurred, rather than an actual occurrence." In other words, the Bible does not mean what it says, it is only fooling. Just pretending. It is only an inspired Baron Munchausen, so to speak, or an enlarged and somewhat improved edition of Mother Goose. The readers of The Progressive Thinker would be glad, I know, to read your reply to this letter.

Yours faithfully,
H. V. SWERINGEN.

OUR ECLECTIC MAGAZINE

YOUNG MAN'S SENSORY NERVES ARE TRANSPOSED.

Most Remarkable Case Ever Known to the Medical Fraternity Just Discovered in a Little Ohio Town.

YOUNG MAN SEVENTEEN YEARS OLD OF THE USUAL INTELLIGENCE, FEELS WITH HIS EYES, TASTES WITH HIS EARS, SMELLS WITH HIS TONGUE AND HEARS WITH HIS NOSE.

Jackson, Ohio, Nov. 29.—This little city is in the throes of a sensation which will shake the world—or at least that portion of it which men call scientific—from center to circumference, and demonstrate to the full that old saying that truth is stranger than fiction. Though billions upon billions of people have spent their alloted three-score-and-ten years upon the earth, never before has one been born with as great scientific value as a young man who is a resident of this city.

For many years scientific men have debated upon the subject of brain tissue and consciousness, and have finally agreed upon all points but one—namely, the differentiation of sensory centers. Now this point has been fully and definitely settled.

CAME FROM GERMANY.

Twenty-six years ago there came to this city from Pottsdam, in the Province of Brandenburg, Germany, August Schwardt and his wife, refined Germans, who had been forced to leave their native land on account of political troubles. In the Fatherland Herr Schwardt had been a most prosperous and successful merchant, and had amassed several million dollars worth of property, the greater portion of which he succeeded in turning into cash before he left the empire between two suns, leaving the rest of his property to be confiscated. For several years after he reached Jackson he was a social lion through all Southern Ohio, and many prominent men have been guests at his hospitable board. He did not engage in business of any kind, preferring to live the life of ease and luxury which his great wealth permitted, and his home was the scene of almost constant social gayety. But one day seventeen years ago a son was born into the household, and at the happy christening the heir to the Schwardt millions was named Henri. During the babyhood of the child the Schwardt home continued to occupy its same high place in the world of society hereabouts.

A WONDROUS CHANGE.

But there soon came a wondrous change. One day Herr Schwardt and his wife sent letters of regret to a prominent hostess and soon thereafter Mrs. Schwardt sent polite notes to her intimates, stating that she and her husband could accept no more invitations from their friends of former days, nor would the Schwardt home be open any more to those whose society she had so much enjoyed in years agone. "The reason," wrote she, "is a private one which we cannot make public at this time, when God has sent us the greatest trial that his children have ever been brought to bear. Wondrous, indeed, are the works of him, whose intent is beyond the ken of mortals to fathom." Then became the Schwardts hermits, as it were, and their hitherto happy home, a dark mysterious dwelling of broken-hearted parents who bore with religious fortitude the affliction which God had sent against them in the person of a son whose coming had been hailed with such delight only two years before.

As the child grew to boyhood and was occasionally seen by passersby wondrous tales of his madness were passed from mouth to mouth under the breath of sympathizing neighbors, and the inner circle of society lamented the affliction which had robbed it of its leader and the hospitality of the Schwardt home. But, as is always the case, the incident was soon forgotten and the Schwardts were left to bear alone their sad burden, while society round about them went on in its wonted way. It was the old, old story—"The King is dead! Long live the King!"—and a new leader assumed the reigns of government in Southern Ohio's four hundred.

A MYSTERIOUS VISITOR.

Three weeks ago the Schwardt home was visited by a distinguished-looking gentleman of unmistakable German bearing. He was the first guest the house had sheltered for fifteen years, and his arrival excited no little comment. It was soon ascertained that the mysterious stranger was none else than a renowned German specialist on brain diseases who had visited this country incognito in order to investigate American ways and methods. His reason for disguising his identity was his distaste for the notoriety to which his American brethren and the American press would subject him were his real self made known. He was a close relative of the Schwardt family, and came to Jackson to secure rest from his arduous labors in the field of American research. A few days after his arrival in Jackson the neighbors of the Schwardt family were very much surprised one morning to see a carriage draw up to the portecochere of the Schwardt home. A few minutes thereafter Mr. and Mrs. Schwardt, accompanied by their son, emerged from the house and entered the carriage, in which they were driven about the city for several hours. The young man was tall and sparely built, with light hair, blue eyes and a countenance almost deathly pale.

TOOK DAILY DRIVES.

For several days drives were taken every morning by the alien and his young relative, who were frequently accompanied by the latter's parents. At all other times the family and its mysterious guest kept themselves close within the house. Finally a persevering newspaper man unraveled the mystery by securing an interview with the visiting German, who gave his name as Dr. Carl Bruner, of the Royal Academy,, Berlin. The result of his discovery will furnish the scientific world the greatest sensation it ever has known. The alien revealed the fact that the young man's senses are in a most chaotic state. He is possessed of all his faculties, yet his eyes are sightless; his ears will not permit him to hear; his finger tips do not give rise to a sense of feeling; his tongue does not allow him to taste, and his nose is not possessed of olfactory powers.

SENSORY NERVES TRANSPOSED.

Strange as it may seem the alien says that his sensory nerves are so transposed that (to state the matter in the plainest language) the young man feels with his eyes, tastes with his ears, sees with his fingers, smells with his tongue and hears with his nose. In other words, his optic nerve is so perverted that it leads to that part of the brain tissue which gives rise to the sense of feeling. In like manner the auditory nerve leads to the seat of the tasting; the tactile nerves lead to the sight center; the gustatory nerve finds its way to the seat of smelling, and the olfactory nerve has its terminus at the center of hearing. It is wonderful almost beyond belief, but eminent scientists in support of their theories of differentiation of sensory centers have several times urged that such a thing might be possible, although this is the first time in history that it has been known to exist.

MANY STRANGE EXPERIENCES.

Of course the strange transposition of his sensory nerves and centers gives rise to many strange conditions. To take up the sense of sight. In him the nerve having its outer terminus in the eye has its inner terminus in the tactile area of the brain. Therefore when the young man sees a hot stove he feels as much pain as does a normal person who has touched the heated iron. Yet the sensation is not permanent, lasting only until he removes his eye from it. Normal conditions, such as the sight of a passing wagon, a running street car or things he sees daily do not give him pain. If, however, the wagon or the car was wrecked before his eyes he would feel as much pain for an instant as if he had been caught in the wreck. Only such things which give normal people pain to touch give him pain to see. He therefore feels hot when he sees a fire and cold when he sees ice or snow. The transposition of the visual nerve to the tactile brain center is mainly responsible for the boy's long isolation in a secluded room in his father's home, as the transposition of the other senses gives him no pain, only exposing him to strange experiences. When the young man hears a person speaking he really tastes the voice of the speaker—a soft, rich and mellow voice tasting very pleasant while a harsh, rasping and loud voice gives rise to a very displeasing taste. In this way the boy enjoys to the full fine music, but suffers from a discordant hurrah or laugh as would a normal person who had tasted an unripe persimmon. The nerve of feeling leads to the sight center, so when the boy's hand comes in contact with anything he sees it just the same as does a man whose eye performs its normal function. And here arises a peculiar condition. Only the fingers of the young man are sensitive in regard to the sense of feeling or rather sight. No other portion of his body will give off impressions of sight. When the young man wears a glove, in the course of the alienist's experiments, he is blind.

SEES AROUND CORNERS.

Another peculiarity is that he does not have to place his fingers on anything to obtain a visual impression of it. His exposed fingers in touch with the atmosphere permit him to see everything for miles around, the power becoming weaker as the objects grow more distant until it fails absolutely at about the same distance as does the power of sight possessed by a person on the ocean or on a plain. In this way he can really see around a corner or over a hill, but he loses the power altogether when his hands are gloved. It is a well-known scientific truth that the proper relation of the sense of taste to that of smell is absolutely necessary to a good state of health, and it is therefore no great wonder that, in this boy's disordered sensory mechanism, the nerve of taste leads to the olfactory brain center. Therefore when he eats food of any kind the resulting sensation is one of smell and not of taste. He has been experimented with several times, and many things, which give off a pleasant odor but have a really unpleasant taste, have been given him with the result that he relished them much as a normal person would fine fruit. The other sensory transposition is that of the olfactory nerve to the auditory brain area. The young man, therefore, is living proof that a thing can smell so loud that a person can hear it. The odor given off by fragrant flowers produces a soft and musical sound while decaying vegetable or animal matter makes an unpleasant sensation of hearing. Instances like these could be given by the score, and the reader can easily imagine how many strange experiences fall to the lot of young Schwardt in the course of a day. Now comes the most wonderful development in this strange case.

TO PERFORM OPERATION.

Dr. Bruner says he can cure his young relative and intends to perform an operation to restore his nervous system to a balanced condition. The sensory nerves are known to meet in a common center in the front upper portion of the brain, much as telephone wires are assembled in an exchange, and the alienist holds that the nerves have become crossed, as it were, at that point. He will open the boy's skull, take up each of the sensory nerves and connect it with the nerve from that portion of the brain area which produces the corresponding impression. The operation, of course, will be a very delicate one, but the average mind can easily understand the theory upon which the alienist will work. The severing of the nerves is, of course, out of the question and the alienist holds that such a move will not be necessary. It would, in fact, result fatally. He believes it impossible that a nerve should run directly from the boy's eye to the brain area of feeling and so on through the five senses. On the contrary, he thinks that the various sensory nerves have become so crossed and intertwined at that point in the brain which physiologists call the center of special sensation that he will be able, with extreme care, to disentangle them and restore each of them to its normal functions. Discussing the scientific aspect of this remarkable case Dr. Bruner said:

WONDERFUL NERVOUS SYSTEM.

"The functions of the nervous system are so complicated and so closely related to each other as to make it no easy matter for even the most learned man to form a conception of the system working as a whole. Ferrier, a renowned scientist and physiologist, has attempted to differentiate sensory centers. The case of this young man would seem to prove that there are very close and positive relations between the nerve center and the nerve extremities. No one now doubts that consciousness has an anatomical sub stratum, but the great problem of the relation between the two has been until now as far from solution as in the days when little or nothing was known of the physiology of the nervous system. The case of this young man proves that there is a positive and active relation between consciousness and the anatomical construction, for the remarkable transformation of this boy's sensory centers proves him to be a freak of anatomy and not a caprice of consciousness. He sees; he feels; he hears; he tastes; he smells; but the seat of each of his sensory impressions is connected at the nerve extremity with that part of his anatomy which, in normal people, is wont to receive other impressions or irritations.

THE SEAT OF CONSCIOUSNESS.

Since men have first studied the physiology of the human body consciousness has been driven steadily upward, step by step, until now it takes refuge in a few thousand nerve cells in a portion of the gray matter in the cortex of the brain. The ancients believed that the body participated in the feelings of the mind, and that, in a real sense, the heart could be torn by contending emotions. As science advanced consciousness took refuge in the brain, first in the medulla and lastly in the cortex. Even supposing that we are ultimately able to understand all the phenomena—chemical, physical and physiological—of this intricate ganglionic mechanism, we shall be no nearer a solution of the problem of the connection between the objective and the subjective aspects of the phenomena. It is no solution to resolve a statement of the phenomena into mental terms or expressions and to be content with pure idealism; nor is it any better to resolve all the phenomena of mind into terms describing physical conditions as in pure materialization. A philosophy that recognizes both sets of phenomena, mutually adjusted and ever interacting, may be no explanation; but at all events it is unpretentious, recognizes facts, and does not delude the mind by offering a solution which is no solution at all. As already said, research in anatomy and physiology and the observation of disease have driven physiologists to adopt the view that the brain is the organ of sensation. This is no doubt true in the sense that it ultimately receives all those nervous impressions that result in consciousness. Until now scientists have held that the parts transmitting the nervous impressions are, in another sense, as much concerned in the production of conscious states as the brain. Now, by the case of this young man, they are forced into the belief that the nerves transmitting the impression have nothing to do with the production of consciousness. The nerve extremity receives one impression; the nerve transmits this impression to the brain; but the brain gives forth an expression in no way similar to the impression received at the nerve extremity.

NERVES ARE INTERDEPENDENT.

Consciousness extends from its special seat so far as there is continuity of the impressed condition. When an irritation is applied to a nerve extremity in a finger or elsewhere the impression (or rather the impressed condition) travels as is generally understood, but really exists for at least a moment along the whole length of the nerve, and as soon as there is continuity of the impressed condition from finger to brain the consciousness is in connection with the nerve and is directly aware of the irritation at the nerve extremity. This view is quite consistent with all the facts of nervous physiology and keeps clear of the prevailing error in the philosophy of modern physiology—that of regarding the body and even the nervous system as a vast series of independent organs, losing sight of the community of function and interdependence of parts.

SEATS OF DIFFERENT SENSES.

Ferrier, as has been said, has attempted to differentiate sensory centers. After numerous experiments he placed the auditory center in the superior temporosphenoidal convolution; the centers of taste and smell at the extremity of the temporosphenoidal lobe; and that of touch in the gyrus uncinatus and hippocampus major. On the other hand, Goltz states that he can no more obtain distinct evidence of localization in reference to vision or other sensations than in reference to movements. Ferrier's view is supported by Munk, who has put forth the important distinction that there may be blindness in the sense of total deprivation of vision and "psychical blindness" or the inability to form an intelligent comprehension of the visual impressions received, and he supposes that the gray matter of the cortex over the occipital lobes has to do with the elaboration of simple visual impressions into perceptions. In like manner he concludes that other parts of the cortex may have to do with the elaboration of tactile, olfactory, gustatory and auditory sensations. Thus the frontal lobes have to do with cognition and intellectual action. If so, the gray matter on the surface of the brain may be mapped out into three great areas—an area concerned in cognitions in front, a motor or ideo-motor area in the middle and a sensory area behind. The latter area is divided into five, or rather four subdivisions, as the olfactory and gustatory areas are practically one. The tactile area is located at the top of the back portion of the brain; immediately under this is the visual area; under this is the auditory area; and at the base, in the extremity of the temporo-sphenoidal lobe, are the areas of taste and smell.

SENSES POSITIVELY DIFFERENTIATED.

The case of this young man will prove to the scientific world three things: First, that sensory centers are differentiated and each of the five senses finds its expression in a separate portion of the brain area; second, that there is individual connection between each of the sensory centers and the nerve extremities; third, that the sensory areas in the brain are so positively differentiated that they will perform their respective offices even though the nerves bearing the sensations which cause them to form expressions have outer termini abnormally located in organs which are wont to perform other functions.—Cincinnati Enquirer.

THE OCCULT WORLD.

Skeptics Are Constantly Being Converted to Spiritualism.

DEAD WIFE AND CHILDREN HOLD CONVERSE WITH HUSBAND AND FATHER—INCIDENTS OF THE SEANCE.

The recent articles in the Sunday Record-Herald regarding Mrs. Piper, Professor Hyslop, Spiritualism and telepathy have attracted wide attention, and, as it were, have centered public attention in a measure on the future state. Another remarkable addition to the series is herewith presented. The Sunday Record-Herald is not permitted to publish the name of the writer, but it can assure its readers that he is trustworthy, and, while not highly distinguished, is a man of some mark in the political and literary world. His story is notable in many respects and is worthy the consideration of an investigating public.

I read with a great deal of interest "The Confessions of Mrs. Piper," which you published some time ago; also the article on Professor Hyslop in last Sunday's edition of the Record-Herald. The most important question ever asked in this world is, "If a man die, shall he live again?" and it is as new to-day as it was in the times of Job.

A few months since I lost my wife. It seemed as if the whole earth had fallen from beneath me. I had a Christian's faith that she had gone to the Christian's heaven, but there are times when faith weakens and stricken mortals cry out for something more. Believing is not knowing. I began to doubt. Would I ever meet my wife again? If so, would I know her, love her? There was no answer to my doubts and fears. I could only suffer.

GETS A NEW LIGHT.

One day a friend called on me. He had lost his wife years ago, and sympathized with me. In the agony of my heart I cried out, "Oh, if I only knew my wife yet lived. I believe, but I do not know."

He looked at me curiously, and then asked: "B—, what would you give to know that your wife lives, to even talk with her?"

"Give! I would give anything, if such a thing were possible," was my answer.

"It is possible," he responded quietly; "I have talked with my wife since she died."

I could only stare at him in amazement, but at last managed to ejaculate: "Are you crazy?"

"Not in the least," he responded; "but there is a medium—"

He got no further. "Stuff and nonsense," I broke in; "frauds and mountebanks, the whole lot."

"I do not blame you for thinking so," he replied, "but listen."

He then told me of a medium in the city who had extraordinary powers. She was not a public medium—in fact, it was hard work to get a sitting with her. If he could arrange a sitting would I go, if nothing more than for curiosity?

"Yes."

VISITS THE MEDIUM.

It took him two months before he arrange the sitting. It was to be in the evening. I took another friend with me, a cool, hard-headed man. He had lost a son some years ago before, but believed in Spiritualism no more than I did—in fact, was inclined to take a materialistic view of things.

We found the medium to be a pleasant-faced woman, apparently about 40 years of age. She was slender and looked to be in delicate health. She was modest and retiring and seemed adverse to speak of her powers. With her were two young women, one her daughter.

The room in which the sitting took place was an ordinary parlor off of the sitting-room. The room from a casual observation had no furniture except a center table and some chairs. There was nothing on the center table except a very ordinary looking tin horn. I picked it up and looked at it. It was made in three sections, so as to close up like a telescope. When opened its full length it was about eighteen inches long.

I asked the medium what it was for. She replied that it was to collect the tones of the spirit's voice and render it more audible.

THE SEANCE BEGINS.

There were six of us in the room—the medium, the two young ladies, my two friends and myself. We were seated around the center table, each lady placing her hands on her knees and a gentleman placing his hands over hers, so that she could not stir or move without the gentleman holding her hands knowing it. I can only vouch for the young lady whose hands I held. She did not move during the whole seance. My friends say the same of the ladies whose hands they held.

When we were told how to sit the medium extinguished the lights and we were in the dark. In the case of Mrs. Piper all chances of fraud were eliminated. Here, I am free to confess, they were not. Yet what happened was so much more remarkable than anything told by Professor Hyslop that, even suspecting fraud, it still remains inexplicable.

After we had become seated and the lights were turned off, the medium asked the young ladies to sing. They sang in low, sweet tones that well-known hymn, "We Shall Gather at the River."

The hymn finished, we sat for some time in silence, when I heard the horn move, then a sound as if it had been taken from the table. A moment afterward I received three sharp taps on my left breast.

VISITS FROM SPIRITS.

Then came an audible voice, perfectly distinct, but speaking in an aspirate tone. Then came in succession what purported to be the spirits of a son, a daughter and the wife of my Spiritualistic friends, and they held quite extended conversations.

But this article has to do with only what happened to myself. My thoughts were now entirely on my wife. Would she come? Was it a hoax my Spiritualistic friend was playing on me?

When one spirit got through with the horn we could hear it placed back on the table, and another would take it up. Sometimes it would sound as if dropped quite a distance.

At last the horn was taken up, and then came the words, as plainly as if spoken by a living person:

"Papa! Papa! Papa!"

Still my entire thoughts fixed on my wife, I had no idea that the message was for me.

"Is that you, G—?" asked my Spiritualistic friend, thinking his son had returned.

"No, no! I don't want you," was the answer.

Then my other friend, thinking of the boy he lost, asked: "Is it I you want?"

"No, no! I don't want you."

This left me as the only gentleman, and much perplexed, I asked: "Is it I you want?"

"Yes, yes! Oh, papa, how glad I am to see you."

"Who is it?" I asked, astonished.

"I—"

It was the name of a little boy I had lost years before while residing in a neighboring state. No one present, not even my friends, knew I ever had such a child. I had not been thinking of him—had not thought of him for weeks. It was only of my wife I was thinking. Still with my thoughts full of her I asked:

"Where is your mother?"

"She is here. She is going to talk to you presently. Oh, papa, how glad I am for this opportunity to talk with you. I am happy, perfectly happy."

Every word was distinctly spoken.

After another spirit had talked there came in lower tones, but distinct: "A—; it's A—" the name of my wife.

Now here was a peculiarity. During her last illness my wife almost always alluded to herself in the third person. It was "A—wants this," instead of "I want it."

NO TIME TO DOUBT.

"Oh, A—, is this you? Can it be you?" I asked in a doubting voice.

"B—, don't doubt! don't doubt," was the answer, in an aggrieved voice.

"A—, if this be you, can you tell me what happened before you died and where you died?"

"I died away from home in a hospital, but don't talk about it. I can't talk about it. B—, don't grieve so over my death. I am happy. The children are here. Mother is here."

Then came the sudden query: "B—, what did you do with my things? Don't you remember when you went up in the chamber and opened my trunk and took out my black dress and looked at it and cried so? I was right by you then."

A few days after her burial I had gone alone to her trunk, took out her things, and unfolding a black dress which she was accustomed to wear, had shed many burning tears over it. But the circumstance had passed from my mind. Certainly I had not thought of it for days.

She then bade me good-bye, saying she would talk to me again before I went away.

HIS LITTLE GIRL SPEAKS.

After two or three other so-called spirits had talked, the words "Papa!" "Papa!" again were heard.

"Is that you, I—," I asked.

"No, it's E—."

It was the name of a little girl I had lost some seven years before.

"Why, E—," I answered, "you can't remember me; you were scarcely more than a year old when you died."

"But I have seen you since and loved you. Now I have talked with you I shall love you more than ever. Oh, papa, how glad I am to see you, and talk with you."

There now came the sound of two kisses. The kisses were not pressed to my lips or cheek, but seemed to be a foot or two away.

"E—, is your mother there yet?"

"Yes, and she will talk with you again presently. Isn't she a nice, sweet mamma? Papa, when mamma died I was there. Don't you remember after she died, and you went to go out of the room, you nearly fell, and the doctor caught you, and told you not to grieve so; mamma was better off?"

HAD FORGOTTEN IT.

A true circumstance, but one I had entirely forgotten, for the same thing had been told me by many others. Could this have been telepathy, something entirely forgotten by me?

I then said: "Darling, I have a picture of you at home."

"Yes, it hangs over your desk. Isn't it cute? Now, good-bye, papa, and God bless you."

My wife came again. She said:

"Oh, B—, how I bless you for coming here to talk with me. Is it not wonderful we can talk? How glad I am you came. B—, don't, don't grieve over me. Mother is here. Your father and brother are here. Uncle is here. the children are here. We are all together, and all so happy. I can't talk any more now, but do, B—, come again, and I will write you a communication. Good-bye, and God bless you."

The above are the facts as they actually occurred. I have no explanation to offer. One of three things must be true. The voices were from the other world, the medium had a confederate concealed who did the talking, or she herself was an accomplished ventriloquist.

Even admitting fraud, by what power were the answers given? There was no hesitation. The talk was as natural as if the person had been before me. I know not what to think; it is natural for man to doubt. I doubt. Would I still doubt if one was raised from the dead?

The CO-RO-NA MEDICATOR

A natural evolution from E. J. Worst's famous Catarrh Inhaler that has won a world-wide reputation. It is made of Nickel and will last a life time; is so compact it may easily be carried in a vest pocket or reticule.

Cures Diseases by destroying the Germs that produce them. The latest discovery for treating Catarrh and all diseases of the Air passages by dry air inhalation.

Catarrh.

Don't take medicine into the stomach to kill germs of Catarrh in the head. If you will only stop and think for a moment you will certainly realize that the germs of disease were carried into your head by air, and that air is the only agency that will carry a medication to the diseased passages capable of destroying such germs. Catarrh, Head Colds, Pains and Roaring in the Head, Bronchitis, Sore Throat, Headache, Partial Deafness, La Grippe and all diseases of the air passages yield as if by magic to treatment with the Co-ro-na Medicator. Science and common sense can offer no improvement upon this little pocket physician. It is simple in construction and may be used anywhere and at any time. It is the only positive cure for the diseases named. I make it easy to prove this beyond all question by my remarkable SPECIAL OFFER.

Cleveland, O., March 25, 1901.
E. J. WORST, Ashland, O.
Dear Sir:—My family and myself have used one of your Catarrh Inhalers for several years and always with prompt and pronounced effect. It is a wonderful remedy which I feel fully warranted in recommending to my friends. We cannot do without it. Please send us two new Inhalers complete, as one of our friends wants one also. Truly yours, (Signed)

Hayes, Ala., 1902.
E. J. WORST, Ashland, O.
Dear Sir:—Enclosed find price of the Medicator. I have been using it for two weeks and would not take $100 for it if I could not get another. I can sing, something I have not been able to do for two years. I always had to stop singing to clear my throat. My husband is surprised at my improvement. Yours truly, (Signed) MINNIE COLLINS.

E. J. WORST,
I enclose price for the Medicator. It is the best thing for Catarrh I ever saw. I have tried only I ever used. I would not sell it at any price if I could not get another. I enclose the price for two more. Yours truly, (Signed) J. D. S. ATKINS, Durham, N. D.

E. J. WORST,
I received your Inhaler Feb. 1st and am more than pleased with it. It has done me more good in three days than any other remedy I ever used. I would not sell it at any price if I could not get another. I enclose the price for two more. Yours truly, (Signed) W. H. BAKER, Richland, Kan.

SPECIAL OFFER

To demonstrate how easily, quickly and completely the CO-RO-NA Medicator will cure you, we will mail to any reader naming this paper one of my new Scientific CO-RO-NA Medicators complete with medicine for one year, and full directions for a cure for $1 as a new trial and you are pleased in every way, then send us $2.00 to pay for it. If not, return it at the expired time, which will cost you only 5c postage. In this way you can test this unequalled treatment absolutely free; then if you are not convinced that it will cure you, you still have your money. Can any offer be fairer? You're taking no chance. MISSIONARY WORK.

Stirring Appeal by Active Workers.

Our work as missionaries for the N. S. A. is not yet fully commenced, as we had the months of November and December placed for service in Philadelphia and Pittsburg. We had a successful month in Philadelphia, and found the society presided over by Brother Locke to be a successful organization with large attendance each Sunday. We also had good meetings in Royersford, Pa., and Paterson, N. J. Each of these places has an earnest working society. The zeal manifest is full of promise. Usefulness and success depend upon zeal. It is only a question of effort to succeed everywhere.

It is a deplorable fact that a large number of places made reply to us that they cannot get a meeting for us in their town because it is a bigoted place, full of churches, or an equally depraved place, full of saloons. That the several churches dominate the town, is an oft-told tale. They fear an audience could not be obtained. All such statements only go to show that we are needed in such places. We have found that similar localities will turn out large audiences, because the people, being ignorant of what Spiritualism teaches, are full of curiosity, especially if some demonstration of spirit power or presence is offered. And the people are very much dissatisfied with their various churches and the faiths they have been taught, hence are ready to witness a fact or listen to a recital of their occurrence. The ministers may dominate socially, but they are no longer absolute mentally; for the people will think, and they are anxious to investigate.

One or two Spiritualists may reside in such a community where none of our speakers or mediums may have visited; and these isolated friends of our cause feel a great diffidence in holding the first public meeting. We have found that our friends are respected for their being honest. A hypocrite is always despised by everybody. But, hypocrisy is not the cause of a failure to arrange for a public meeting as much as is the expense and risk. Whilst we only ask for a hall and advertising to be provided, the same is often a great tax upon the one or two friends in the town or city. Many are also a little over anxious for success, and too sensitive about the possibility of failure.

Remember, friends, that the N. S. A. want us to visit your place and create a public interest in our cause, or, at least, to proclaim its good news. That is our duty. And the N. S. A. is sincerely desirous of helping you. We will always meet our share of the burden, and will gladly risk a voluntary collection.

Our experience is that the people who do not accept Spiritualism and who are devoted sectarists, are as a rule liberal contributors at our meetings.

We have nothing to fear in a bigoted locality, in a depraved locality, in a church-dominated locality, in a place where no Spiritualists meeting was ever held—but have everything to gain!

Pennsylvania and New Jersey have lately demonstrated to us that we need just one earnest and zealous person in each locality. With such a person we can stir each place into a general desire to study and investigate the teachings and facts of Spiritualism. If one such person shall write to us and say that they will help us prepare for a meeting, we will gladly go when en route that way, and will not ask such a person to assume any more financial risk or expense than he is able or willing.

We may be able to re-visit Pennsylvania and New Jersey later in the year of our service for the N. S. A., say in the spring or fall of 1902. Will the localities in these states each supply one earnest soul to help us? Write to us now! And we say the same for West Virginia, Kentucky, Tennessee, Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, Missouri—and and possibly for every state. Write to us! If you are an earnest Spiritualist and are willing to provide, or help to provide for us, boldly or under cover, directly or indirectly, so you shall do so effectively, we will gladly risk all we can risk to be with you and boldly proclaim the good news of Spiritualism the best we can.

Address us at 600 Pennsylvania avenue, S. E., Washington, D. C. Come forth and help a little (ever so little is better than none at all), and do not expect the N. S. A. and its missionaries to carry the whole burden.

THE PSYCHOGRAPH
—OR—
DIAL PLANCHETTE.

This instrument is substantially the same as that employed by Prof. Hare in his early investigations. In its improved form it has been before the public for more than seven years, and in the hands of thousands of persons has proved its superiority over the Planchette, and all other instruments which have been brought out in imitation, both in regard to certainty and correctness of the communications received by its aid, and as a means of developing mediumship.

Do you wish to investigate Spiritualism?
Do you wish to develop Mediumship?
Do you desire to receive Communications?

The Psychograph is an invaluable assistant & pamphlet with full directions for the Formation of Circles and Cultivation of Mediumship

with every instrument. Many who were not aware of their mediumistic gift, have, after a few sittings, been able to receive delightful messages. A volume might be filled with commendatory letters. Many who began with it as an amusing toy, found that the intelligence controlling it knew more than themselves, and became converts to Spiritualism.

Capt. D. B. Edwards, Orient, N. Y., writes: "I had communications (by the Psychograph) from many other friends, even from old settlers whose gravestones are moss-grown in the old yard. They have been highly satisfactory, and proved to me that Spiritualism is indeed true, and the communications have given my heart the greatest comfort in the severest loss I have had of son, daughter, and their mother."

Dr. Eugene Crowell, whose writings have made his name familiar to those interested in psychic matters, writes as follows: "I am much pleased with the Psychograph. It is very simple in principle and construction, and I am sure must be far more sensitive to spiritual power than the one now in use. I believe it will generally supersede the latter when its superior merits become known."

THE LYCEUM GUIDE

Do you want to organize a society, for the social, intellectual and spiritual advancement of the children and adults?

THE PROGRESSIVE LYCEUM

furnishes all you desire.

Do you want a self-sustaining society, founded on the basic principles of the spiritual philosophy? You have it in THE PROGRESSIVE LYCEUM. It furnishes a system of evolution or internal growth; not the old cup and pitcher Sunday-school. It has something to interest and advance every member, and those who are most active in teaching are the ones who learn most.

NO SPECIAL INSTRUCTOR REQUIRED.

THE LYCEUM GUIDE gives every detail needed for effective organization, and for conducting the society when established.

It has Golden Chain Recitations; the prettiest songs and music; choral responses; a service for a Band of Mercy; calisthenics; how to make the badges, flags and banners; marching exercises; full instructions in conducting the exercises, with parliamentary rules, etc.

Many Spiritualists living in isolation, have formed lyceums in their own families; others have banded, two or three families together, while large societies have organized on the lyceum platform, and found great interest in this self-instructive method.

Do not wait for a "missionary" to come to your assistance, but take hold of the matter yourself, procure copies of the GUIDE, and commence with the few or many you find interested.

Mrs. Emma Rood Tuttle (address, Berlin Heights, Ohio) will answer all questions pertaining to lyceum work.

The price of THE LYCEUM GUIDE is 50 cents, postpaid, or by the dozen, 40 cents each, by express, charges paid by receiver. Address

THE OTHER WORLD AND THIS.
A compendium of Spiritual Laws. No. 1, New White Cross Literature. By Augusta W. Fletcher, M. D. In this volume the author, in the thirty-nine chapters, discusses a wide variety of subjects pertaining to Spiritualism, from a spiritualistic standpoint. She evinces the powers of a trained thinker, both in matter of thought and fine literary style, and capability of thought expression. The subjects are well handled with conciseness and yet with clearness. It will prove a rich addition to any Spiritualist's library, and a most excellent book for any one seeking information concerning Spiritualism and its teachings. Price $1.50.

A Serious Question for Spiritualists.

What would a church be, without its Sunday-school? Similarly, what is a Spiritualist society without a lyceum?

A church without a Sunday-school would lose its best recruiting station, for, as has justly been recognized and said, "the Sunday-schools are the nurseries of the church."

Similarly it ought to be recognized by Spiritualists that the lyceums are the nurseries of the Spiritualist societies. They are the recruiting stations for Spiritualism. They are the schools of drill where minds are molded in the pattern exhibited in the beautiful philosophy of Spiritualism, imbibe its ethical principles, and become familiar with its phenomenal characteristics.

If the churches were to drop their Sunday-schools and allow their children to drift into Spiritualist lyceums—how long would the churches last? From generation to generation they would dwindle, becoming "beautifully less," year by year, until all would be engulfed in the larger and sweeter knowledge of Spiritualism. Sunday-schools are a necessity to the churches. Without them, no power on earth could drive the dogmas of orthodox faith into the minds of any large number of people. The churches must impress their tenets on the plastic minds of the young before they arrive at the age of mature reason, or rarely will their teachings be accepted and believed.

Now, contrariwise, if Spiritualist societies have no lyceum, and allow their children to drift into orthodox Sunday-schools, there to imbibe orthodox notions, and hear Spiritualism condemned and ridiculed, learning to hate it as an evil thing that is condemned by the "word of God," etc., what, we ask, may reasonably be expected, but that children so taught will find their home in the churches, and Spiritualist societies, thus derelict in duty, will die, or live a sort of living death, holding on to a precarious existence, of uncertain quality and quantity?

Seriously, it is certain that Spiritualists do not sufficiently realize the immense importance to our cause, the importance to Spiritualist societies, of children's lyceums.

Every Spiritualist society should have its children's lyceum. It should be regarded as not less important as an aid auxiliary to our cause and to the society, than the speakers and the mediums who minister in our philosophy and phenomena. While these minister to the needs and desires of the mature-minded, let the children's lyceum impart instruction especially adapted to enlighten and cultivate the minds of the young in the rudiments of spiritual truth, philosophy and ethics.

With the aid afforded in particular by the Lyceum Guide (price 50 cents), published by Hudson Tuttle, Berlin Heights, O., it is easy to organize lyceums. It gives every detail needed for effective organization, and for conducting the same after it is established.

The Advice Was Not Good.

Paul ought to have seen the pernicious evil of wine drinking in his day, and discouraged its use, instead of directing his beloved brother, Timothy, to "No longer use water, but take wine for his stomach's sake, and far his many infirmities." He must have known that the Master was called a wine-bibber, and that he used his miraculous powers in manufacturing the beverage when the article gave out on the third day when the guests were already "well drunken."

In the introductory verses of I. Corinthians, Paul thanks God that the church at Corinth was sanctified, and in everything was enriched in Christ, and he assured them they were not behind in any gift. From this we judge that church was a model in its way.

Now, turn, good reader, to I Corinthians, 11:20,21, Revised Edition, and read:

"When therefore ye assemble yourselves together, it is not possible to eat the Lord's supper; for in your eating each one taketh before other his own supper; and one is hungry, and another is drunken." The Douay translation renders this: "One indeed is hungry and another is drunk."

And then, evidently startled that the members of the church could not keep sober when assembled to eat the Lord's supper, he exclaimed: "What? have ye not houses to eat and to drink in?"

That question suggests that some old-time Mrs. Nation may have been moving around in that goodly Grecian city, and knocked the drinking-houses into smithereens with her little hatchet. Whether that was the case or not, Paul ought to have been more considerate than to have encouraged his brother Timothy to look upon the wine when it was red. We can scarcely forgive him for volunteering such advice, knowing as he must the bad use other Tims would make of the intoxicant.

The Logic That Established Christianity.

At the annual fair in Boulogne, as reported in the Freethinker, by a correspondent who was in attendance, there was on exhibition a few of the actual implements which were employed by Holy Mother Church to make Christians; and keep them loyal to the faith. The inventive genius of the Middle Ages was exhausted by the church to devise instruments of torture, which priests employed in place of facts or logic to extend devotion to their creed. Here is a description of a few of them:

The Mask of Ignomy.—An iron crown weighing about thirty pounds.

The Boot.—One of the victim's feet was incased in this contrivance, into which was poured boiling oil.

The Thumbscrew.—Applied to those who were not sufficiently patient during trial.

The Nuremburg Hatchet.—Anyone menacing a priest with gesture of hand or foot had the offending member severed by this instrument.

L'Arrache-Langue.—A device for forcibly removing the tongues of those who spoke against the Inquisition.

The Spider.—Applied to women accused of suckling the children of heretics. Its object was to incapacitate them from further offense in that direction by violently tearing out their breasts.

The Bastile Pillory.—For those condemned to starve in the damp dungeons. To increase their sufferings the choicest viands were placed before them.

Branding Iron.—To mark the bodies of those who refused to make donations to the Inquisition.

The Garrotte.—Used for strangling those who recanted before going to the stake. That was the only grace they could obtain. Die they must.

The Pater Noster.—An arrangement for applying to the hands of the condemned about to perish in the flames. It held them together in the attitude of prayer.

The Brodequin.—An instrument for placing upon the legs. When closed, the blunt points with which the interior was furnished entered the shin bone and crippled the victim for life.

The Pear of Anguish.—This was inserted in the mouth of those who inconvenienced the Inquisitors by their cries. By turning a screw the mouth could be widely distended, and articulation was impossible.

Serre-Tete.—A band of iron placed around the victim's head and then contracted. This was applied to those who wrote or spoke against the Inquisition.

The report says, many instruments of torture were on exhibition, and their mode of application was illustrated with wax models. Inclosed in crystal caskets were shown four terrible figures, the actual remains of tortured heretics. They were discovered in 1861 in the Convent of San Domingo, Mexico, in a wall thirteen feet thick. They were better preserved because of the dry air than some of the mummies in the British Museum.

Think of it. Every one of these instruments of agonizing torture were applied by priestly hands, or under their direction, to aid in advancing the Christian religion. Protestants shared in the results. Had it not been for the groans, and tears, and awful agony, and the innumerable multitudes of lives sacrificed in the propagation and in sustaining the faith, there would have been no Protestants. They are the inheritors of all the benefits accruing to the church because of these outrages, and we hold the system, without regard to name, or time of organization, responsible for every wrong inflicted on humanity to aid in its propagation.

Football Methods in Religion.

Boston may not go so far as to carry religion onto the gridiron, but it has gone so far as to bring football methods into religious services.

Flushed with the recent success of Harvard over Yale, two athletes last Sunday afternoon addressed the Boston Young Men's Christian Association. One took for his text, "Three Downs, Four Yards to Gain," and then showed the likeness between the Christian's career and that of the football enthusiast. He ended by saying: "Christ is the best coach I know of."

In a similar vein the other athlete advocated the advantages of a strenuous life and urged the football spirit into daily religious affairs. Nothing was said of the Christian spirit of helpfulness to the weak, compassion for the downtrodden or of the blessedness of mercy. All of the essentially Christian virtues were wholly lost sight of in appreciation of the controlling, domineering power of the victor.

Football unquestionably has its valorous and meritorious side, but its merits belong to the physical—we do not say brutal—and to the crafty intellectual powers rather than to the spiritual. They savor of earth rather than of heaven, of the conqueror rather than of the crucified.

A little more of the methods of religion on the gridiron would result to better advantage than applying the methods of the football to religion.

Christ may be a good coach, but the football teams are usually governed by another master.—Chicago Chronicle.

Instead of urging upon Christians the exemplification of football strenuosity in religious methods, these religionists would do well to study history and recognize the fact that, from the days of Constantine and before, down to the present, the spread of Christianity, so-called, has been wrought by the coercive power of physical force, by wars of conquest, by arms and bloodshed, by persecutions, by Inquisitions, by compulsion under laws enacted under church influence and executed by civil governments as directed by priestly suasion.

The methods of genuine spiritual suasion and true spiritualization have been ignored, and strenuous compulsion along lines of physical force has been applied under the dominating influence of the so-called Christian church.

These preachers of strenuous football methods should recognize that a new era is upon them, an era of spiritual methods, spiritual growth and spiritual manhood, in which the spiritualization of man is to be accomplished by the pervasive influence and sweetly suasive force of spirit power working in, through, by, and up toward the ever-advancing ideal of higher Spiritualism.

There is in this higher spiritual method, nothing akin to the brute-force strenuosity of football Christianity as exemplified in the church history of the past. It is the method of free thought, peacefully seeking the truth, and accepting the same upon honest conviction, without churchly compulsion, let or hindrance.

The modern trend of enlightened society is away from football Christianity, into the larger and higher spiritualization of mankind, as developed by mental freedom and a knowledge of present-day truth brought by the angel world.

Less footballism and more spirituality is what the world wants.

Buried Alive.

The Chicago Tribune sets forth that, put to sleep by his own hypnotic control over himself, or by sheer will power—call it what you will—Carl Atheno, a young man, spent five days recently buried alive in a coffin six feet below the ground at Kansas City, Mo. Without food or drink, and with only a meager supply of air furnished through a small tube, he lay dozing in full sight of the multitudes of people who peered down another tube into a coffin illuminated by an incandescent light.

At last the day of resurrection came. The uprising was to take place in the evening in the full glare of the electric lights. Two thousand people came to see this, and the rest of the city stood around on the outside of the fence. Atheno was disinterred and was lifted, practically appearing dead, out of the coffin on to the platform. There was a slight pulse, beating at 58, and some warmth persisted in the body. The clothes were covered with dust. He was to awake at 9 o'clock. The handling of his body had no apparent effect on Atheno, but when an alarm clock went off under his ear he sprang to his feet, called out "Hello, Pap," to "Pap" Wright, a boyhood friend whom he had not seen in twelve years, and was ready for supper.

It must not be inferred that he felt as fresh as after a little catnap. On the contrary, he could not stand alone after the first impulse, and had to be lifted over the fence to a carriage, taken to a hotel, bathed and chafed, fed on crackers and milk, and brought back to mundane things slowly.

But on the next day he was as fresh as ever. Now he gives out that next time he does this sort of thing he will stay buried ten days, and eventually forty will be about his figure. Atheno believes that once dead a man is dead for a long time, and it is a good thing to get used to the grave gradually. "In life prepare for death," is his motto.

The power by which this young man controls himself and earns $2,141 in five days from a Kansas crowd he claims to have acquired in India, where he traveled extensively. He asserts that it is the same hypnotic control that the fakirs of that country employ in their long trances, and that he is as good a man as any of them at the game. Out in Harper, Kans., where the boys used to play shinny with him, they don't take much stock in his hypnotic powers, but then—he has never been buried in Harper.

Saved Fish City.

Our archaeological readers will be interested in further information in regard to Oxyrinchus, of which we made brief mention, in reply to a correspondent recently. The modern name of this ancient city, situated on the western bank of the Nile, near the Libyan hills, is Behneseh. It is celebrated in history "for its vast number of monasteries anciently located there." The term Oxyrinchus signifies Sacred Fish. The Egyptologist will remember when Osiris was slain by his wicked brother Typhon, he was cut into fourteen pieces and cast into the Nile. All were recovered by Isis, save one part which was devoured by a fish. That fish was ever after sacred to an Egyptian, and the city of Oxyrinchus derived its name from it.

The curious student recalling the fact that the earliest symbol of Jesus was a fish, need not be told that this incident in the history of Osiris is probably the base on which that symbol was founded, and it is possible the monks, so numerous at Oxyrinchus, made the application. There is a world of mystery connected with the beginning of Christianity which a familiar knowledge of Egyptian history and thought will clear up.

Take this inscription on an Egyptian papyrus, now in the library in Turin, wherein Almighty God speaks of himself:

"I am the maker of heaven and of earth. I raise the mountains and the things which are on them. * * * * I make the hours, and the hours come into existence. I am Chepra in the morning, Ra at noon, Tmu in the evening."

There is a trinity we can understand. The Sun has one name in the morning, another at noon, another at evening; but wherever it is it is the same sun, the same Supreme God in Egyptian mythology. Shall we say: Out of this has grown Trinitarianism?

J. Clegg Wright's new book, consisting of his class lectures delivered last April in Washington, D. C., especially dealing with the science of mediumship and the philosophy of spiritual existence, will be ready for the subscribers in about three weeks. The book contains an introduction written by Dr. J. M. Peebles. The appearance of the volume has been delayed by unavoidable causes.

A FRAGMENT FROM AN UNPUBLISHED POEM.

With every infringement of Nature's laws,
We're sowing the seeds of sorrow,
Though it may be years ere its fruit of tears
Is harvested for the morrow.
And a disregard of the Golden Rule,
Of duty to our neighbor,
Is filling the world with want and crime
In lieu of honest labor.
But out of the little things of life,
Smiles, tears and deeds outwrought,
Love builds with care her temples fair,
By angel artists taught.
Out of the little things of life,
She buildeth things sublime,
But the grandest life is born of strife,
That comes like the winter's rime.
In the midst of darkness, or like storms,
When wrathful winds sweep by,
And trooping clouds hang low like shrouds
O'er the face of the midnight sky.
Out of the changing hopes and fears,
And the schemes that men pursue,
Are the pictures made in light and shade
Of life's dissolving view.
But the greatest need of the world to-day
Is a knowledge of psychic powers,
And the subtile forces of truth and love
To guide this world of ours.

Bogus Materializations.

Under the pretense of the materialization of spirits any amount of trickery is being perpetrated under the cloak of Spiritualism. This has been carried on to a most alarming extent; so much so that the state law-makers may be called upon by our enemies to enact laws that will prove detrimental to the mediums who are perfectly honest and should be protected. The Chicago American has the following from Muncie, Ind., under date of December 3:

"For alleged complicity in a huge swindle by which Miss Sarah Williams, aged fifty, was duped into paying Chas. Hawkins, a handsome young man, $3,600, part of which she secured by mortgaging her valuable farm, William J. Thompson, a former pawn-broker of this city, has been bound over to the Delaware County Circuit Court, his bond being fixed at $2,000.

"On the witness stand Miss Williams told a remarkable story of how the spirits of her departed father and mother had appeared to her in a seance and advised her to pay the money to Hawkins. Thompson, she said, conducted the seance, calling her father and mother, who told her the money would be safe in Hawkins' hands.

"Miss Williams herself is a Spiritualist, and was duped into believing that she was doing the right thing. Thompson has been a prominent leader of the cult in this city. Hawkins is at large.

"Tom Larmore, a Muncie police officer, found Thompson at Lawton, Oklahoma, where he recently entered a claim, and brought him back to this city.

"The swindle was one of the shrewdest ever perpetrated in this part of the country. Hawkins came to Muncie and engaged a room at the home of Miss Williams. He inquired into the affairs of the elderly maiden, told her his ambitions and finally proposed that they marry.

"He requested that she give him $1,000 to purchase a livery business in Michigan. She readily consented, parting with nearly all the ready money she had. Then she alleges he secured the aid of Thompson, and following the advice of her dead parents, she mortgaged her farm and secured $2,600 more which she gave Hawkins. He gave notes for the money and whether he can be prosecuted is a question."

The Chicago Tribune of December 5, contains the following:

"For two diamond rings, valued at $100, and $45 in cash, it is said that Dr. Harry Slater agreed to relieve Mrs. Annie Butler of 2412 Dearborn street of the attentions of an unwelcome visitor. The motive power to be adopted by the doctor, it is alleged, was evil spirits. Mrs. Butler waited for some time for results, but as the undesired attentions were continued with annoying regularity, while the absence of the rings and cash left a deficit in the domestic finances, she caused the arrest of the doctor. He was taken in charge by the Cottage Grove avenue police last night on a charge of obtaining money under false pretenses. Slater is said to net about $40 a night by his Spiritualistic performances."

So prevalent has questionable practices, under the garb of mediumship, become, and also the ordination of incompetent persons to pose as ministers, that many Spiritualists have become nauseated thereat, and are co-operating with the liberal churches. D. W. Hull, president of the State Spiritualist Association of Kansas, realizing some of the present evils afflicting our ranks, sends us the following:

To the Presidents and Executive Boards of the Several State Spiritual Associations:—Dear Brothers and Sisters:—While I believe that Spiritualism has come to call, not the righteous but sinners to repentance, and that we should accept all into fellowship who are trying to grow purer and better lives, no matter how often they fail and fall in their efforts, I am of opinion that we cannot afford to send out mediums and lecturers whose daily actions and lives are likely to be adversely criticised. If men and women are not upright in their conduct, if they swagger about the streets, use profane and indecent language; and if they use tobacco or alcoholic drinks, they are unfit to send out as mediums or lecturers, no matter what their education and talent may be. I also believe there should be uniformity in the rules adopted by the several state boards to govern them in the granting of ordination papers. I therefore propose the following, subject to amendments, and should be glad to hear from the members of the several state boards, either through the papers or directly.

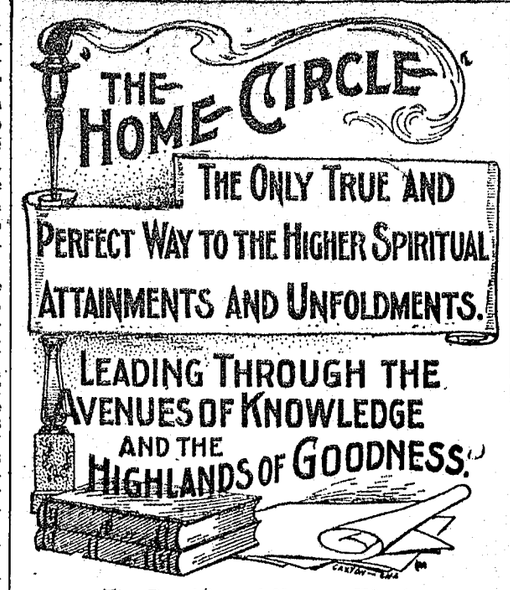
In making out ordination papers this board will be governed by the following rules:

1. The applicant should have the unanimous endorsement of his or her local society, or if there is no local society where the applicant resides, a petition should be presented containing the names of persons known to this board.

2. The applicant must be a person of good character, respected for his or her honesty and reliability, a person who has fair control of his or her temper and one whose deportment will be such as to give honor and respect to the cause of Spiritualism.

3. A person of low, vulgar habits, who uses profane and vulgar language in conversation, or associates with low and vulgar people, except to refine and lift them up, or uses intoxicating drinks, or tobacco or opium, is unfit to become a teacher of Modern Spiritualism and cannot be authorized as such by this board.

4. An uneducated person, or one who has an improper understanding of the philosophy of Spiritualism, makes egregious blunders as to Science or in the proper use of words, or who misplaces words, or is exaggerative, cannot be endorsed by this board as a public teacher.



5. A medium who is guilty of fraud or any exaggeration of his or her mediumship, or in any manner supplements the phenomena, or permits controls to supplement the phenomena, cannot be authorized to travel under the auspices of this association.

New Trial and Yearly Subscribers.

All new trial or yearly subscribers will have their subscriptions commence with the Hull-Jamieson debate, unless otherwise ordered. After publishing the debate in our regular edition, we combine them in one paper, No. 624, Nov. 9, at which time the debate commenced. That date contains six addresses of the debate. The next paper that all new trial and yearly subscribers will receive will be number 630, bearing the date of Dec. 21, and containing the seventh address of the debate.

The Repairing of Human Wrecks.

I.

As fully and lucidly set forth in the New York World, on one occasion, into the Bowery Mission with the rum-ruined, ragged throng that gathers every evening for the coffee and rolls distributed there came staggering a man dressed in the rough bagging east-side pawnbrokers deal out with the price of a drink in exchange for clothing. Besotted, unkempt, extremely dirty—he had slept the night before in a sewer pipe—he slunk into a seat—a mere wreck—and waited wolfishly for food that even a rum-burned stomach craves.

"Mother Bird," standing like a beautiful Angel of Love on the little platform, asked for a volunteer to play the great church organ in the hall. All sorts were on the benches, farm boys from Ohio, weavers from Maine, skilled mechanics, clerks, accountants, slip-shod, hungry, desperate, the wrecks of men, men falling to pieces, as it were, and this one, the worst of all, staggered forward.

"Mother Bird's" angelic heart sank within her as she saw him. He sat down at the organ. The first touch of the keys, however, revealed the master hand. From the majestic strains of some of those grand old German hymns he drifted, sobered by his playing, to the grand voluntaries that call the worshipers in great cathedrals to prayer. Suddenly he began that song that was born first in heaven—"Home, Sweet Home."

Tramps on the benches, not yet totally depraved, broke down and cried, and the organist himself to "Mother Bird," told how, the son of a wealthy German merchant, he had come to America to seek his fortune, had fallen into evil ways, had become the wreck he was. Kindly hands were outstretched to aid him, hands that belonged to "Mother Bird," the earthly guardian angel of the poor, the depraved, the unfortunate.

That was the life-story Organist Benke told at Bowery Mission on this occasion. He got a place in a music house in New York. Great churches have since sought his services as organist, but steadfastly he refuses, coming night after night to the little mission to play the organ and extend the helping hand to others such as he once was.

II.

Mrs. Sarah J. Bird, of Montclair, N. J., the woman who saved Benke, has devoted her life to the mission. The crowd that fills the hall is always changing, but she treats them with the cordiality that she would old friends. She can see beneath the grime and filth of the hobo the genius and bright intellect of the past. She sees the future angel in every human form.

When she came into the chapel, and said, "Good evening, boys," there came a chorus of "Good evening, Mrs. Bird," from the floor. Many of the men were drunk, and the violent shaking of the men who paraded the aisles could not keep them awake. Others came with cold, hard faces and curling lips, and tried their best not to hear what was said.

But as the motherly voice rang out over the hall, not exhortingly and with not a bit of cant and sectarianism, they fell to listening. Truly she was divinely inspired. She was telling the story of her own mother; of her own girlhood. With wonderful vividness she painted the picture of peace and love. Suddenly she exclaimed: "My mother is in heaven! How many here have mothers in the spirit realms?"

There was an impulsive forest of dirty hands over the heads of the men. Then, as if ashamed or caught in a wrong act, they lowered them.

"How many have mothers living on earth?" Again the hands went up. The wizened, crime-blackened countenances began to light up with interest.

"How many have wives and children?" This time there were not so many. Some of the men had deserted their wives. Others knew not whether their wives were living or dead Some had been ruined by faithless women. There was a momentary flash of resentment on some dark faces.

Then she asked how many wanted the prayers for those dear to them, wherever they might be. Nearly every hand went up. There were hundreds in the room who would have scorned to pray themselves, but there was no harm in asking "Mother Bird" to do so.

Hardened faces off in the crowd began to soften. Others, weak and ill from dissipation and exposure in the parks at night could not control their emotions. Their eyes glistened in the light of the electric lamps. Off in a corner a man sobbed and hid his face in the sleeve of his coat.

Mrs. Bird was followed by the superintendent of the mission, J. G. Hallimond. He pictured the delights of a home attainable by every man in the place would he but live in honest, moral ways. He pictured the reformation possible.

Twenty other reformed Bowery toughs told their experiences. Not one of the 600 roughs but was softened and subdued. Then came the refreshing and warming coffee and the delicious bread and ham. Dozens of men turned their faces upward then and there. They rose and in stuttering but determined words confessed their evil lives and their determination to reform.

At midnight, when the Bowery is at its worst, the crowd came slowly out of the mission into the red glare and racket of the street. The men who had promised to do better had been provided with bed tickets.

III.

"Mother Bird"—whatever her religion may be—is certainly angelic in the highest and broadest conception of that word, from the simple, though sublime fact that she is a repairer of human wrecks. To repair a wrecked engine, a wrecked car, a wrecked house, or a wrecked wagon, is easy compared with repairing a wrecked man, one whose body is saturated with whisky; and on whom vermin enjoy a saturnalia, of which the cleanly man knows nothing; to repair such a wreck requires something besides mechanical skill—the presence and love of an Angel of Light can only do it! Yet such a wreck is one link in the grand brotherhood of man, and must be repaired sometimes in the ever onward evolution of human souls.

IV.

You who have never repaired to some little extent a human soul, have neglected your duty, and are far beneath "Mother Bird" in point of being near to the angel world. A kind word acts at times as a healing balm to a wrecked man or woman, setting in motion a train of thought that may lead to evolving new conditions, while a harsh word, a bitter curse or disdainful smile, may crash through a human soul like a bullet through glass, leaving wrecked conditions behind.

No one is completely wrecked; no one is utterly depraved; no one is wholly lost. There are no lost souls—not one but who can be redeemed. The child is an animal with animal proclivities; sometimes these animal stains depart at an early age; with some they continue longer, while with others they continue late in life, producing those wrecks with which "Mother Bird" has to deal, and whom she is constantly trying to repair.

V.

It is a beautiful mission to repair human wrecks—wrecks that are unclean, distorted, made in the image of devils, and reeking with foul ulcers—wrecks that the lordly pass by without one sympathetic thought going forth like a messenger of good will, to act as a healing balm.

There was Jimmy Marsh, a semi-idiot, the papers said, and at times as violent as a savage. He was thirteen years of age, and oh! what a wreck, what a trouble to his bereaved parents! The mother clung to him through all his early career with those tender loving emotions which, could they have been crystallized, would have formed a cluster of pearls more beautiful than the rarest diamonds ever worn by a queen or earthly potentate. Her affections, like trailing vines in a sweet-scented arbor, wove themselves around her boy, and at last there was great rejoicing in the household, a wreck had been repaired, a human soul redeemed, and ignorance given a severe rebuke. A skillful physician detected the trouble, the skull compressed the brain in a certain locality, and when the cause was removed a wonderful transformation was the result! The boy was no longer violent. His eyes beamed with additional luster; he became docile, affectionate, cheerful, intelligent. He soon learned to read, and has every appearance of growing up unusually bright. Every human wreck has not the brain compressed producing the bad results; but heredity, environments, lack of early training in the right direction, have made them wrecks. Some can be easily repaired; others far more slowly, while others require years in order to completely repair the wrecks they are made.

There are many who are more or less wrecked. The lustful, selfish, licentious man, though a multi-millionaire, is partially wrecked. His thoughts go forth like vultures, like unclean birds of prey, and his aspirations are foul with odors of the hells of earth. He, too, needs repairing. In fact, the world needs more reformers, to dig sluice-ways, as it were, to purify the habits of men and women.

VI.

A wrecked woman is the worst of all wrecks; soaked with intoxicants, her mind a cage in which libidinous thoughts, like unclean birds, exist, sending forth their poisonous vibrations! One died lately in Chicago, while suffering from delirium tremens. She was known, the daily papers said, as Old Kate. She was nurtured in the slums; she lived in the slums; she carried on her deviltry there, and at last a human wreck that no one seemed able to repair, she was taken sick, and the foul images that her own miserable life had created, haunted her like so many realities. Hideous serpents she seemed to see, and her efforts to keep them away were piteous to behold. Rats apparently were gnawing at her vitals, and her curses in her delirium were painful to hear. She died surrounded with a cloud of gloom which her own distorted life had created. It is an inexorable law, that if one dies surrounded with a dark, dismal cloud of gloom, it is because it is a self-creation. One's life-acts determine the nature of one's death. Each criminal, licentious, lustful act or thought adds to the gloom of the death-bed scene; adds to the gloom thereof until more dismal than the liveliest imagination can conceive. Such a cloud of gloom is where the licentious acts of life seem to assume the form of snakes, vultures, rats and devils to torment its victim. Every wrecked human being in the slums of vice is unconsciously evolving this cloud of gloom, to overshadow the death-bed, rendering hideous the last moments. This cloud of gloom is not dissipated by death, but is transmitted to the spirit realms; it follows like a ghastly monster, the one through whose instrumentality it was formed. When Old Kate died her cloud of gloom that hovered over her death-bed, and which she alone evolved, went with her to the realms of souls, and from that alone she was judged. If you have made a cloud of gloom it will be your inseparable companion in the realms of souls until through the purifying influence of repentance and a desire to reform, and do good and be good, it will gradually dissipate. On the other hand, she who is engaged in repairing human wrecks, whose aspirations float heavenward laden with pure thoughts and high and noble purposes, who is constantly extending a helping hand like "Mother Bird," to the unfortunate—verily she is weaving a halo around her more beautiful by far than the heaven-born artistic tints that illuminate the wisps of clouds that surround the gates of the East at the morning dawn. We had rather be "Mother Bird," assisting human wrecks, cheering the despondent, sending forth pure, exalted, loving vibrations towards those surrounded by a cloud of gloom, than to occupy the Chair of State, or the throne of an Emperor. Heed carefully the lesson here imparted. Create a cloud of gloom by lustful selfishness that will follow you into the dark spheres of spirit life, or evolve a halo of light and love, by assisting the unfortunate, by repairing human wrecks, and by doing good and being good.

BIRDS OF PASSAGE.

Bearing Notes of Passing Events.

Birds of passage, bearing notes of passing events. Among them some thoughts suggested on reading reports of the late N. S. A. convention; which, of course, was opened with prayer, and after the praying—what? An harmonious spiritual meeting? One would judge not according to reports.

"Political wire-pulling" at a Spiritualist convention sounds badly, especially as we are so often told by the missionaries sent out by this association that the hope of Spiritualism in the future depends upon the support and success of the N. S. A. as a national organization. To one not directly interested, this seems a very forlorn hope.

If Spiritualism, with all its science, its phenomena, its all-embracing philosophy, has nothing stronger, or more enduring for its future support than an organization of "wire-pullers," the outlook is very discouraging indeed. But we are of the opinion the foundation of Spiritualism was laid for all time, long before the progenitors of the N. S. A. were born, and we have faith that the future of Spiritualism will far exceed its past or present.

Too much stress cannot be given to the importance of education as a factor in the progress of our cause. We heartily agree with Moses Hull in this, the importance of establishing schools and colleges for the instruction of our young women and men along Spiritualistic lines. Such a school has been in contemplation by the management of the Cassadaga Lake Free Association for a number of years. An inaugural step was taken last season which was a great success, and it is to be hoped at no distant day a college will be founded at Camp Cassadaga, N. Y., that will meet this long-felt need. The location is central for the United States and Canada, and a more beautiful spot could not well be found. Here is a chance to speed the cause of Spiritualism in the right direction; a place where bequests and endowments can be made and the donors feel sure their money will go for the purpose intended.

The present board of officers of this association are trustworthy and efficient, and it is reasonable to suppose when these loyal workers are called from their labors, others as trustworthy may be found to fill their places. And we hope this effort to establish a college on the grounds of Camp Cassadaga will meet the hearty support of all who have the means to give toward so important an object. Where are the Carnegies in our ranks? The hope of Spiritualism is education, and the hope will be realized. Education is the emancipation of the race. Spiritualists, there is no better work for you to do than to aid in the work of emancipation.

Man's Aural Self. By Charles Dawbarn.

CHAPTER TWELVE.

Spirit Return.

Perhaps the most serious objection to belief in the verity of spirit return has been the loss of intellectual capacity exhibited by the man who was renowned in earth life for his unusual acquirements, and powers of expressions. On the other hand, the celebrated Tom, Dick and Harry hold their own admirably in comparison with their illustrious descendents.

It is greatly to the credit of the investigating officers of the S. P. R. that they have discovered enough truth, in the midst of so much that is doubtful, to warrant their expressed belief in the identification of certain returning intelligences. Nevertheless the earnest student cannot help recognizing the fact that something is wrong somewhere. For even with these skilled and patient investigators there has been a very limited supply of identity, and still less evidence of supernal wisdom held for distribution by the spirit visitor.

It seems necessary for mere worldlings of the student variety, with whom the writer ventures to classify himself, to make a careful study of spirit return; first from the standpoint of the spirit, and then from that of the mortal.

It is well known there has been a most energetic and talented attempt to insult every returning spirit by calling him to his face "a subconscious fraud." As a matter of fact the study of subconsciousness had long been a necessity, for its manifestations had been often mistaken by both sensitive and investigator for evidence of the presence of a spirit visitor, who really was born and buried within mortal imagination, founded on ignorance. But when such writers claim that subconsciousness is the grand total of spirit return, and that the church, with its divine revelations, is the only repository for the dear departed, they have evidently reached the limit of their own grasp. They have seized more facts than they can hold. This work is not dedicated to proof of spirit return. The day has gone by when that was a necessity. The student who has no time for personal investigation can find scientific basis for his belief in the published records of the S. P. R., but is urged to make patient researches within his own family circle. But a knowledge of certain details of his own manhood, unknown and therefore untaught in schools and colleges, will both shorten the road and enable him to avoid many of the stumbling blocks branded by the inexperienced scientist as "fraud."

The key to subconsciousness, as well as to the power of suggestion, is found in the dual centers of the intelligence wielded by Homo. We must for a moment retrace our steps, and recall the fact that every man has, first, a mortal body, outlined in form, that our senses see and handle. Within this form, amongst many other organs, is found a brain which, by general consent, is acknowledged to be the diplomatic head of the form; receiving all external intellectual communications and replying to them to the extent of its power. This form we call Homo. It is a blending of a vast number of intelligent, independent entities we have called "units," each one of whom is an Ego, and an individualized fraction of Cosmos. Such is the man known to earth life, and whose experiences constitute history. On making a scientific examination of this form-manhood we discover that, like the sun and the planets, it is possessed of an atmosphere or aura, with attributes of intelligence of its own; and, like the form, necessarily composed of blended units. Having an intelligence far more outreaching than that of form, and working amid very different conditions, it has its own center analagous to a brain, but of shape unknown to us. Since this aura is of indefinite extent, and reaching outward in every direction, this portion of manhood has no form of which we can conceive. Our only possible conception of such a form would be to think of it as globular, but of indefinite extent.

We claim reasonable proof that our own manhood has two distinct centers of intelligence, with, at best, but a somewhat limited communication. What would be sight and sound to one would be darkness and silence to the other. Nevertheless a certain amount of communication does take place that, apparently on both sides, must consist of "suggestion by vibration," and its more or less imperfect interpretation. So much we have already discussed in previous chapters.

When the form disintegrates we have been taught to call the result "death." Homo has then disappeared from mortal sense, at least so far as it is strictly normal. It is curious to mark the attempt throughout human history to answer the question "after death what?" But in every case the answer has included a reappearance of more or less of the old form, but with certain added improvements in the shape of wings, etc. Usually this reappearance has to be outwrought by a stupendous miracle, which gathers every lost fragment into its old shape, all ready to take its part in a resurrection jubilee. But Modern Spiritualism, and some of its forebears, has insisted that by a general law of nature a new form is elaborated out of the old one during earth life. Under this teaching there seems to be some unexplainable connection between the old form and the new by which experiences and memories as well as shape, escape as from a cocoon of caterpillar earth life out into the new existence. It is needless to say that any such assumption will not bear examination, since it starts with a total ignorance of the real size of Homo's manhood. In fact it is founded on his littleness instead of his vastness, and therefore the religious conception is as limited as the knowledge.

That man lives after death has been a religious conception through all ages and among all peoples, with the possible exception of the Jews. It has remained for the later day scientist to assert that as form totally disintegrates particle by particle Homo has become a nonentity. From his standpoint he is correct. The province of the scientist has been among blended particles he could measure, weigh, compare and analyze. Among such particles, gathered even from the casket, there was never a trace of Homo. Yet every now and then came experiences that did not harmonize with this conception of annihilation. The religionist could always assimilate such experiences, for he counted them as either from God or the devil; and he kept an honored niche for the returning saint. The scientist, however, either called them hallucinations, or claimed them as products of Homo's subconsciousness. Yet he is very much perplexed by the fact that these "hallucinations" persist in the assertion that they were once mortal.

The world is much indebted to the patient and prolonged investigations of a number of gentlemen who banded together to study the occult in human experience. To frivolous outsiders they seemed to have climbed upon a fence, and to be sitting there. They appeared to peep first on one side and then on the other. Some of the officers of this society have at last declared themselves convinced, by certain infinitesimal proofs, that Homo is still alive. But it is noted even now that these gentlemen decline to come down from the fence. Sometimes they shout loudly for one side, and then, perhaps, sweetly and softly for the other. Sitting on a fence always becomes uncomfortable after a while, but Nature forbids man to be both on the fence and off it at the same time. The world, as we have said, is deeply indebted to these gentlemen of the S. P. R. for the many records they have made and scientifically attested, but the man on a fence has, at best, but a limited view. In other words, the renowned scientist deals with but a part of a man. That Homo influences space external to his form is cheerfully acknowledged, but that Homo is himself external seems not to have occurred to our scientist. Yet herein is the all-important point for the investigator. If he once satisfy himself of the existence of aura he will presently discover that such knowledge both destroys much of the old belief, and opens up a new conception of the relation of Homo to Cosmos.

Let us see if we can realize something of the remarkable civic experiences of every Homo. We have seen that he is composed of blended units, with an elaborate organization recognized as Homo by citizens of similar organizations the world over. As an illustration we will turn to the city of London, which we are told is but a mile square, and with rigid limits which give it form and size. We observe that center overflowing in every direction. The overflow constitutes a vast aura, composed of personalities such as are seen in the city. But the conditions under which these personalities are living leave this aura without any definite form or size. We know the shape of the center which is square. But we perceive that the overflow has no shape, although it might be possibly classed as circular. We recognize that the square city is impressing itself upon its aura, politically, socially and personally. For instance, if every member of that square city were a rogue during his hours amid that daily life, he would be as much a rogue as ever when he passed out into the aura. If some were true specimens of honest uncorrupted manhood while in the center they would remain the same when they passed out into the suburb. So far our illustration is giving us a conception, though limited and imperfect, of form manhood and its external personality.

Now let us imagine that no citizen who leaves the central form is allowed to return. He passes out, as we have seen, mentally influenced by his experiences, which, however, he cannot exactly repeat when once outside the old center. This conception carries us a step nearer to the existing conditions between Homo and his aura, for this citizen, who has passed out and cannot return, must now find means of communication if he wish to hold any intercourse with his old friends and acquaintances. He can neither shake hands nor talk as of old; and for many centuries he goes his way believing communication impossible. At last some new arrivals bring him the news that electricity is being utilized in his old city home. Instruments that he can make vibrate to his own thought power are soon invented, and are attached to wires that are discovered here and there at the extreme limits of the old center. At this point the spirits of the aura make a discovery. The conditions which render it impossible for the normal spirit to see and hear the normal mortal equally affect every organ in their several bodies. Their senses will respond to very different rates of vibration; and above all, the rapidity of thought will be much greater with the outsider than with the citizen within. And further, since language is only thought vibrated into sound, it too will have changed almost beyond recognition.

Those recently passed out from the old city life will, for a time, retain so much of their old sensations that, if other conditions permit, they may possibly make themselves heard and recognized by vibrations passed along the electric wires. But all the old dwellers within that outstretching aura have necessarily lost the possibility of intercourse with the old home, save by using interpreters as go betweens. When we recall that while the outsiders have been gathering experiences of their new life, those yet living in the little square city have had no experience whatever of aural life, we see that any possible conversation must be on themes concerning which there is some mutual experience. Therefore those just passed out would find some interchange of thought much easier than those further in the interior of aural life.

We must not count such an illustration as more than a mere approximation to the existing separation between the visible and invisible centers of Homo the mortal. We must specially remember that Homo is not homogeneous, but, on the contrary, is Nature's most complex blending of units possible to earth life. The fact that he is, as it were, in two parts, one of which passes out from the other, and is at once invisible, although still in contact, must be ever held in view.

For a moment we return to our illustration to gain another thought. Suppose by some catastrophe the old city of London were to be suddenly submerged, as we might say wiped from the surface of the earth, what would really have happened? As a civic personality on earth it would have ceased to exist. Its unit citizens would, however, be as alive as ever, but suddenly find themselves outsiders, mingling with those who had gone before, and merged into the personality of what we have called aura. That is offered as an illustration of the effect of death upon Homo. The mortal Homo disappears. The immortal is alive as ever, but his conditions have marvelously changed. He will now no longer be receiving emigrant units from his mortal form to replace those who, by their own individual choice, are passing still further inward, and leaving his aural form.

What that means we must not now stop to discuss. It is, of course, intensely interesting, as it seems to make it certain that even the aural form of Homo will some day have disintegrated from mere weakness. It will not be receiving the necessary units to maintain its personality. That such must be the ultimate fate of the aural personality of Homo seems a reasonable certainty.

We now turn to the conditions under which aural Homo is existing while the mortal form center is still active and strong. Its intelligence is active or it would cease to be intelligent. Its energy is wielded as power, shaping the conditions amid which it finds itself; and, above all, it is in intelligent intercourse with any other aural form whose vibrations are in harmony with its own. The methods of such sense manifestations are so far outside our experience that it is useless to even attempt to imagine the details of their expression. But such senses necessarily exist, for that is the law governing the blending of units into intelligent activity. This association of aural personalities one with the other, must exist as readily before death has severed the mortal link as after. That means that our own aura is to-day in association with personalities that we, as normal mortals, cannot possibly sense. So our own aural center must have abundant experiences of which we earth children know nothing. Yet when we ask for a few details all we can receive are suggested copies of earth life. Every kind of experience known to the mortal, from the depths of hell to the heights of heaven, is drawn upon for illustration through our inspired writers and talkers, or by automatic process. Such mortal experiences have thus become received as pictures of actual aural life. The absurdity of such conceptions will now begin to dawn upon the student.

We have an amusing though pathetic illustration in the recorded experiences of a well known and talented writer, whose dearest friend has passed out recently into her own aural life, breaking forever the link that held her to her mortal center. By the usual processes of suggestion the spirit, probably unconsciously, impresses herself on her old friend as continuing her old life. She walks about and gets tired. She sits down to rest, and have a chat with her parents. She goes to a morning concert, whose prima donna was recently a celebrated singer in earth life. In other words, she does apparently just as she used to do, and lives amid very much the same conditions. This is all received and registered as truth because the recipient knows her own truthfulness and the veracity of her friend when a mortal. That such statements absolutely contradict the very essentials of aural existence must be now perceived by the attentive student. To an examination of these conditions, as actually existing, and the effect upon personality, we will now pass.

The TRUTH about HYPNOTISM

The real secrets of this mysterious power are laid bare in a 160 page book sent free by the New York Institute of Science. These secrets have been jealously guarded by the masters of the occult sciences for ages. The inside truths are now revealed for the first time by the greatest living hypnotist in the world. He tells you how to acquire the power and use it to better your condition in life; how to secretly influence and control the the minds and actions of those around you; how to gain wealth and renown; how to cure bad habits; how to develop Personal Magnetism; how to become a powerful magnetic healer and cure diseases without the aid of drugs or medicines; how to perform hundreds of mystifying and startling experiments. The book mentioned is elegantly illustrated and gotten up at great expense. It is requested that only those especially interested write for it. THE SPIRITUAL SIGNIFICANCE.

A VERY IMPORTANT WORK.

The Spiritual Significance is by Lilian Whiting, author of "The World Beautiful," "After Her Death," "Kate Field, A Record," "A Study of Elizabeth Barrett Browning." Cloth, $1.00.

Miss Whiting finds the title of her new book in these lines from "Aurora Leigh:"

"If a man could feel
Not one, but every day, feast, fast, and working-day,
The spiritual significance burn through
The hieroglyphic of material shows,
Henceforward he would paint the globe with wings."

The aim of this book is to reveal the curiously close correspondence between the developments of modern science and spiritual laws; to note that new forces, as discovered and applied in wireless telegraphy, are simply laws of an unseen realm into which humanity is rapidly advancing and thus gaining a new environment. From this evolutionary progress, as illustrated by physical science the author of "The World Beautiful" continues the same argument presented in those volumes in a plea that the future life is the continuation and development of our present life in all its faculties and powers, and that the present may be ennobled by the constant sense of the Divine Presence, and a truer knowledge of the nature of man and his relations to God tend to a higher morality and increasing happiness. The book is characterized by the same essential style and qualities that have insured for "The World Beautiful" volumes an almost world-wide popularity.

SARDOU AND THE SPIRITS

The Latest Manifestations to the Famous Playwright Described by Himself.

THE WONDERFUL PERFORMANCE OF THE GREAT DRAMATIST WHO, WITHOUT THE CAPACITY TO DRAW, ENGRAVED ON A BRASS PLATE IN UTTER DARKNESS WHAT THE SPIRITS TOLD HIM WAS A PICTURE OF THE HOME OF MOZART IN THE PLANET JUPITER.

Paris, Nov. 20.—All Paris is talking (says a special correspondent in the New York World) of the wonderful spirit manifestations which are said to have appeared recently to the famous playwright, Victorien Sardou, especially of the vision which he declares he has had of the house occupied by Mozart on the planet Jupiter.

The story of these manifestations is one which the author of "Fedora" is not averse to telling when among his friends, but he has steadfastly refused to talk about the subject for publication until he consented to do so the other day to the correspondent of the Sunday World.

HIS MIND CLEAR AND STRONG.

It should be mentioned in a prefatory way that Sardou's mind is apparently as clear and strong as ever, and that these are not the first experiences he has had with spirit phenomena. Years ago it was said of him that "he heard the solitude whisper and received presents from the empty darkness."

The recent manifestations began, according to Sardou, one evening a few weeks ago when he was working on a new play at his desk. His mind was engrossed with his task, and nothing was further from his thoughts than Spiritism.

Suddenly the electric lights went out and up again three times. The intermittence was distinct and apparently deliberate and purposeful.

Then a bouquet of white roses, perfectly fresh and uncrumpled, was thrown from the ceiling before him on his desk.

To the flowers was attached a card bearing the name of a young woman who died many years ago and for whom Sardou used to feel a sort of paternal affection.

CALLED THE SPIRIT.

The dramatist immediately construed the light signal and the offering of the bouquet as marks of approaching spirit manifestations. Calling the lady by name he asked half aloud:

"Do you wish to talk to me?"

Instinctively and with no apparent effort of his will Sardou's hand pounced upon a pencil. A sheet of blank paper was drawn before him by some invisible agency, ready for him to write on.

Then a query was rapidly pencilled about Sardou's willingness to deliver certain messages to people living in Paris.

When his hand stopped the old dramatist could not make out what he had written, so fine was the scribbling and so different from his own. He got his glasses, read the question and answered aloud that he would undertake to deliver the messages.

A QUEER MESSAGE.

Then his hand was again driven upon the paper with such extreme rapidity that when it stopped he had not the faintest notion of what was in the lines he had traced.

It proved to be three messages, each preceded by the name and address of the person for whom it was meant. These three persons were unknown to Sardou; even the names of two of the streets he had never heard. Yet when he called he found the people living at the different places. Each message was declared not only intelligible but of the utmost importance. In every one of the three cases it applied to a difficult or distressing situation to which it brought a solution.

M. Sardou says that since that first adventure he has had nightly communication with the spirits which, according to him, disport themselves about us invisibly.

THE COMPLAINT OF ROBESPIERRE.

Sometimes it is a departed friend of his who converses with him, sometimes a famous man, then again some unknown intruder. Once Robespierre himself, the playwright says, came to upbraid him severely (in writing, as before) for several inaccuracies in the play which Sir Henry Irving ordered from the French author and produced two years ago. Robespierre bitterly complained to Sardou that the play was calculated to create a wrong idea of his character and role in the great Revolution.

But perhaps the most curious recent manifestation of which Sardou tells is the picture of the house occupied by Mozart in the planet Jupiter.

The World correspondent prevailed upon the dramatist to give a copy of that extraordinary engraving for publication. Tis picture, M. Sardou says, was made in the darkness of night on the back of a brass plate left by an artist who had that day been engaged on the work of chiselling a portrait of Sardou.

CAN NEITHER DRAW NOR ENGRAVE.

M. Sardou cannot draw, for one thing. Therefore he can still less engrave a picture on brass, which is a difficult trade in itself. Besides the most clever engraver will tell you that simply to reproduce such a design as that intricate "House of Mozart," would take him many hours, perhaps several days, and require a magnifying glass and complete set of sharp tools.

Yet M. Sardou claims that the spirit which possessed him at the time did the humanly impossible feat of engraving this in a few minutes without a slip of the chisel, a break in the curves, or a miss in those small notes which seem to be the material principally used in the Jupiter dwellings.

And this, it must be kept in mind, in total darkness.

The next night the spirit again seized the playwright at the same hour, and this time, using a fine pen as an instrument, did the other sketch here presented and entitled the "Animal's Quarter at Zoroaster's."

The first of these fantastic pictures is signed "Bernard Palissy and "Mozart." The second is signed by the former alone. Bernard Palissy is the illustrious ceramist of the sixteenth century who, in order to carry to the end the experiments that led him to discover the enamel of pottery, was forced, for the purpose of keeping his oven hot, to burn his furniture and even the floor of his house.

Besides the signature of those spirits the two drawings bear very visibly the line, "Victorien Sardou, medium," and a caption stating what subject is represented.

It will be noticed that the picture "House of Mozart" bears no indication as to whether the soul of the distinguished musician now dwells in Jupiter or another planet. But the medium, a few days later, asked his familiar spirits to settle that point, and they did.

THINKS THE DRAWINGS A JOKE.

It is only fair to say that M. Sardou does not believe that these drawings constitute real documents. He even feels exceedingly dubious as to whether or not it was really the spirits of Bernard Palissy and Mozart that were responsible for the results, and intimates that the signatures may be forgeries.

"For," he explains, "I have often noticed a curious disposition on the part of the invisible intelligences to play pranks, tell lies and fool the men and women whose sensibilities they are able to affect."

Sardou regards it as certain that there are spirits, and that the soul after death goes through another, more advanced life, either with another body in another planet or simply as an ethereal being with all space as its playground.

HIS BELIEF IN SPIRITISM.

He also believes that these "former humans," now living in a perfect state, can, when they choose, manifest themselves to certain people here below whose mental and physical organization is more acute or sympathetic than the average.

Here is the translation of a letter just sent by Victorien Sardou to his friend, M. Jules Bois. It will give some idea of the pitying contempt the playwright professes for people who refuse to believe in Spiritism.

"My Dear Confrere:—I was one of the earliest students of Spiritism. That was about fifty years ago. I have passed from incredulousness to surprise and from surprise to conviction.

"It would take a volume to answer you. I therefore limit myself to giving you the conclusions I have reached after half a century of observations and experiments.

"Material phenomena observed under rigorously scientific conditions, and vouched for by scientists of whose names I need not remind you, are certainly no longer contestable.

MUST BE SEPARATE INTELLECT.

"But as a rule they are also inexplicable at the present stage of our knowledge.

"In a great number of cases it is impossible to deny the intervention of an intellect separate from the intellect of the spectators. Impossible also to deny that this intelligent force is neither the projection nor result of their own thoughts. From the production of certain phenomena we must admit the effective presence of occult beings, the exact nature of whom it has been so far impossible to define exactly.

"But, then, how can one say so without being covered with ridicule? How would one dare to face the disgusting ignorance that prevails even among so-called educated people—dare to assert that these beings are not chimerical, and that our beautiful (?) humanity is not the last work of creation?

"And so, in order to escape the raillery of official science, the skepticism of ignoramuses and witty people (who so often are fools!), we try to explain away cases where pseudo-scientific hypotheses which are very funny to people who know what I know, who have seen what I have seen, and have done what I have done.

"You ask me whether I believe in materialization. Of course I do, because I have myself caused spirits to materialize at the first epoch when I was a medium. And I still await the scientific man who will successfully explain, as a psychical farce of which I should have been at once the author, spectator and victim, the fact that a bunch of roses which I still preserve was thrown upon my writing table by an invisible hand.

"Finally, about the spirit drawings to which you allude, I obtained the first ones in 1857, under conditions identical with those of M. Desmoulin's more recent experiences. But I have long since learned to believe that these pretended pictures of planetary life had no real value as documents of information.

"They are just about as good for that purpose as the famous Martan language which some playful ghost lately tried to palm off upon us.

"There, my dear confrere, you have a summary of the conclusions I have reached from my own experiences with the inhabitants of the world beyond. It does not amount to much, you see. And yet I feel I have not lost the time I devoted to the study of these things. Amicable salutations. V. SARDOU."

SNOW.

Silent and swift as an arrow,
Beautiful pure and light,
Tipping the evergreen branches
With a foamy fringe of white.

Over the fragrant wild rose bushes,
Armed with their stinging thorns,
Till a swaying, spotless mantle
Each bending shrub adorns.

And many a bud is quickened
Into a blushing rose,
Which coming winds and sunshine
Hereafter shall disclose.

Out over the fields of clover,
Late by the frosts made brown,
Like charity it cometh
And bringeth blessings down.

Thus from the Heavenly Father
Mercy unstinted flows,
Blessings both good and evil,
Till good from evil grows,

Till out the gnarled and thorny
Some virtue may be found,
Some dead or fragrant blossom
To beautify the ground.

ALTRUISM.

Hon. James B. Townsend's Address at Washington, D. C.

The address we published, delivered by Mr. Townsend, at the N. S. A. Convention at Washington, D. C., has attracted such wide spread attention and interest that he has concluded to run the address through a third edition, and will send free of charge for the use of societies, the number they would care to have for distribution. He writes to us as follows:

To the Editor:—The countless number of letters I am receiving in reference to my Washington address have overcome my modesty, and I therefore send you a few copies with the request that you reprint them and say for me to the officers of all Spiritualist societies that I have concluded to run the address through a third edition, and will send for the use of societies the number they would care to have for distribution.

If you will let this stand in print for two or three weeks, it will probably enable me to hear from all so desiring before I make the order for the third edition. Very truly yours,

JAMES B. TOWNSEND.

Lima, Ohio.

Mr. Townsend—Dear Sir:—I have read your admirable address before the N. S. A., at Washington, and would like several copies to distribute among my friends. When you say you have been waiting, hoping that some one would be moved to speak plainly of the necessities of the hour, you define my position exactly, but your address is so clear, so logical, so comprehensive, that it has fully covered the ground. To me it comes as a bugle call and I feel anxious to have it brought to the attention of all thinking men and women who are laboring for humanity.

W. P. CONWAY.

21 W. Baltimore St., Lynn, Mass.

Dear Sir and Brother:—I have just received the two copies of the address you delivered at Washington, D. C., before the National Association of Spiritualists, and like it very much. I think every Spiritualist and Socialist, as well as other progressive people ought to have a copy. I expected to receive quite a lot, as you say you will send any number. Please send at least twenty-five more and I will take great pleasure in distributing them where they will do good. Please send them at once. I feel that I can use fifty or one hundred. Yours, for the great cause you espouse,

J. W. RUMINER, D. M., M. D.

929 East Illinois St., Evansville, Ind.

Dear Mr. Townsend:—I may be rather tardy in writing to thank you for the magnificent address you delivered at the annual convention of the N. S. A., held recently in Washington, but I beg to assure you it was not through lack of appreciation as much as stress of public and private business that I have been silent.

I have read and re-read the address with increased satisfaction and would deem it a favor if you would send me as many copies as you can spare for circulation among the ladies and gentlemen who attend my seances. Thanking you in advance, I remain, yours very sincerely,

M. E. WILLIAMS.

294 West End Ave., New York City.

Dear Sir:—When I read your Washington speech, I said "There is a man who is on the right track." I have no interest in Spiritualism as a religion, but as a movement for the betterment of government, home and society, I am with you. I can very well place fifty copies of your pamphlet, and will see that they go to the right ones.

ALPHEUS J. WILLIAMSON.

Box 891, Spokane, Wash.

Dear Brother:—I read your address before the National Spiritualists' Association, and I thought then, and still think you struck the key-note, and if you will send me some to Neodesha, my next lecturing-place, I will handle them as judiciously as I know how. Most truly your brother,

Beloit, Kans. D. W. HULL.

Dear Sir and Brother:—I live in a country where the light is just breaking and I think I could do a splendid work by placing a number of these copies where they would be read and thereby giving a knowledge of what we teach to those who are in the dark concerning both the phenomena and philosophy of Spiritualism. So please send me as many copies of the address as you can, and I assure you they shall be used to the best advantage. I am fraternally, N. B. YOUNG, Judge.

Gainesboro, Tenn.

Dear Brother Townsend:—Yesterday I distributed at the Auditorium, fifty copies of your address. There was more than one hundred others who asked for copies. My guides say you are to do a great work for humanity, and that, your address will make many Spiritualists, who are not so to-day. May the highest good of all life be your blessing.

FRANK T. RIPLEY.

828 S. Burdick St., Kalamazoo, Mich.

Dear Brother:—Received the copies of the address. Have read it again with pleasure and profit. Spiritualists need it more than any one else. The message is for us and through it we are truly shown ourselves. I hope you will go on with your grand work. "Many are called, but few are chosen," applies to you. You are chosen to help lead us from our self-satisfied indifference to a fuller realization of life's duties and needs. The address is also a grand missionary document.

..GENERAL SURVEY..

THE SPIRITUALISTIC FIELD—ITS WORKERS, DOINGS, ETC., THE WORLD OVER.

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best subserved thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet we wish it distinctly understood that our space is inadequate to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that The Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy, to insure insertion in the paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require. Every item sent to us for publication, should contain the full name and address of the writer. We desire to know the source of every item that appears. This rule will be strictly adhered to.

Keep copies of your poems sent to this office, for they will not be returned if we have not space to use them.

Bear in mind that all notices for this page are cut down to suit the space we have to occupy when received.

Take due notice, that all items for this page must be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer. It will not do to say that Secretary or Correspondent writes so and so, without giving the full name and address of the writer. The items of those who do not comply with this request will be cast into the waste basket.

Y. L. Cathane writes from Hamilton, Canada: "The writer wishes to say that Mrs. Bartholomew, the gifted trumpet medium, favored this city with a visit recently, and the beautifully soul-satisfying knowledge of continual existence was bountifully demonstrated through her instrumentality. Spiritualism is advancing here, as evidenced by the class of people attending her seances. Heretofore the middle and lower strata of society have attended, while now, owing to her efforts in giving us incontrovertible proof of eternal life, her circles are graced by the presence of many of the cultured."

The following item comes from Berlin, Germany, to the Chicago Inter Ocean: "The Kaiser is most indignant at the foolish pranks which are being practiced in the highest court circles in Berlin in connection with a strange, new, mystical, religious movement. Highly placed generals and court functionaries are hard at work studying the literature of Spiritualism and cognate forms of faith. Christian Science also is much in vogue. A certain Frau Rothe, a so-called prophetess, is in great demand for seances. She performs a clever sleight-of-hand trick, by means of which she causes flowers to mysteriously appear on a table. Another queer branch of the movement in Prussian aristocracy is the forming of 'prayer circles.' The object of these circles is to pray for the health, wealth, and outward estate of members. The prayers are confined to the affairs of the circle to which the praying members belong. When anything serious has happened to one member the whole circle meets for prayer on that particular matter."

H. E. Chase writes from Cleveland, Ohio: "Mrs. McCoy and I have been spending a few days with the society at Elyria, Ohio. It has a nice hall and is doing a good work. Mr. Fred Martin, the president, is a very enthusiastic Spiritualist; is doing a good work there. The society has about fifty members. Mrs. McCoy gave a seance for full form materializing in the hall for the benefit of the society, with the best of results. The next night I gave a light seance, tests and written messages, and oil paintings, that were very satisfactory. It pleases me to see how the Cause is growing in the small towns in this part of the State."

Horatio Mears writes from Jacksonville, Fla.: "If you are going to Jacksonville, Fla., don't fail to attend Mrs. Amy Buchanan's circles and hear your friends talk through the trumpet. She is a fine inspirational speaker, and those that are in need of one will do well to engage her. She is a true medium and honest woman. She lost all in the big fire, and if you can give her employment in that way it will be a great help to her."

Mrs. V. M. Jones writes: "Accept my thanks for valuable premium, 'Wanderer in the Spirit Lands.' Believe me a grateful recipient of your bounty."

D. W. Hull writes from Neodesha, Kansas: "I have had unusual interest, the audiences increasing from evening to evening. I shall remain here a few days, holding parlor lectures. My next point is Galena, Kans., but if possible I should like to get a few lectures in towns near by here before leaving."

The Chicago American has the following from Milwaukee, Wis.: "Mrs. Ottile Berg, a medium, conducted a weird ceremony that married Miss Louise Mueller to Robert Falk, according to the rites of the First German Spiritualist Church of the Son of Grace at 7 o'clock last evening. The ceremony was performed at the residence of the bride's parents, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Mueller, in the presence of a large assemblage of the cult from Chicago, Milwaukee and Sheboygan. The bridal party entered the parlor to music. The legal questions made and provided for occasions of this character were asked and answered, and then the Rev. Ottilie Berg went into a comatose condition and one of the spirits from the Land of Shadows took possession and proceeded to perform the ceremony. The spirit was of German extraction and talked in that language. 'Will this ceremony hold good?' was asked of the newly married couple last evening. 'Why not?' said the groom. 'We have a regular license from the County Clerk and the ceremony was performed by the minister of our church.'"

Carrie E. S. Twing, who resides at Westfield, N. Y., is among our ablest lecturers. She has written a new work entitled "Jim;" it is highly interesting throughout. She has woven grand spiritual truths into the book. Price $2.

The Chicago Chronicle has the following from Omaha, Neb.: "After lying for seven days in a state of catalepsy, Charles Johnson, an engineer at Swift's packing house, recovered consciousness at St. Joseph's Hospital early to-day. He is now able to sit up and it is thought that he will soon recover. A week ago Johnson was picked up in the south end by a policeman, who supposed he was intoxicated. His body was found to be rigid and cold and has remained in that condition until to-day, when he began to revive."

Frank T. Ripley, speaker and test medium, will do missionary work in the State of Michigan during January and February, on very liberal terms. Address all letters to him as follows: No. 828 South Burdick street, Kalamazoo, Mich.

J. W. Briggs, of Detroit, Mich., writes: "Our meetings are very well attended by skeptics and investigators, who are set to thinking by the exposition of our philosophy and demonstration of the phenomena."

Secretary writes: "Marguerite St. Omer Briggs, pastor of the Society of Spiritual Unity, Detroit, Mich., is drawing large and intelligent audiences at K. of P. Hall, 55 Grand River. Her Thanksgiving address Sunday evening was excellent, and no better exponent of the spiritual philosophy has been heard in Detroit for years. Her readings and tests are a wonder to all who hear them."

The Indianapolis Sentinel has the following: "Henry J. Reynolds, heralded as the 'eminent medium who has been startling the world,' occupied the stage at English's last night and gave an exhibition to an audience that filled every seat from pit to gallery. The 'standing room only' sign was brought to light and hung up. Mr. Reynold's introductory was not a brilliant or even grammatical bit of oratory, but he seemed earnest in his wish that his audience might not consider him a humbug. A committee comprising Julius Haag, George Bryce, William Moore and a newspaper man responded to an invitation to occupy chairs on the stage and satisfy themselves and the audience as to the genuineness of the performance. The slate writing test resulted in securing in a way only familiar to the medium a quotation from 'Hamlet.' From the viewpoint of those who expected to see spirit hands and faces and recognize them as belonging to friends who have passed away, flowers strewn by an invisible power, guitars played, etc., as advertised, Mr. Reynold's performance was a disappointment, but some really clever tricks were done. The medium, while securely bound in the cabinet, pounded nails in a board, wrote on cards, removed handcuffs and caused bells, tambourines, etc., to fly about the latter to the evident discomfort of the scrutinizing committee. Much merriment was caused by the transferrence of the newspaper man's watch from his pocket to that of the medium, and again when a coat was whisked from the back of one of the gentlemen to cover the shoulders of Mr. Reynolds. However, these things took place back of the drawn curtains of the cabinet. The entertainment closed with a table tipping test and the rather ludicrous spectacle of Mr. Haag mounted on the table in strenuous efforts to keep the 'unseen forces' from raising it. The judges on the stage were unanimous in pronouncing the exhibition a fake from the viewpoint of a spiritualistic manifestation."

Mrs. Amanda Coffman, lecturer and message medium, of Grand Rapids, Mich., now filling a two months' engagement with the First Spiritual Church of Indianapolis, Ind., will answer calls for week-night meetings for societies near Indianapolis; will also attend funerals. Terms reasonable. Address her at 230 North Alabama street, Indianapolis, Ind.

A dispatch from London, Eng., to the Chicago American, contains the following: "Pretty little Lady Grey Egerton, who was Miss Cuyler of New York, whose husband is named as one of the baronets to be raised to the House of Lords on the coronation of the King, is about to transfer her residence from Carlos Place, Grosvenor Square, to the somewhat celebrated mansion on Berkeley Square which has until now belonged to her husband's aunt, the widowed Countess of Selkirk, and which has long been known as 'the haunted house in Berkeley Square.' It had been empty for many years, when Lady Selkirk, soon after her nephew's marriage, determined to take the place in hand. She had it entirely redecorated and repaired and in spite of all warnings, expects to exorcise the ghost, and young Lady Grey Egerton is now going to live there."

Ethel M. Arthur writes from Detroit, Mich.: "On Thanksgiving evening a social was held at the home of Mrs. LaGrange, of 683 Third avenue, a very pleasant evening being spent together. A short address was given by the guide, followed by a few tests by a bright little Indian control, which closed the program from the other side. We then listened to an address and recitations from the talent present, the ladies afterwards furnishing refreshments. Our Sunday evening lectures along philosophical and scientific subjects are of unusual interest. We have just finished a course of lectures upon "Vibration." Lectures are held every Sunday evening at Mrs. LaGrange's home, different subjects being taken up by the guide, followed by tests."

The Chicago Tribune says: "'Men who dream are the men who accomplish the most,' said Professor George Vincent of the University of Chicago, last night in a plea at Evanston for the Northwestern University Settlement. 'Men have dreamed of the social Utopia, and the Utopia which men dreamed of several centuries ago not only have been realized, but passed,' he continued. 'We think of the Utopia of the social conditions to-day as far removed from what we expect to realize, but the dreamers have started the settlements. These in a way make a step toward the Utopia of our present social conditions. Some dream of the reorganization of our social conditions, and while they have their place I would emphasize the work of the dreamer who forms plans for specific little things. Let men dream all they want to if it awakens enthusiasm enough so that some of their plans may be made deeds.'"

The secretary of the Spiritual Society of Jackson, Mich., desires to communicate with spiritual lecturers and mediums of said state or near-by states, in regard to working for their society. Address Mr. C. W. McCoy, secretary, Jackson, Mich., 105 Carr street, W.

The Topeka (Kansas) Journal has the following from Wellington, Kansas: "On the old Booth farm, a few miles east of Belle Plaine, this county, stands a dilapidated house, which is making trouble for a new owner of the farm, who is trying to put up a modern two-story residence on its former site. The old building was moved back a few rods and work begun on the new structure. For several night the carpenters slept in the old house, but their rest was disturbed by uncanny noises, moans and shrieks as of a woman in pain. Every time the moans were heard one of the doors would fly open and refuse to stay shut. The carpenters stood it for a time, but finally pulled out for Belle Plaine and have refused to continue work. The old house was said to have been, in the early days of the country's settlement, the house of a family of apparent wealth and refinement, who did not mingle with their neighbors and were regarded with suspicion. One day the husband and children were seen driving to Wichita without the woman, and the story gained currency that she had been murdered, and the place has been regarded as haunted by her ghost ever since."

Dr. T. A. Bland gave a lecture in Herring Medical College, Chicago, on the 4th inst., by invitation of the faculty. His subject was, "Medical Freedom Is Essential to Medical Progress." He reviewed the work of the American Medical Union, of which he is secretary.

At Smith Grove, north of Bowling Green, Ky., Jas. Fontaine, a prominent resident of Horse Cave, died suddenly. He arose shortly after 5 o'clock and complained of severe pains near his heart. He went to the residence of Dr. Jerry Thomas, to obtain some whisky, but died in a few moments. About the same time at Fontaine's home in Horse Cave, his wife awoke, and calling to her son, said there was a man in the room. He searched the house and found no one, but Mrs. Fontaine said she was awakened by some one taking hold of her hand. She said the hand seemed cold and like that of a dead man. Shortly afterward word came telling of her husband's death at the same hour as she was awakened.

T. S. Russell writes: "The Englewood Spiritual Union enjoyed a great mental treat in the lecture given by Prof. W. J. Foster, of St. Joseph, Mo. His subject was 'The Spirit of the Universe.' Prof. Foster's long and scientific study of planetary conditions and movements enabled him to blend our thoughts into the spirit of the stars until we were lost in contemplation of the grandeur and immensity of Nature's laws. Our people are working with renewed interest and the conferences every Sunday, as well as the Thursday afternoon meetings are gaining in interest and numbers every week."

Subscriber writes from Rockford, Ill.: "The State Association is responsible for a decided stirring among the somewhat dormant Spiritualists of our city. On Sunday afternoon and evening, Nov. 24, Dr. Emma N. Warne, of Chicago, delivered addresses and gave messages in our commodious Odd Fellows' Hall, to good audiences. Her earlier subject was a Review of the work done by our State and National Associations, and at the second service her controls spoke upon The Old and the New. All join in the wish that Sister Warne will again visit us in the near future, when she will be warmly greeted by friends old and new. Our highly reputable brother and healer, W. E. Hammond, acted as chairman of the meetings. There are genuine indications that our followers here are going to abandon their long-time policy of seeing how little we could do for the cause of truth, and enter upon an active campaign of finding how much we can accomplish for the enlightenment of our friends and neighbors. We will have a very creditable numerical following when we have pulled ourselves together once more. In the meantime we hope the State Association will aid us in keeping the fakirs away from this field."

L. Murphy writes: "The Church of the Spirit Communion, Kenwood Hall, 4308 Cottage Grove avenue, opened its evening meeting, Sunday, Dec. 1, to a fair-sized audience, who greeted the return of the former pastor, Dr. J. O. M. Hewitt, who has been absent from the city for the past few weeks. His lecture was fully appreciated by all. During the Doctor's absence Dr. P. M. Harmon kindly volunteered his services for the success of the meetings. He made quite an impression upon his hearers by his logical and straightforward talk. Messages were given by H. F. Coates and J. W. Cowen, of Boston. There was a goodly number of intelligent, earnest people present, all anxious for spiritual truth. All were well pleased. Conference at 3 p. m. Lecture at 8 p. m."

N. A. St. Clair writes from Toronto, Canada: "Prof. W. M. Lockwood has been serving the Toronto Spiritualist Association during the months of October and November. He was obliged to dispense with the use of his fine collection of philosophical apparatus, owing to the refusal by our commissioner of customs at Ottawa, to admit the apparatus except upon the payment of a duty of 25 per cent ad valorem, notwithstanding same were to be used purely for educational purposes, and not for money-making, and to be returned to the United States immediately after the completion of the course of lectures here. When will our government officials cease to be hampered by the relics of paganism, so that they can encourage the spreading of scientific truths, demonstrating the wonderful co-relations of the principles of nature? Prof. Lockwood's lectures are the grandest and most marvelous and inspiring presentations of truths and facts ever heard in Toronto. He addressed large audiences, and never in the history of our association, has such deep and universal interest been manifested as has marked Prof. Lockwood's incomparable lectures. He has done much here to establish Spiritualism upon the grand foundation upon which it alone is built, and many inquirers have been relieved of their erroneous impressions of the philosophy of Spiritualism, and furnished with a flood of light and truth as to the origin and present status of the gods of mythology, and the descent of paganism and its incorporation into and existence in the various religions prevailing in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. Prof. Lockwood's line of thought is new and his arguments and data are incontrovertible. He is doing much good in presenting to the inquiring public the grandest and most rational truths before the world to-day. His presentations have most assuredly come to stay, and will, we believe, in a short time be universally accepted. The personal God, devil, hell, Adam and Eve, Garden of Eden, immaculate conception, atonement, heaven with golden streets and a large throne, etc., all of mythological origin, are relegated to their true and proper position and status, in the ages long gone by. Prof. Lockwood will always receive a hearty welcome to Toronto. He goes from here to commence an engagement in Alliance, O., on December 1, and we congratulate the Alliance Society in securing one of the brightest and best-stored minds on the rostrum of any country to-day. He is a gentleman of marked geniality, and an earnest and diligent worker. We wish him the great success which he deserves."

Dr. H. C. Andrews, inspirational lecturer and test medium, writes: "I have a few open dates for the winter months, and can be addressed at Jonesboro, Ind., Box 135. I should be pleased to hear from societies."

Mrs. A. C. Priest is giving public meetings on Sundays, at 7:30 p. m., in the Olive Hall, also Thursday night circles. Room 320 Auditorium, Spokane, Wash.

F. A. Martin writes: "The articles in reply to T. Jay Hudson, by Leo Miller, in two late numbers, are alone worth the price of the paper for a year."

Sarah F. Baker writes: "I have been a subscriber for your paper nearly twelve years, and I guess you can safely put me down for the rest of the time I sojourn in the physical. It helps greatly to smoothe the rugged pathway of this mundane sphere. I am also in possession of five of your premium books which I prize highly."

Mrs. A. C. Priest writes from Spokane, Wash.: "Once more I write, but this time under more favorable conditions. How often I have wished for this opportunity to write to you from dear old Spokane and from amidst friends with whom I first utilized my mediumistic gifts after leaving Seattle. They have given me a very cordial welcome. To my friends in the East I would say that we have landed safely back into our spiritual nest, where we expect to take up our work again. We expect to develop many mediums from our number who will do as we have done and are doing, go out into the world and labor independently of any organization for the furtherance of pure and simple Spiritualistic work."

Jennie Hagan Brown would like to make engagements during the late winter months and spring to lecture in the North and Middle States. Her lectures and poems are always enthusiastically received. Address her at Fort Worth Texas.

Geo B. Sanborn writes from Leadville, Colo.: "After the summer recess of several months, the Leadville Society of Occult Science resumed meetings on Sunday evening, December 1. The large hall used for years by the society, was taxed to its utmost capacity by the best people of the great mining camp, whose enthusiastic attention speaks prophetically of interesting and well-attended meetings in the future. An agreeable surprise to the society was the presence of Madam Bartelle, a noted medium from Cripple Creek, who promises to stay in Leadville for some time. Martin Turpin, who has served the Occult Society as its president often and ably in the past, was unanimously chosen as president for the ensuing six months."

C. H. Mathews writes: "For 'whispering in school,' it is said an old-fashioned pillory system of punishment has been introduced at the Pontiac Reformatory, which it is alleged has the sanction of a board of directors of which Bishop Fallows is president. Charles Miller, a 10-year-old boy was forced to stand for 20 hours at a stretch. 'He was taken down for 10 minutes at noon, when bread and water were given him.' If this is not evidence that we are living under a glorious, 'Christian dispensation,' with the Spanish Inquisition added thereto, it is pretty hard to tell where we are really at. This worse than heathenish news was prominent in the Associated Press dispatches, Nov. 22, 1901."

E. Taylor writes from Toronto, Canada: "Seeing your valuable paper has made its advent into our Dominion, I thought you might like to receive word from our spiritual field, and learn of the progression we are making in the work. We now have four large meetings in different sections, with an average attendance of three hundred persons at each meeting. We have with us Mr. S. C. Fenner, of Philadelphia, Pa., trance speaker, and one of the most remarkable ballot, test and trance mediums on the rostrum. He is holding large meetings in Victoria Hall, Queen street East, opposite Bond street. The hall has a seating capacity of 750 and he is making many converts to the cause through his valuable developed gifts of mediumship. The lecture, 'The Final Resurrection,' was a masterpiece in inspiration, after which tests were given through his organism by his spirit control, the Hon Freeman Sheppard. Forty-five spirit messages were given and positively recognized, which we consider marvelous work. Mr. J. Clegg Wright, Dr. Benj. F. Austin and Rev. Victor Wilde are also doing much good, and the outlook for the future of the philosophy and phenomena of Spiritualism in our country is extremely bright."

A grand Indian council will be given by the workers of the Psychical Research Society, Dr. L. H. Freedman, president, G. V. Cordingley, chairman, in honor of Chief Red Jacket, Tuesday Evening, Dec. 17, 1901, at Lakeside Hall, southeast corner of Thirty-first street and Indiana avenue, for the benefit of Mr. Cordingley's camp-meeting association. Programme will commence at 8 p. m. Dancing from 9 to 11:45. Tickets 35 cents.

W. C. Hodge is sojourning for a time with friends in Rochester, Ind. Can be addressed there in care of Major Bitters.

L. J. O. Vaughn writes from 312 N. Vermillion street, Danville, Ill: "The Progressive Spiritual Society of this city will hold a two days' meeting, commencing December 14, and closing the 15th. We will have with us the president of the I. S. S. A., George B. Warne, of Chicago, and our home talent. This is my second year with this society. I hope to have much interest awakened while Brother Warne is with us. I am open for camp-meetings of 1902. All communications should be addressed to the above number."

Captain Geo. W. Walrond, the English veteran lecturer and writer on Spiritualistic, psychological and occult subjects, is again laid up with a very serious attack of congestion of the liver, supplemented with nervous and physical prostration. His present home, Denver, Colo., where he has labored many years, is considered much too high in altitude for his very nervous and over sensitive nature. His physician has ordered an eastern trip as the one thing absolutely necessary for his recovery. Mr. Walrond will therefore leave for St. Louis, Mo., and other eastern points as soon as his strength will enable him to undertake the journey. His many patrons and friends will wish him a speedy return to health and strength.

C. Faust writes from Battle Creek, Mich.: "Dr. J. T. Johnson has been working for the interest of Spiritualism for quite a number of years. He delivered a very able lecture last Sunday here. He has by his efforts converted many to Spiritualism, myself among the number. He receives no remuneration for his services, but depends upon his practice of medicine."

Mrs. A. A. Averill writes from Lynn, Mass.: "The Lynn Spiritualists Association held a fair and gypsy camp in Cadet Hall, Nov. 20 and 30, that was a complete financial and social success. Visitors were present from all the surrounding towns, making a very large attendance. A fine entertainment was presented, the Hatch Brothers of Boston, contributing largely to the same by the rendering of violin, cornet and baritone solos, and humorous sketches. Thomas' orchestra played at intervals, and Miss Iona Stillings, Miss Alice Grover and many others assisted in the entertainment. The gypsy camp in the lower hall was a very popular feature, tents being arranged on both sides of the hall where the following mediums were kept almost constantly engaged giving short readings. Mrs. May S. Pepper, Mrs. Dr. Caird, Mrs. Akerman-Johnson, Mrs. Dr. Chase, Mrs. H. E. Millan, Mrs. Dr. Floyd, Madame Helyett, Mrs. Albert Lewis, Mrs. Lizzie Butler, Mrs. Maud Litch, Albert Fisher, A. J. Badger and others. The sales were very fine, many articles being sold by tickets, Mrs. Akerman-Johnson drawing the prize sofa cushion which was made by Mrs. Dr. Caird. President Caird was the busiest man in the hall, directing and overseeing the different departments and the society feels the success of the occasion was largely due to his untiring efforts and excellent management. The society extend heartfelt thanks to all who contributed by work, money or their presence to the success attending the occasion."

Charles L. Ellis writes encouragingly of the good work being done by the Church of Psychic Forces, the meetings of which are held at Mackinaw Hall, No. 200 E. 43d street. The conference, held at 2:30 p. m., was very well attended, different speakers giving their views. Mrs. Town and others spoke entertainingly. Mr. Tolman gave a fine selection of appropriate music on the piano. Mrs. Isa Cleveland conducts the meetings. She has an irresistible and charming manner when under the control of White Star. Several others participated in the meetings, but our space is limited, and we cannot give full particulars.

FURTHER EXPLANATIONS,

And Facts from the Secretary of the N. S. A.

To the Editor:—Again I am compelled to ask your kind indulgence, and that of the readers of your valuable paper, and to request them to use their wise and calm judgment on the matter thus involved, while I make a few more explanatory remarks and present some facts not given to the general public before. This, in relation to the matter of letter from our esteemed contemporary, Moses Hull, in the Nov. 30 issue of The Progressive Thinker.

As far as proxies at convention goes, it is true that one person, perhaps more, at convention, had a number of them, but as the societies who sent them had every right to a representation, but did not send a delegate, and as these societies sent their sealed instructions to the one they officially stated should select the proxy or representative, we do not see how the matter could have been handled different than it was. The proxies came from the West, and it is this very matter that we question, why the West does not send its own representatives from at least central portions of that great section, instead of depending upon eastern people to place their proxies. Brother Hull says that Mrs. Longley means Ohio when she says the West; he could not have carefully read my former letter, for in it I distinctly stated that it was as easy for the western states to send their delegates to Chicago in 1899, and to Cleveland in 1900, when our conventions were held in those cities, as it was for New England to send its delegates to those points, while the facts are, that at both Chicago and at Cleveland, the West sent so few delegates, that the proxies had to be made up of local Spiritualists or by eastern visitors. I, who have lived for years in sunny and far-off California, and who hope to tread its golden shores again, am not likely to consider Ohio the boundary of the western slope, and such a statement is absurd from our friend.

But my special point in this article, is on the following from Brother Hull's article:

"Even the National Secretary convinced me of one thing while making an effort to convince some of us of another. The thing she wanted to convince us was that New England practically paid in about all the money and therefore owned the convention. The thing which some of us were convinced of was, that that old tradition that 'figures won't lie,' is only a tradition. Figures can be manipulated. It was proved by those 'statistics,' that, really, Wisconsin had no right to say much as she had not yet sent in her dues—of course Massachusetts had. But some of us happened to know that while technically Wisconsin owes for her dues, she had twice within seven months sent in handsome presents to the N. S. A., once a little more than $15, and once over $14. Why should the youngest state in the organization be thus insulted, and her gifts thus ignored in the reading of those figures? Wisconsin had explained, that she had just closed a costly camp-meeting, and her treasury was now empy, but that the money would surely come.

"I assure everybody that the Wisconsin representative felt that thrust too keenly to attempt to reply."

In justice to myself and the organization which I represent, I must be allowed to bring in right here the explanation and facts alluded to above, after which I am ready as Brother Hull suggests, to stack the guns—till they are required again. The statement by our friend, that the N. S. A. secretary wished to convince the delegates that New England paid in all the money and hence owned the convention. Now, Mr. Editor, all this is dark to those who were not at convention, and I wish to let the light in upon it. The think I wished to do was, to show that the N. S. A. could not afford to decide to hereafter charter only state associations, decline to charter local societies, to force the latter into state associations if they wanted any representation, and in short, to do no work whatever outside the state associations. This was the question at issue—it had nothing to do with New England, its privileges and powers, nor with the place of meeting of the next convention. It was upon the subject matter of an amendment, offered by Brother Kates, to the effect that the N. S. A. should only charter and uphold state associations, the work of local societies to be under the jurisdiction of such state societies. This matter had been freely discussed in the meetings of the N. S. A. board of trustees prior to convention, and while we admitted if the amendment was carried, it would make much less work for this office, yet most of the trustees concluded that at present it was not feasible, as the state organizations were not strong enough for the work.

Now, then, Mr. Editor, the thing I did was to carefully write off and present to the convention, the itemized statement, from our books, of the sums of money, including charter fees, donation to Mayer fund, collection and dues, that each state association has paid to the N. S. A. through the years, and before the reading was more than half through, several of the exponents of the amendment mentioned, arose and said the figures had convinced them that the amendment should be dropped for the present.

As it happened, the state association of Massachusetts headed the list. It is an association of lay members, and not a delegate body; it has paid to the N. S. A. the round sum of $430.25, but the local societies of the old Bay state have also paid the N. S. A. $511.22; the payments of the local societies of a state were not read at convention. I propose to give you some of them now. Connecticut followed Massachusetts; it as a state association, has paid $181.28; local societies of Connecticut have paid $309.02. Minnesota, as a state, paid $170, which includes the $100 donation to the Home Fund, and so on; the state associations are graded, till we come to the great state of Ohio, which has paid $35 through all its years, while its locals have paid 259.66. Yet the N. S. A. cannot charter societies in Ohio, because the state association has exclusive jurisdiction, and is practically doing nothing; nor is it alone in the matter of state associations that are in a condition of "inocuous desuetude."

The total sum paid to the N. S. A. by the eighteen chartered state associations during their existence is $1,402.70. The sum total paid to N. S. A. by locals in the same eighteen states is $3,800.88. The chartered state association of Indiana paid, from sum mentioned, while it lived, the sum of $35; the local societies of the same state have paid $407.44. The New York State Association has paid $164.75; New York locals have paid $810.43. Some states that have only locals and no state associations, have done well by the N. S. A. Chartered societies in Pennsylvania have paid the N. S. A. $945.88. Baltimore City has paid $263.17. Washington, D. C., has paid $772.20. The Illinois State Association has rendered loyal service to the cause, and been under heavy expense in its battles against frauds, and its other important works, and it could not pay heavily to the N. S. A.; this association, as well as the state associations of Minnesota, New York, Michigan, and perhaps one or two others, have loyally supported the N. S. A. in its mass-meetings under the auspices of our president and the state officers. Wisconsin, Iowa and Kansas are young as state associations, and have not yet had time to prove what they can do for the state work, and for the N. S. A.

Brother Hull says that Wisconsin was insulted by the statistics read at our convention; no insult was intended to anyone, the facts were simply given to show that it would be financially ruinous to the N. S. A. to give up its local societies, and to depend upon state charters alone. Remember, friends, that this was the only question at issue at the time, and that, as an officer of the N. S. A., it was my duty to present the financial side of the subject to the convention before it passed upon this proposed amendment. Brother Hull also states, that Wisconsin had during the year made two handsome presents to the N. S. A.—one of $15, the other of over $14. Allow me to state than one of these presents was sent in by President Barrett in a monthly report, and it was not credited to the state association; the other was sent by an officer of the state association from Wonewoc camp. I asked our President if this was from the state association, he assured me it was not, but from the people at that camp, and it is so credited on our books. I have no objection to the agitation of a subject, Mr. Editor, but I do ask fair play and candor from both sides. The convention did not ask how much the West or the East had paid in round sums, it did wish to know how much had been paid by state associations. As it happened, Massachusetts was in the lead, which aroused much feeling on the part of some of our delegates, though I do not know why it should have done so.

The local societies are credited on our books—which includes the states without state associations, as well as though with them—with having paid $6,046.92, as against $1,402.70 from all of the state associations. Figures tell the truth, and our friends can see whether the N. S. A. should be called on to give up its local societies or not, especially as a great many of our local societies absolutely refuse to unite with their state organizations.

Of late, we have been questioned from several quarters as to whether the East or the West gave the greater part of the Mayer Fund, although it should not make any difference as to what section this fund came from, since there were hundreds of donors from all parts of the country, yet it is true that one donation from Massachusetts was forty-eight hundred dollars, and New England and the Middle States made up nearly one half of the remaining fifty-two hundred dollars.

I thank you, Mr. Editor, for giving these facts a place in your valuable paper; our books are open to all, and can be inspected at any time.

May I also add that, contrary statements notwithstanding, but very few societies, outside state associations had two delegates at last convention. St. Louis had two delegates; the First Association of this city had two; the Boston Spiritual Temple, two; two societies of Philadelphia, and one in Pittsburg, all of which have large membership, had each two, and I believe these were all who had more than one delegate.

In regard to the Mediums' Home under the auspices of the N. S. A., work is growing in that direction, and statements will be made before spring, of progress. With fraternal regards to all,

MARY T. LONGLEY,
Secretary N. S. A.

"AS IT IS TO BE."

A VERY SUGGESTIVE WORK.

It Beams With Spiritual Truths.

This is a beautiful book, by Cora Lynn Daniels, and it scintillates with grand spiritual thought. An idea of this work can be obtained by reading the titles of a few of the chapters therein:

The Process of Dying; Light and Spirit; The Law of Attraction; Senses of the Spirit; What Is Unconscious Will; Fear; Astrology; The God-Soul of Man; The Drama; A Day in Heaven. Price $1. For sale at this office.

"NO BEGINNING."

An Excellent Work for Thinkers.

This book, "No Beginning," is by William H. Maple. The Arena says of it: "The argument is unanswerable. The book will at once appeal to the reason of every reader, and leave him more amazed than ever at the prevalence of the theory of Creation." The Two has always been a fateful num- Free Thought Ideal says: "We found it full of glittering thoughts for thinkers, and the very death warrant of Christian superstition shines upon its pages." LIGHT OF EGYPT.

The Second Volume of a Most Valuable Work.

This is the author's posthumous work left in MS. to a few of his private pupils in occultism, and like Volume I. is (a valuable addition and) a library on occult subjects. Spiritual astrology is especially elaborated. Alchemy, Talismans, the Magic Wand, Symbolism, Correspondence, Penetralia, etc., are a few of the subjects treated of in a scholarly and masterly manner, showing the author to be familiar with his subjects. You cannot afford to be without it, as well as all his other books, viz.: The Light of Egypt, Vol. I., bound in cloth, $2; paper, $1. The Light of Egypt, Vol. II., bound in cloth only, $2. Celestial Dynamics, cloth, $1. The Language of the Stars, paper, 50 cents. For sale at this office.

Life of

WILLIAM M'KINLEY,

Our Martyred President,

With Short Biographies of Lincoln and Garfield, and a Comprehensive Life of President Roosevelt.

Edited by

RT. REV. SAMUEL FALLOWS, LL. D.

The book contains 453 pages, weighs a little more than three pounds, is printed from large clear type, has 51 illustrations, including half-tone portraits of Mr. and Mrs. McKinley, and his mother, the author and members of his cabinet and warm friends, Lincoln, Garfield, President Roosevelt and family; battle scenes of the rebellion in which Mr. McKinley participated; also a photo of the assassin, scenes of the tragedy, the death-bed, Mrs. McKinley's leave-taking of her illustrious and devoted husband, and other interesting illustrations.

This massive work contains a complete biography of the martyred President, and many of his masterpieces of eloquence as a statesman, and a record of his beautiful home life and untiring devotion to his wife and mother.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE:—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected. HUDSON TUTTLE.

D. W. Hull: Q. (1) Why is it that some spirit controls who left as little children, continue for years to manifest and use the same innocent prattle they did when they began?

(2) Why do cockerells crow?

A. (1) This question has been asked by many correspondents and is constantly coming up, for investigators have universally met with similar experience. Especially has the child-control of Mrs. Richmond been a conspicuous example, for a score of years giving the same prattling child-talk. A child in this life outgrows its lisps and misapplication of words in a few years, and should it continue in prattle until it had reached its teens would be considered an imbecile. There is no cause that can hold a child entering spirit life from a more rapid advance.

Hence the only method to account for this manifestation is that the child-part is played by a spirit actor. We think it is claimed that "Ouina," the child control, passed to spirit life a great many years ago, and yet she remains a child. She mixes English and Indian in the same style she commenced with a score or more years ago. Not the least improvement. Can it be doubted for a moment that some spirit began personating a child and has continued to do so? It is readily seen that although the words are childish, the ideas, the quick rejoinder, the ludicrous manner of putting words together are far from childish. A mature mind is revealed behind the mask.

There may be nothing wrong in this. The character is not maintained by the sacrifice of any thing, and aside from this the spirit may be a watchful and intelligent instructor.

(2) When Prof. Robert Hare, after making his unexcelled investigations into the manifestations of spirits, went before the American Academy of Science with a paper on the subject, he was refused a hearing by that august body. He was a chemist of world-wide fame; he invented the ox-hydrogen flame which gave the highest temperature then attainable, and his scientific research had been widely extended in many fields, and he was received as a careful experimenter, a close reasoner and of great scientific attainments. Yet as soon as he turned his trained intellect toward psychic phenomena, he was pronounced unworthy of attention. In his mention of the subject, he said that the members spent one whole session discussing the question of great importance: "Why do roosters crow at midnight," but had not a moment to give to the priceless evidence of man's immortality! Hence Mr. Hull will note that this question is not alone with himself. It really has a profound significance, as the lingering trait now useless, but one beneficial. The crow is a love-song, as much as the soft whistle of the quail, the song of the thrush, the coo of the dove. When the domestic fowl were wild in the jungle of Asia, the strongest male after fierce combats with its competitors, driving them away from his flock of females, kept guard and called them together by his clarion crow. If one will take the trouble to observe, he will find that the crow is responded to at night by a low cluck from the females, though this not being as essential has not been so well retained in domestic life. When the flock scattered in the tall grass or jungle, the lordly sentinel drew them together by his loud voice, and at evening he perched amidst his harem, and at frequent intervals called "All is well!" In the domestic state this is useless, but is retained with the hackles and plumage, remnants of the wild estate.

John W. Stevenson: Q. Is there cure for catarrh and catarrhal deafness?

A. We presume that this correspondent means what is commonly accepted as chronic catarrh, or inflammation of the mucous membrane of the nasal passage and throat. An ordinary "cold" is an acute inflammation of these delicate surfaces, and admits of little remedial alleviation. It has to "run its course." The druggists prescribe large doses of quinine, and when taken at the start, it usually checks the cold, but leaves wide open gate for another. Hot baths, and old-fashioned "herb tea," with fasting, are the best remedies, and after the cure, care in exercise and breathing pure air, and in keeping the surface of the body exposed to the air by loose, and not too heavy garments.

By repeated colds, a damp atmosphere and neglect of hygienic conditions, the chronic state is induced, which is regarded by all experienced physicians as one of the most obstinate and hopeless diseases to cure. All the advertised remedies have their value only in their advertising. They are not new remedies, but have been tried over and over in the practice of regular physicians Sometimes they appear to help, but in the main have no effect. Strong drugs, in the form of ointments, washes, etc., are more liable to do harm than good.

Assistance lies not in drugs. Colds come to those physically weakened, and the system may be so strong that the most harmful conditions may be withstood with impunity. If such a state of health is gained, colds will not be taken, and their chronic form will disappear.

How is this high estate of health to be gained? By a plain diet, keeping the pores of the skin open and active with a daily bath, using water not cold, but a few degrees below blood heat, exercise in the air, and wearing loose clothing of soft stuff easily permeated by the air. It is better to be a trifle too cold than too warm. Avoid crowded, overheated rooms as you would pesthouses. They breed all manner of disease. An hour or two in such pestilence-laden air fills the body with absorbed poison, and fevers of many kinds are manifested. The cold is most common, and it is said, "we became so warm in the hall or church, that we were chilled by the cold air on the way home." Oh, no; it was not the cold air. Cold, pure air never gave anyone a cold. It was the bad air in the hall.

When the case has advanced so far as to have irritating secretions, a douche over the inflamed surface may be of benefit. This douche may be water with any of the great variety of antiseptics or germ-destroyers added, to make a weak solution.

The inflammation of the passages leading to the ears, with thickening of their coats, or ulceration of portions, indicate an advanced stage of the disease, but hygienic methods will cure if cure be possible.

As a palliative and assistant, the surfaces of the throat and nasal passages may be washed with some weak antiseptic, as euthymol, weak carbolic acid, or peroxide of hydrogen.

A cure cannot be made in a day, and great patience must be exercised, after the decision is made to restore the health by observing hygienic conditions. There must be time enough to build it anew.

A Spiritual Feast.

On the evening of Sunday, Nov. 24, a party of three, Mr. and Mrs. Longley and Miss A. O. Wink, members of the household, were seated in their private parlor of the N. S. A. headquarters, for the purpose of holding a home circle, when it seemed as if the very heavens were opened to let in the glory of another world, so many beautiful messages and tokens of love began to come to the sitters through the mediumship of Mrs Longley. Among the intelligences who voiced their greetings on this occasion, were Luther Colby, and other well-known workers in the Spiritual cause, including James G. Clark, Achsa Sprague, and the noble red man, Red Wing; the three latter giving their tributes in poems which were taken down verbatim by Miss Wink, as they fell from the medium's lips. Believing that the friends of Mr. Clark would like to read the poem given on this occasion, we take pleasure in sending a copy to the spiritual paper he loved so well. COR.

SONS OF FREEDOM.

Sons of Freedom, lift your heads,
For it is the quickening time
When the giant, Progress, treads
O'er the earth, with light sublime;
Raise your voices to the skies,
Loudly, in a sweet acclaim,
Till they reach yon Paradise—
And the word of Truth proclaim.

Sons of Freedom, be not still,
Labor onward, day by day,
Work and teach with might and will,
God and Justice lead the way;
Gird your souls with strength anew;
Let your light in glory shine,
Bear aloft the banner true—
"Love and Peace are all divine."

Ye have battled long and well,
Though at times all seemed as lost;
Ye have heard the chorus swell,
Ye have counted well the cost;
Ye have faithful been and long,
To your mighty, noble cause—
Cause of Liberty so strong,
Grand and true, though human laws

May not here have recognized
Every hour, its noble worth,
But your will and hopes suffced
To maintain it on the earth;
Ye have grandly, nobly trod
All the uphill way of time,
Ever reaching nearer God,
Harkening to his voice sublime.

Sons of Freedom, daylight dawns,
For the century is here
That shall bring ye golden morns
Compensating for each fear
That has welled up in the past,
For each bygone pain and slight—
Justice gleams for you at last,
That shall burn with clearer light.

Yea, press on, the way still rough,
Shall grow smoother as ye go,
God and Truth shall be enough
To attend ye to and fro;
Press ye on without a fear,
Liberty shall lead the world,
And from out the higher sphere
Shall the flag of Right, unfurled

Wave in triumph to the stars,
Shed a glory over all—
What though sore and scared by scars
Of the battle here,—we call
Down the years of coming time—
Grandest victories of Peace
Ringing out a golden chime
For the happy, sweet release

Of the souls, that deep in pain
Droop in misery and dread;
Held by Error's galling chain—
Held by Superstitions dead—
Sons of Freedom, sing a song
Of redemption, with one voice;
Sons of Freedom, press ye on—
Heaven and Earth with ye rejoice.

JAMES G. CLARK.

Mrs. Livermore on School Suffrage.

Mrs. Mary A. Livermore said in a recent address:

"Some women think the school ballot is too small a fraction of the right of suffrage to be worth using. My husband said he always felt indignant when I came out of that booth, after being allowed to vote for school officers only, and he advised me to wait till I could vote the whole ticket. I asked, 'Is that the way you would do if a man owed you $10,000 and offered you $500, wouldn't you take what you could get, and then work for more?' 'Oh, yes,' he said, 'You have the logic of it, but I have the sentiment!'

"It is certainly the duty of women, mothers and possible mothers, to stand by the public schools. You want to know who are the teachers, and who are the school committee. You want to see that the children are taught kindness, cleanliness and courtesy. School suffrage is a moral measure, and no woman should hold herself excused from voting."

"In Omaha, at the recent election, 900 women cast their ballots for school officers. Nearly 10,000 women voted for the school board in Boston last year, and the registration of women for the coming school election in that city shows a large increase. There seems to be a growing appreciation among women of the fact that they can do good to the schools by their votes."

TO THE ADMIRERS OF

MRS. CORA L. V. RICHMOND.

We believe there are many who are hungry for Mrs. Richmond's teachings. We shall publish monthly her discourses if we can get enough subscribers at $1 a year to cover expenses. If you will be one to help carry forward the work send address to Waldo Dennis, vice-president of the Church of the Soul, 11 St. James Place, Chicago, Ill.

ASPHODEL BLOOMS AND OTHER OFFERINGS

BY

EMMA ROOD TUTTLE.

This volume, containing a selection of Poems by this gifted author, is now in press and will be ready for delivery by the 20th of this month. Mrs. Emma Rood Tuttle has been too long before the public as a writer of verse of exquisite thought and measure to require more than an announcement of this her latest work. It contains 285 pages, beautifully printed on elegant paper, with six full page engravings, including one of the author; is finely bound and embossed. It is a gift book that will please. Every Spiritualist in the land should have it.

Price, $1.00, post paid. Published by J. R. Francis, Chicago; W. H. Terry, Melbourne, Australia, and H. A. Copley, London, Eng. All orders should be addressed to Keep in Touch With the Progressive Movement

I cannot feel satisfied without The Progressive Thinker each week. It enables me to keep in touch with the progressive movement of this age. Spiritualists should fully understand the importance of keeping up with the unfolding of the Spiritual philosophy, as from its birth commences the present agitation and growth of the advance thought along the political, social and economic lines of to-day; and The Progressive Thinker is among the great forces that lead all to a better understanding of their relationship to the Infinite, of which all are a part. This knowledge gives a better understanding of our relations to each other, and the happiness of the individual should be increased by the knowledge of exact right and justice being extended to each and all of the infinite family. F. W. POPE.

VARIOUS SUBJECTS.

Historic Curiosities--Benedict Arnold--God and Loveland--

A. J. Davis.

After forty-three years of platform work, ranging through eighteen states and Canada, I brought up at Norwich, Ct., and have just finished my first engagement, two months, in that romantic and historic city. Providence, and the weather clerk were on their good behavior, and seven consecutive Sundays were ideal days of sunshine and congenial temperature. But the eighth Sunday, which closed my work for the Spiritual Union, was as dark, dismal and stormy as the seven previous Sundays had been sunny and pleasant. Last impressions are longest remembered, and this closing may leave its shadow over all the rest.

Nevertheless, it was in the aggregate, a very agreeable two-months' stay, and the sunny faces and social seasons, the bracing words and hearty greetings, and intellectual interchanges that accompanied the flying days, are a sweet tonic in memory, responsive to reminiscent moods and silent call. I was cared for in the best way one could ask, at the home of Charles Spalding, who has been a faithful agent for the Adams Express Company for forty years, and Mrs. Fanny Spalding, his wife, is an efficient worker in the lyceum, and also in the Union, as well as a good medium and accredited speaker. She goes to New London frequently to minister to the spiritual needs of inquirers, and seems to meet the demand. She is a personal friend of May Cecil Lincoln, with whom I enjoyed the pleasure of a pleasant little flirtation through The Progressive Thinker about a year ago.

She and her husband are believers in reincarnation, but differences of opinion upon questions incapable of demonstration, do not disturb the friendship and good feeling of sensible, liberal-minded people.

Brother Loveland and Prof. Lockwood are very pronounced in their opinions about God, and evidently feel sure they are right, while Dr. Peebles, Harrison D. Barrett, and many others are equally confident in the affirmative. The thoughts evoked by their polemic displays are interesting, and instructive, and there is no cause for friction in the fraternal fellowship of these champions of a theory. And this reminds me of the last letter of Prof. Loveland in The Progressive Thinker. It is full of good thought, information, and exegesis. His analysis of A. J. Davis' position as a seer, is especially instructive. But while no man's opinion is authority, what Mr. Davis sees and sets forth from his critical observation, and analyses of what he sees, has considerable weight with one who regards his clairvoyance as at all reliable—which I do.

Prof. Loveland calls him a pantheist and not a deist. But Mr. Davis repeatedly speaks of "Father God and Mother Nature," as if he regarded them in a distinctive sense, yet ever related and co-operative. He does not hesitate to use the name of God without modification or apology, and in his after-life lectures he emphasizes the importance of a belief in God. If Mr. Davis is a pantheist, and a pantheist is synonymous with atheists, then nearly all Spiritualists who "believe in infinite intelligence" are Atheists; and a large share of cultured Coristian theologians are, by the same interpretation, Atheists. Rarely have I found an intelligent Spiritualist who professed a belief in a personal God, or a God that meddled with the order of nature by miraculous interventions and divine tinkering.

Seldom one who believes in a God that creates by mechanical methods as a man makes a watch. They do not usually suspect anything in the doings of God, that is inconsistent with the cosmic order and uniform methods of natural principles and unchangeable causes. They usually regard God as the life of Nature, the soul of all substance; the "infinite intelligence" that inspires the cosmos, and the energy that directs its movements. Whether this be a consistent and tenable concept, may be another question. But is it atheism? I hope Prof. Loveland and his critics will keep punching at these problems, for like a boy poking a heap of burning timber, each punch brings out sparks that light and warm the air around. But I have digressed further than I intended. Let us go back to Norwich.

Through the kindness and courtesy of Miss Lessie Goodell, I was shown the way to the spot where Benedict Arnold once lived, and the old well is guarded by a square curb made of small sticks, artistically woven into form, and the original cylinder—about two inches in diameter—that was evidently used for winding the rope, or chain, to lower and raise the bucket, is still there, looking ancient and very suggestive. At the top the well is perfectly round and smooth, and looks like a very accurate piece of mason work. The house is gone, but the ground is there, and the marks of the cellar, now filled up, indicate the spot where once stood the elegant house of the famous traitor of the Revolution.

From there we went to the little graveyard where Uncas—the sachem of the Mohegan Indians—was buried, and a granite monument, about 16 to 20 feet high, with barely "Uncas" lettered on the base, marks the spot where his body was laid to rest. There is much of historic interest in Norwich. There was the home and church where Sidney Dean was once a conspicuous center of attraction. There is the church where R. P. Ambler preached. Old-time Spiritualists may recall that some forty-two to forty-four years ago he figured upon the spiritual rostrum, and made quite a sensation by his lectures and writings.

But he soon disappeared and has been known no more among us. Norwich, too, is the birthplace and home of the blind orator, A. E. Tisdale, and the famous D. D. Home was born near there, and his home was in Norwich for years.

Mr. Spalding and Mr. White gave me a sketch of some remarkable seances with him, in which ponderable bodies were moved about without any mortal contact, in a light room, and the medium was raised bodily and carried over their heads, and stood with his feet on their shoulders, but without perceptible weight, and much more in similar phases.

I regret to say that the Children's Lyceum is not patronized as it should be. The death of Mr. and Mrs. Chapman stunned the whole society, but they have rallied and started anew, with Mr. Bogue for president; J. D. Crocker, secretary, and the work will go on, I hope, with increasing interest and success. Dr. Clapp and wife do not attend the meetings, though I was told they used to be active workers with the society.

I enjoyed a pleasant visit with them at Mr. Spaldings, and they shared the memorial services, which were in the afternoon of a Sunday. But I think they were not present at any of our regular meetings. Just why this is so I do not know. Doubtless they have reasons, satisfactory to themselves. People grow in cycles, and there comes a time when they move out of the lines of all previous evolutions, perhaps for a rest, or recreation, or it may be in answer to some new attraction or impulse; but they never get out of themselves nor far from the orbit mapped out on the chart of destiny. People often, for a time, imagine they have struck a new lead and gone a peg higher, when it may be only a relapse into a sort of apathy where they have struck some old long-forgotten sandbar in the ocean of progress, and perhaps have ground out a few latent sparks that flash across the horizon of consciousness, and they are startled with signs of a new revelation, or suppose they have arisen into the light of some hitherto unknown world, and need no more the awakenings enjoyed by others. Some catch on to Christian sciences, or theosophy, and think they have graduated out of Spiritualism, into a higher school of truth. But they have really just discovered another branch of the great tree, one perhaps, long ago realized by advanced Spiritualists, and worked for all it is worth, and they think they have left the tree, and outgrown its values. I do not mean to imply that this is the case with Dr. Clapp and wife, for I think they are both Spiritualists, and not ashamed of it; and she is a sensitive and a medium.

A pleasant visit with Brother Winship brought me in touch with a mine of intellectual wealth, and substantial qualities of manhood. It is a treat to meet such souls. We are not only entertained, but grow in the atmosphere of their thought, and absorb mental vitality, that enriches and enlarges life. Mr. Winship is a wealthy farmer, and a student of nature, posted at every point of compass. He is a substantial support to the Union, and one of the most appreciative of auditors, which furnish a basis of conditions for best inspirations.

Mr. Tillinghast is a graduate from the Baptist church, where he preached thirty-two years. It is claimed that Mrs. R. S. Lillie converted him to Spiritualism. He is enthusiastic, and ever "ready to give a reason for the faith that is in him." Mrs. Dr. Clapp is his daughter.

At Norwich I met, for the first time, Mr. and Mrs. Shannon, who were drawn to my lectures by hearing my friend, Horace W. Tibballs, speak of me. Mr. Tibballs is an artist of high qualities, having taken the first prize in a national contest for the best picture of President Garfield, and Mr. Shannon is a fine artist, recently from Canada. They are church people, but liberal and growing rapidly. When Spiritualism is presented rationally and in a spirit of kindly toleration, the best people in the church will hear and heed. But few people will listen patiently, or accept a new gospel, when it is presented in pugilistic language, and abusive ridicule of all they hold sacred. The most radical Spiritualist, who is a stickler for free thought and free expression, will seldom listen patiently, or accept new truth, when the speaker attacks his opinions with coarse epithets and sarcastic ridicule. Let us be as considerate of others as we would have them be of us. LYMAN C. HOWE.

PASSED TO SPIRIT LIFE.

Passed to the higher life, Nov. 28, Mr. James C. Irwin, aged 59 years. The funeral services, under the auspices of the Church of Spirit Communion, were conducted by the writer at the late residence of the deceased. It seemed as though Nature was in smiles at the new birth on that Sunday morning of the funeral (Sunday, Dec. 1), and vied with the flowers that were laid on the casket—we could not speak words of sadness or gloom, and our faith had only words of hope, of love's continuance, and of cheer. The burial was at Forest Home. Brother Irwin was born in Canada, but early came to Michigan, and thence, six years ago to Chicago. He was married in 1862, and leaves a widow and seven children—two having gone before. For the past eight years he has been in the knowledge and truth of Spiritualism, and was sustained in his long sickness by the sense of the presence of those departed. His end of earth-life was a peaceful sinking as to sleep, a sleep that wakens into the fuller life of the soul.

DR. J. O. M. HEWITT.

Passed to the higher life, after a short illness, from Palmetto, Florida, November 20, Mrs. Houghton-Chaapel, M. D., at an advanced age. The Doctor was of New England birth, finely educated, a gifted poet, a graduate of two medical colleges, and for more than half a century a prominent teacher in the South, where she won fame and wealth. She was an ardent Spiritualist, and a zealous friend of The Progressive Thinker, with its advanced views. Her husband, Jay Chaapel, Esq., survives her. The Doctor's generous benefactions to friends and to the poor will be long remembered. B.

Mrs. Harriet Abell Deming, more familiarly known as Aunt Hattie Deming, and beloved by all who knew her, passed to spirit life, November 29, 1901, at the Potter homestead, 1102 Franklin street, Michigan City, Ind. Mrs. Deming had always been a firm Spiritualist, an inspiration to the youth and a companion of the aged. Her life is an open book, whose pages are filled with the record of noble deeds and a strong, rugged and pure life. Her demise will be greatly mourned. COR.

Passed to spirit life, from Hillsboro, N. H., Nov. 25, 1901, after a long and painful illness, Dorothy L. Worthen, wife of Lorenzo Worthen, aged 67 years, 6 months and 8 days.

Mrs. Worthen has been a Spiritualist for more than thirty years, and was blessed with several visions of the attending witnesses. She suffered exceedingly, and longed for the release which came peacefully at last. She talked freely about the change, expressing her wishes about the funeral and home affairs. She was a sensitive person with strong convictions; a brave, true heart, ambitious and earnest; a lover of truth. Mr. and Mrs. Worthen will be remembered as pioneer workers at Blodgett's Landing, Sunapee Lake camp-meeting, they having charge of the Forest House four consecutive years, where they were untiring in their efforts for the comfort and happiness of their numerous guests. Funeral service by the writer.

Secrets of Personal Magnetism Laid Bare

Thousands of Dollars' Worth of Books on Personal Magnetism and Hypnotism to be Given Away by a Noted Philadelphia College.

Hon. James R. Kennedy, of Pennsylvania, Chairman of the Committee on Distribution.

Every One May Now Learn All the Secrets of These Mysterious Sciences at His Own Home.

Hon JAMES R. KENNEY, of Pennsylvania.
Ex-Mayor of Reading Pa., noted orator, author and scientist.

"I can honestly and conscientiously say from my long experience in dealing with people and from my personal acquaintance with many of the most prominent men in this country, that there is no other one thing which will help one so much in life as a thorough knowledge of Personal Magnetism," says Hon. James R. Kenney, "and for this reason I accepted the chairmanship of the committee on distribution of works on Personal Magnetism and Hypnotism for the American College of Sciences of Philadelphia.

"The real secrets of Personal Magnetism and Hypnotism have always been jealously guarded by the few who knew them and kept them from the masses of the people. One who understands these sciences has an inestimable advantage in the race of life. I want to put this information in the hands of every ambitious man and woman in this country.

"The American College of Sciences has just appropriated $10,000 to be used in printing books for free distribution, and if this does not supply the demand it will appropriate $10,000 more. The books are absolutely free. They do not cost you a single cent.

"Tell me what kind of work you are engaged in; or, if sick, the disease from which you suffer, and I will send you the book which will put you on the road to success, health and strength. It matters not how successful you are. I will guarantee to help you achieve greater success. The work which I will send you is from the pens of the most eminent specialists of the country: it is richly illustrated with the finest half tone engravings, and is intensely interesting from start to finish. It has been the means of changing the whole current in the lives of hundreds of persons who were ready to give up in despair. You can learn at home in a few days and use personal magnetism in your daily work without the knowledge of your most intimate friends. You can use it to influence others; you can use it to keep others from influencing you. You can positively cure the most obstinate chronic diseases and banish all bad habits.

"If you have not met with the business or social success which you desire; if you are not successful in winning and holding friends; if you are sick, and tired of taking drugs that do not cure; if you care to develop your memory or any other mental faculty to a higher state of perfection; or, lastly, if you wish to possess that subtle, invisible, intangible power that sways and rules the minds of men, you should write me to-day and let me send you a free copy of our new book. It will prove a revelation to you." Address JAMES R. KENNEY, P L 7, Commercial Union Building, Philadelphia, Pa.

DEAFNESS CURED

By No Means Until ACTINA Was Discovered.

Ninety-five per cent of all cases of Deafness brought to our attention is the result of chronic catarrh of the throat and middle ear. The air passages become clogged by catarrhal deposits, stopping the action of the vibratory bones. Until these deposits are removed a cure is impossible. The inner ear cannot be reached by probing or spraying, hence the inability of Aurists or Physicians to cure. Ear drums are worse than useless.

It is folly, therefore, for deaf persons to hope for a cure by the old methods of the aurists and physicians, and instead of wasting precious time and money on methods that never have cured Deafness or Catarrh, they should awake to the times and apply the scientific cure. That there is a scientific cure for Deafness and Catarrh is demonstrated every day by the use of ACTINA. The vapor current generated in the ACTINA passes through the Eustachian tubes into the middle ear, removing the Catarrhal obstructions as it passes through the tubes and loosens up the bones (hammer, anvil and stirrup) in the inner ear, making them respond to the slightest vibration of sound.

RINGING NOISES IN THE HEAD.

ACTINA has never failed to cure this distressing symptom. The vapor current passes quickly and freely through the Eustachian tubes removing the catarrhal substances that obstruct the easy exit of the wave sounds. We have known people troubled with this symptom for years to be completely cured in only three weeks' use of the ACTINA.

As Deafness and ringing noises are caused from Catarrh, the hearing cannot be restored and noises stopped till the Catarrh is cured, and as Catarrh cannot exist under the use of ACTINA no person need be deaf or have ringing noises in the head if they will use ACTINA properly.

ACTINA also cures Asthma, Bronchitis, Sore Throat, Weak Lungs, Colds and Headache; all of which are directly or indirectly due to catarrh.

Write us about your case. We give advice free, and positive proof of cures.

AGENTS WANTED.

MORPHINE

If addicted to the use of MORPHINE, OPIUM, LAUDANUM, COCAINE or other drugs, and in search of a remedy that is a positive Cure, easy to take, painless in its action, permanent in its results, and that may be taken at home, with no interference in business or other pursuits, we have such a remedy. All desire for the accustomed drug is destroyed after taking first dose of our remedy, and it completely sustains and "holds up" the patient in a far more comfortable manner than his old drug. It re-establishes normal nerve action, and restores the system to health, with all "drug craze" gone; no "habit" formed for the remedy and no danger of relapsing into the old habit. We invite every means of investigation as to our claims, and seek correspondence with all who are interested in the treatment and cure of Drug Addictions. Physicians especially invited to investigate. Please address THE MANHATTAN THERAPEUTIC ASSOCIATION, Dept. D, 1133 Broadway, New York, N. Y.

DR. C. E. WATKINS,

The Noted Chronist,

Will on October 15, open his new Boston office, at 1087 Boylston street, where he will be pleased to meet all who may call between the hours of 10 a. m. and 2 p. m. The wonderful work in healing the sick that Dr. Watkins is accomplishing is indeed most astounding; his patients live to testify to his wonderful powers as a healer. For the last year his work has been most wonderful. He says himself that his cures this year have been more than ever before in numbers, as he confined himself to only 30 new patients a month. Dr. Watkins attends personally to each case, and therefore he can do better work than if he had a great many assistants; no staff of visible helpers are in his office to annoy and suggest this and that. He knows what is the trouble with each patient, and knows the right specific to give. He prepares and puts up all of his medicine, and has no help in his medical treatments that is visible help. Write him to-day, and by return mail you will receive the diagnose. No charge made for diagnosing your case. Send age, sex and leading sympton. C. E. BATH, M'gr.

He makes no charge whatever for Diagnosis.

If You Are Sick

Why not write him today, and no matter who has failed to help you, to consult him COSTS NOTHING.

Try DR. WATKINS.

Let him diagnose your case, and then it will help you to decide who knows best what is the matter with you. Send all letters to 1087 Boylston St., Boston, Mass.

DR. C. E. WATKINS,

The Wonderful

CHRONIST.

John King, M. D., the great writer and authority on Chronic Disease, says that a chronist is one who cures chronic disease. This being the case, then Dr. Watkins is certainly a chronist, because he CURES chronic disease. Does not doctor, mend or patch up, but cures. Do you desire to be cured? Let us reason together. You have been suffering for years trying this "doctor" and that "physician," and in spite of strong, drastic drugs given to you in toxic doses, you still live. Well this fact should teach you that nature is stronger than disease. This being the case, now don't you think if some one who has been a closer student of nature than you have, should teach you what nature wants you to do to get well, that it would help you to recover your health. And then again, if you should place yourself in the hands of a chronist who uses only nature's remedies and laws to cure disease, don't you think you would have a better chance to get well? Let us see what Dr. Watkins says about nature being the real physician. Let us see what a Chronist who cures chronic disease says. Remember, kind friend, these words are the words of a regular graduate of medicine, but who was never guilty of trying to make nature obey the medical books and the opinions of medical men, but are the words of one who is now only a Student of Nature.

In reality, we can cure nothing; we can only remove the offending cause while nature performs a cure, and, therefore, lay it down as a fundamental maxim in medicine, that all the physician can do is to act as a servant or handmaid to nature.

The author of the "Medical Sketches," remarks in relation to this subject: "The ancients not only observed the effects of that instinct by which brutes are directed to certain plants for relief when they are unwell, and then applied them to the complaints of men, but they also attended with diligence to the manner in which nature, when left entirely to herself, relieved or threw off diseases. They perceived that certain disorders were carried of by spontaneous vomitings, others by looseness, and others by augmented perspiration; and having thus learned how diseases were cured by nature, whenever her powers seemed too weak and tardy, then and then only, they ventured to assist her by art.

"Here it is worthy of observation that although that sensation or instinct by which some animals are prompted to select particular vegetables for the removal of disorders, is not given in so strong or particular a degree to man, yet nature often directs him also, though in a more general way, to the best method of relieving his complaints. In fevers, the patient generally has a desire for cooling, light acescent drinks, and dislikes those which are of a heavier and more heating nature; he covets juicy, ripe fruit of various kinds, and nauseates animal food; a free stream of air, and a spacious, cool bed-chamber are equally salutary and agreeable to him, while confined air and a small, heated room are pernicious and oppressive. In those instances, what the sick person shows an aversion to, has a tendency to promote the disease; and what he relishes, has an effect in abating its violence.

"Other instances of the same kind might be enumerated; I will confine myself to one which I have frequently had occasion to observe:

"Toward the end of very bad putrid fevers, when the patient, exhausted by the violence and length of the disease, lay constantly on his back, had continual startings in the tendons of the wrists; his lips and teeth being covered with a black crust; his tongue trembling, and with difficulty held out; the pulse weak and quick; in this deplorable condition, when the patient seemed insensible to everything else, he rejected, with every mark of aversion that was in his power, medicines of every kind; but upon his lips and tongue being moistened with wine, he sucked it in greedily, and was soon cured." This doctrine is further exemplified by the writings of Dr. Hillary, who states in his secret of curing diseases, by adopting a better system, that, "by accurately observing all the motions, endeavors, and indications of nature to carry off and cure disease—and by observing by what critical evacuations she does at last cast off the morbid matter which caused them, and so restores health—we may, by the same method of reasoning, know both the methods and the means we should use to assist nature in producing those salutary effects. If we avoid all hypothetical reasoning, and by thus observing, following, and assisting nature, agreeably to her indications, our practice will always be more satisfactory and successful.

"The human body is so wisely and wonderfully formed, that whenever any noxious matter is got into it that would be injurious or destructive, we may observe that it always so irritates, stimulates, and offends nature, that she always exerts her power, or the vis vitae, to throw it off. And she acts with great regularity, order and uniformity in her endeavors to expel the offending matter out the body; and by carrying of the disease, restores health and preserves life.

"And thus, by observing, investigating, and truly knowing the diseases and their causes, and justly reasoning therefrom, we shall know when to assist nature according to her indications; and in this is contained the chief part of medical knowledge, and the true scientific part of medical art. And when we shall thus have learned nature, by observing her laws and indications, we may reasonably hope to render the theory and practice of physic beneficial to mankind." Try our method. Send age, sex and leading symptom. DR. C. E. WATKINS.

SPIRITUALISM.

An Explanation of Mrs. Piper's Statement.

A special lecture was lately delivered by Mr. John W. Ring, of Galveston, Texas, on the subject, "Has Mrs. Piper Exposed Spiritualism?" in which he said: "A psychic, to-day, means one whose soul is so unfolded that it senses the real condition of surroundings regardless of material appearances. Referring to the genealogy, we might call it, of these true souls thus developed, we recall a woman whose history is recorded in the 28th chapter of I. Samuel; and we also think of the presence of Gabriel with Daniel, as recorded in the 18th chapter of Daniel; and again with Mary, Joseph and Zacharias predicting the birth of Jesus the Christ and John the Baptist. We think of John the Baptist who came in the power and spirit of Elias, as recorded in Matt. ii, 14 to 16, and 17: 11 to 13. We recall Joan D'Arc, who marshalled the retreating French army, under psychic influence, and by the strength thus imparted changed the history of the world. And passing hastily past many whose records are found in sacred and profane history we come to our own Washington, who during the despairing winter in Valley Forge, was stimulated by a vision which depicted not only the termination of the Revolutionary war, but foretold the Civil war, and as well, the late Spanish-American war. We recall in the life of modern religious psychics (principal among them for illustration Margaret Fox Kane) the extreme susceptibility of which such persons are possessed. The accepted laws of telepathy and hypnosis state that continuous trance conditions make one very negative; that is, repeated hypnosis makes the subject easier to control.

"The philosophy of Modern Spiritualism teaches that near the earth plane in the atmosphere of mortal lives are the undeveloped, revengeful and darkened souls who have left the mortal expression of life, but lack spiritual growth which will carry them into spheres of harmony, peace and love. In some unguarded moment the psychic or medium comes en rapport with these influences and is moved by them. Margaret Fox Kane, one of the famous Fox Sisters, through whom Modern Spiritualism made its advent, not only renounced her belief in Spiritualism, but attempted to explain the 'tricks' whereby the phenomena were produced; then in humility and penitence returned, knowing that she was 'obsessed' by an adverse intelligence. A less severe condition may in part explain the action of Mrs. Leanore E. Piper. Dr. John Phinuit Schlevelle, Mrs. Piper's first 'control,' informed Mrs. Piper that his chief duties in the world of spirits were to communicate with those living on earth and prove to them the existence of spirits. George Pelham, Imperator, Rector, and others came for similar purposes, yet each bore a personality, and the sensitive chords of her psychic faculties were acted upon by different thoughts emanating from different minds as they evidently did, 'a remarkable thing was that Mrs. Piper's voice changed according to the nationality of the spirit speaking.' At length, it is reasonable to presume, a spirit who preferred that the world knew nothing of spirit return came in touch with the conditions which permitted him to influence and the result was the apparent renouncement. In fact it has already been stated that Mrs. Piper regrets the matter of thus speaking through the press. Be the circumstances as they may, Truth will dispel the clouds of Error. Love will triumph over Hate, and Justice reign where Prejudice and Bigotry once held sway.

"The fact that these psychic manifestations are recorded as having occurred in every age indicates that their source is greater than human minds, that have perplexed themselves to explain, and by occasional revolution in thought the evolving wheels of progress carry Humanity on, to heights of knowledge, are to plains where are found the 'still waters' and 'green pastures.'

"Modern Spiritualism stands to-day acknowledged factor in the history of the religious and scientific worlds; its presentation to the scientific world is, 'a tangible evidence of continued consciousness and growth after the change called death;' and its message to the religious world is simply, 'the Brotherhood of Man and the Fatherhood of God, with all days holy and every life sacred.' In the United States the National Spiritualists Association, with suitable headquarters in Washington, D. C., holds a place of respect and esteem in the hearts of scientific seekers for truth.

"The facts which collectively form this philosophical religion are unmoved by the opinion of any one and the thousands of organizations stand unchanged by Mrs. Piper, save that many will begin to think that if such people as Mrs. Piper includes in her list of 'clients' are interested in these occult subjects, it is time for each to know something of them. No shield can protect Wrong and no opposition can withstand Right; so will we not look for Light and Truth from whatever source it may come?

"The clouds of doubt must flee before the piercing gaze of the investigator, and tolerance must dwell in the courts where all crucial tests are made. The perfume of human lives must pervade the avenues which lead to heaven, for lo, 'the kingdom of heaven is within you,' and our condition determines the extent of our discontent or pleasure.

Good News for the Afflicted.

CONSULTATION AND ADVICE ABSOLUTELY FREE.

The Renowned Dr. Peebles with His Able Staff of Assistants Has Originated a System of Psychic, Hygienic, and Medical Treatments That is Curing Thousands That Were Called Incurable.

DR. J. M. PEEBLES.

DR. PEEBLES, the Grand Old Man of Battle Creek, Michigan, so well known throughout the world as an authority on Psychic Phenomena and the application of the Psychic Science in Curing Diseases, has, with a corps of able assistants, so perfected a system of curing chronic and so-called "incurable" cases that almost every disease known to man yields promptly and permanently when placed in their hands. Do not despair if other physicians and other methods have failed in your case, for they have on file thousands of letters from patients telling of their wonderful recovery under their care after years of unsuccessful treatment from the best physicians of the world. Geo. H. Weeks, of Cleveland, O., sends heartfelt thanks for restoration to health after suffering from nervous prostration and insomnia for years; he says he now enjoys excellent health and restful sleep every night. Mrs. J. A. Rust, of Itasca, Minn., cured of uric acid poisoning in two months' treatment, writes: "I am better than in years, and each day brings new health and strength. I will refer all ailing ones to you." Mary A. Earl, Crawford, Mich., suffering from pronounced female difficulties and kidney disease, says: "I took your treatment three months and it has been a success in my case. I am indeed grateful to you for my recovery." C. E. Davis, Woodman, N. H., who suffered all the miseries of a dyspeptic, writes that as the result of Dr. Peebles' treatment, he had not missed a meal since last March. D. W. Bridgman, of Del Norte, Colo., writing Sept. 30, after a three months' course: "When I began treatment with Dr. Peebles' Institute of Health I was a cripple, unable to walk but little with a cane. Now I am able to walk with ease. Some days ten or fifteen miles. I can hardly find words to express my gratitude as I had tried everything I could hear of and got no relief."

If you are in poor health, no matter how long you have suffered or what your complaint is just write the Doctors a plain truthful letter about your condition and then will confidentially consider the same and send you FREE OF CHARGE a full diagnosis of your case, together with valuable literature, explaining fully this grand science and their wonderful methods of treatment which gives hope to all the afflicted. Special advice in your case which in itself would be worth more to you than countless sums of money, for health is above all price. DISTANCE NO BARRIER. It matters not how far you may live from them their methods will restore you, for it is an ideal home treatment that can be successfully taken in your own home without detention from your daily duties or the knowledge of anyone. The founder of this Institute spent over fifty years in study and investigation in perfecting this method, and it is, without doubt, the most wonderful and effective form of treatment ever discovered by man. IT IS A COMBINING OF THE MENTAL WITH THE PHYSICAL, THE PSYCHIC WITH THE MEDICAL AND HYGIENIC, A SYSTEM OFTEN ATTEMPTED IN THE PAST, BUT NEVER BEFORE PERFECTED, ABSOLUTELY THE BEST THAT SCIENCE CAN PRODUCE is brought into your own home and at once within the reach of all, for the Doctors charge nothing whatever for advice and counsel and only a moderate charge to cover actual cost of remedies used in preparation of the medical part of the treatment. It is a greater pleasure to the Doctors to spread their GRAND METHOD and restore the sick and teach them how to stay cured than be possessed of great riches. If your health is poor, no matter whether you have suffered years or only a few weeks, write at once for their diagnosis of your case and literature disclosing the grandest system of treatment ever discovered. TESTIMONIALS;

Unsolicited testimonials that cost the patients only $2.00 per month for treatment are as follows:

Dr. J. S. Loucks—Dear Sir:—I have taken one month's treatment from you, and I have improved very much. I am so thankful to you for it. I can sleep now in bed, eat as much as a pig, and have gained six pounds. Before I began treatment I was a great sufferer for six years. I employed four different doctors and used all the other remedies I could. None of them did me any good. At last one of my friends advised me to try Dr. J. S. Loucks. I did so, and found great relief from those terrible fits or spasms. I am only ten years old.

Sincerely your friend, J. G. OWENS.
Saritoga, Wilson County, N. C., Nov. 25, 1901.

Dr. J. S. Loucks, Stoneham, Mass.—Dear Sir: I will write you a few lines this evening to thank you and your Spirit band for what you have done for me. It will be four weeks to-morrow since I began to take your treatment, and I feel like a different person. When I began to use your medicines I could not raise myself off my chair after sitting down a little while. It seemed as if I had grown fast to the chair and it would pull my insides out to raise up. I would have to slide off the side of the chair or whatever I was sitting on, and it would hurt me so bad I could scarcely stand it. But now I can get up as easily as any one and it does not hurt me any more. Yours for truth, MRS. ALICE CHEESEBRO.

Woman Revealed JUST OUT!

BY NANCY McKAY GORDON

A Message to the One Who Understands.

This is the latest revelation concerning Woman's relation to Man. The Message is as much for Man as for Woman, since it is impossible to write of Woman, the Mother of Man, without sending a message to Him. No higher word has ever been spoken on the sex problem. No greater message has ever been given to either.

You cannot afford to be without this Message.

"Woman Revealed" is a handsome volume of 152 pages. Clear print on the finest laid paper, with very wide margins, beautiful initial letters. Price, $1.00. Address NANCY McKAY GORDON, 632 6214 Madison Ave., Chicago, Ill.

Esoteric Lessons.

An Argument Against Physical Causation.

The object of this book, considered a most excellent one by some, is to establish what is commonly regarded as purely physical health upon a purely psychical basis; to show that health is knowledge, wisdom, insight; that men suffer from so-called purely corporeal disease only because they form erroneous judgment; also, to show that the fundamental erroneous judgment is, that there is any such thing in the universe as physical causation, a belief in which leads both directly and indirectly to disease. Often directly in case of the individual, but more commonly indirectly as a race-belief held throughout the known history of mankind. This work is by Sarah Stanley Grimke. Price $1.50.

FROM INDIA TO THE PLANET MARS.

A MOST REMARKABLE WORK.

Fascinating, Interesting and Instructive.

By Th. Flournoy, Professor of Psychology in the University of Geneva.

"This is an account of the experiments with the 'Geneva Medium,' Helene Smith. In her trances she lives the dual existence of an Indian princess and of an inhabitant of the planet Mars. Professor Flournoy and his fellow scientists have for more than five years experimented with these astounding physical phenomena."

This is a work of thrilling interest. It has excited great attention in this country and in Europe. Price $1.50. For sale at this office.

INVISIBLE HELPERS.

A Very Excellent and Comprehensive Work.

One from the Theosophical Standpoint.

This work, "Invisible Helpers," written by C. W. Leadbeater, the remarkable English psychic (whose lectures have graced the columns of The Progressive Thinker), is certainly very interesting and suggestive throughout. It treats of the "Universal Belief in the Invisible Helpers," the "Angel Story," "Work Among the Dead," "What Lies Beyond." The work is neatly bound in cloth, and the price is 55 cents.

A LECTURETTE.

Consolation at the Death of a Child.

I come to you in this hour of your profound grief, to give you some words of comfort; some healing balm for your lacerated hearts. It were easy to dilate on your great loss, and strike deeper the fountain of your bitter tears; more difficult to dry your eyes, assuage the anguish of your broken hearts with assurance that there is yet for you light, and joy; that justice and love rule the world.

The child you received as a priceless gift from heaven, whom you had cared for as the most tender flower, guarding from every harm, faded as stricken bud by untimely frost, faded and passed out of your arms. So gently, so peacefully, that you knew not when your bird of song had flown through the broken bars, leaving the waxen form—dead! You cry out against the injustice of giving you such promise of future joy, such high anticipations; such a wealth of expectation, to dash your shrine in ruins, and leave every heart-string quivering from the rude hand of pain.

When I have stood by the grave of one who departed crowned with the fruitage of the fullness of years, who had enjoyed life's cup to full measure and received all the benefits it could give, it has seemed to me that it was a fitting end, and it was right for the ripened sheaf to be garnered; for the fruit of the spring blossom to fall in the maturity of autumn. But now it is the blossom itself which is gathered and all earthly experiences are made impossible. Where can we turn to find comforting assurance, and still the sharp cry of regret?

We can never be comforted if we remain in the valley with our grief. When our view is narrowed to the small circle of ourselves, our present wants and expectations, whatever antagonizes or thwarts our purposes appears unjust and the order of events wrong beyond expression.

If, however, we come up out of the valley to the mountain top, where the boundless arch extends to the infinite horizon, our view broadens and we find that although there are shadows in the valleys, and darkness in deepest gorges, behind jutting rocks and overhanging crags, above all, over all, pours in full tide the unmeasured light. When we learn the full meaning of life and death, we shall find, that whether a spirit departs in childhood or old age, it meets no loss, only gain. Even our regrets pass with the shadow of our ignorance. Regrets we have which sting like the bite of an adder; for we never cease thinking that had this or that been done, or not done, the result would have been a thousand fold more deplorable. Peace should come to your souls that you did what you at the time thought best, and it could not have been better; it could not have been otherwise.

The spirit comes into this existence with a physical body as a necessity of its evolution. That body is the bridge it passes over into the immortal state. What counts the bridge after the spirit is safely over? It may have been a year, ten years, a century in passing, or it may have been an hour, yet it is safely over. Are the experiences of earthly life so advantageous or essential that we sob out our grief that our darling is deprived of them?

Oh, father and mother, as you have looked on your child, and thought of the pathway you have toiled over to gain your present years, and how it must follow, have you not said in your heart, "Oh, little feet, how many, many years you must walk in weariness! What flinty pathways and thorny roads you must traverse, to reach the end! Oh, little hands, with what aching, strain you will do your tasks and bear your burdens!"

This life may have great happiness; it may be full of misery. You loved your child and felt assured that it was so sweet and angelic only an angel's enjoyment would follow. You are not sure, and such misfortunes might have befallen, that you would wonder why you desired it to remain. Who can tell us of the future of any child? We know, however, that its life must be one long struggle, and in the end it will only have crossed over a very narrow stream.

If the blessed child went from this life without its experiences, it also went without tasting the bitterness of the cup pressed to so many lips. It went unburdened, unstained, and if it had learned nothing, it has nothing to unlearn. It has no sodden influences to hold it back and bind it to earth.

So soon meeting the second birth into the higher life! So soon to enter the school of angels!

And you, mother, have asked repeatedly who will receive the darling spirit? Will it not be frightened at the new life and the new faces? "Oh, if I were only there to comfort her," you have repeated from pillow wet with tears. As you received her with loving arms into this life, spirit friends received her into theirs, and their smiling faces gave her peace and rest. In the perfect growth of that higher life, there will be no shadows, or failures. She will be cared for by a love which asks no further recompense than the high privilege of doing, as the sun shines in the dome of the sky giving all and receiving nothing. She will grow tall and beautiful as a dream of loveliness with such associates as earth cannot give.

To leave you? to forget you? never; for to come to you when your hearts call her will be her pleasure.

And the years will go by, even to the end of your earthly lives

When you meet her will you know her? How and by what sign? Had she left you in this life for some distant country and after years returned, how would you have recognized her? In appearance changed, but held by the same strands of undying affection. You will not have to inquire, for she will stand near, even within the portal to take your hands with the warm pressure of her affection and lead you into the circles for which you have prepared yourselves.

Thus in the light of this new spiritual philosophy, is death made the complement of life and crowned with flowers. We may weep, for that is human; we may regret, for we are selfish; but for the child who has entered the spirit home it is well. If we call her back it is not for her welfare but the demand of our own desires.

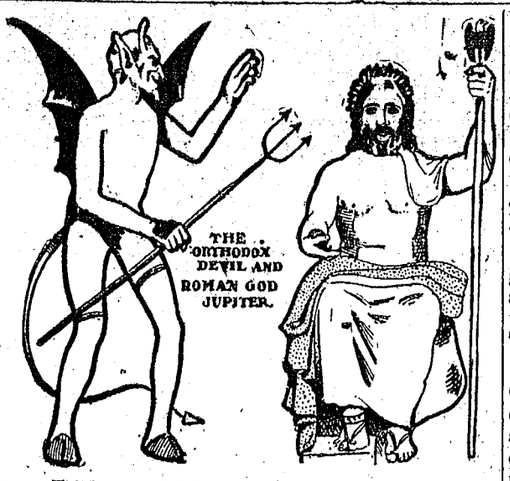
PERSECUTION.

What Is Doing in the State of Washington.

To the Editor:—I desire to let my many friends East and West know that I still live, and am not altogether out of the rostrum work into which I threw so many of the best years of my life, with all the force of my earnest soul. The State Spiritualist Association of Washington, of which I have been twice elected president, is unanimous in a determination to stand by our mediums and healers and took measures in the last convention in September to raise a fund to defend them from the infamous law passed at the last session of the legislature, and which was vetoed by Gov. Rogers, and then passed over his veto, and is now a law by which some of our best healers have been prosecuted, and an attempt made to stop them from healing, and by whom? By doctors who fail to heal their patients.

I have just returned from a missionary trip to Whatcom county, of ten days' duration, and I took pains to ascertain the facts in regard to the standing of J. W. Sutherland, who has been prosecuted there in the city of Whatcome, whose case did not come off at the last session of the court there; and for good reasons, too. I find his best friends are among the best citizens of Whatcome county; and I also find he has done most wonderful cures there, and many of them taken from the doctors after they had decided and declared there was no possible chance for their recovery.

This very fact is the reason for his prosecution and persecution. But it is one of my chief objects to call the attention of the people to this glaring fact; that our healers are always and everywhere compelled to battle with this terrible odds against them; that many of the people will be treated by old line doctors until the last hope has vanished for their recovery, and then call in the (so-called) quacks and are instantly relieved. This has been the case over and over again with Mr. Sutherland, and is it any wonder those patients come back to him again when they are sick? To me such a result would seem inevitable. And the clique think so too, and it troubles them very much to see the chances of bread and butter by extortionate prices, slipping away from them.



The chances of being killed, and paying enormous sums for the privilege against being cured for reasonable prices, is fast opening the eyes of the people to why this infamous "class legislation" is forced onto every state in this Union, by lobby-scheming, and our law-makers selling themselves for the almighty dollar. I shall be extremely glad when the referendum is adopted in this country, bringing the laws back to the people for ratification before they become valid.

I found the people everywhere I went hungry for the truth; and though in some cases my audiences were small, on account of rain and mud, yet I never addressed a more earnest, intelligent, and closely-listening people than I addressed on this trip. I spoke at Whatcom the two Sunday evenings, once each at Fairhaven, Lynden, Wall and Ferndale. I intend to return on another trip soon, and am bound to organize a society in two or three of those places if not all. I worked at a great disadvantage, first, on account of rain, and also on account of political meetings being held in immediate vicinity at same time.

But the Spiritualists must organize; and let all differences go to the winds; and stand shoulder to shoulder in this battle for freedom; for it means nothing less than absolute subjugation if we do not defend ourselves. I have ever maintained, the thirty-two years I have been on the rostrum, that the time would come when the Spiritualists would be compelled to organize in self-defence, if they did not do so voluntarily. That time is here, and now. Why was Mr. Sutherland's case not called the last term of court? Simply because the State Association voted to stand by him, and the money they put in for his defense enabled him to employ one of the best lawyers of this state to defend him; and they knew what that meant.

Now, I appeal to all Spiritualists to wake up and defend our workers. They have just as much right to stop our speakers from lecturing as they have to stop our doctors from healing the sick, or our mediums from their work, the practicing of the gifts Jesus said all the world should have. And to stop our speaking will be the next thing on the program, be assured of this.

Edmonds, Wash. P. C. MILLS.

THE GODLESS AND DEVILLESS CLUB.

The world is advancing somewhat slowly; if not so, then the Godless and Devilless Club would have come into existence long ago to exercise its salutary influence over humanity. To-day there is not a single moment passes that some one is not murdered, or some terrible, cruel act is in the course of incubation. Millions of years, pregnant with great results have passed, yet as time passed on it is impregnated with the effects of every conceivable sin that the human mind can mention. There are at least in this "Christian" nation one person in every 5,000 reposing as a convict in some one of the many penal institutions of this destracted "Christian" country. If thoughts are things, as Prentice Mulford declared, then the very atmosphere of our globe is reeking with the filth of impure thoughts that go forth in one steady stream from thousands of different minds that are contemplating the commission of crimes.

After millions of years, with hundreds of different Gods to carefully preside over the destiny of the world, and before whom man has bowed in abject adoration, observe the deplorable condition to-day of the morals in all our large cities—heart-rending indeed! City governments corrupt to the core. Brazen prostitution flaunting itself here and there and exerting a controlling influence! City alderman selling their influence! Public funds squandered and stolen! Is it any wonder, under these circumstances, that the Godless and Devilless Club was brought into active existence, with a firm determination to present the only feasible plan to reform the world? Christianity has proved a dismal failure. Look at New York City under the Tweed subtle regime, rotten with the virus of corruption, boiling with the putrid excrescences of dishonest politicians, sending forth an odor so intensely disagreeable that it baffles the description of the poet, seer, scientist, logician or philosopher! Yet, bear in mind this startling fact,—the officials were elected to the positions they polluted in a highway-robbery manner, by the so-called Christians. New York City then was a cesspool of thieves and politicians that ought to have been in the penitentiary; they controlled the civic affairs. Those who were the most villainous were devoutly Christian and God-fearing. Its city government under the control of professional Tammany politicians was corrupt as Babylon ever was—was more rotten than Sodom and Gomorrah, while its prostitution was more brazen than that of India, Japan or China! From a spiritual standpoint it was a hell on earth, minus the fire and brimstone. Is it any wonder, then, that advanced students of the arts, science, literature, social economy, ethics, etc., have organized a Godless and Devilless Club for the purpose of beating back, or at least holding in check the corruption of officials elected by Christian votes? The pregnant signs of the times point to a new deal in managing the affairs of this earth, so long dominated by the God-and-Devil idea, until the people are weighed down with debts arising from misappropriated or stolen public funds. Here is an offshoot of this celebrated Club, as set forth by a Chicago daily. It is designated as "The Church of Man," and has wisely coined—and it is fresh from the mind—a new word—"Manology"—by which the fathers of the new church distinguish their religion from theology. Man, and not God, is the power looked to for the success of the new church.

As its first minister, Dr. J. Barr said, "The Church of Man stands for the uplifting and glorifying of man, not of God."

"The object of this church is to preach, teach and practice the gospel of Manology," instead of theology. Manology stands for all the interests and rights of man. All ladies and gentlemen are cordially invited to unite and become members of the Church of Man and work for the uplifting and betterment of humanity. The creed of the church contains but one word—Justice! This word contains all the principles and morals in the golden rule. Justice can be appealed to in the proper regulation of the human family."

The first section of the constitution provides that the governing power of each congregation shall be vested in a board of five directors, one director to be minister, two to be cardinals, one to be bishop and one to be elder. These are to be elected annually.

"Any person who believes in a personal or supernatural God is barred from holding office in the board of the church," says section 4 of the constitution. This section also provides that if any member of the board of the church shall manifest a belief in a personal or supernatural God that member shall forfeit his position on the board but not his membership in the church.

The reason for this precaution is given in the same section thus: "This is to prevent supernaturalism from having a voice in the government of the church or any of its subordinate congregations."

That the rule applies only to officers will be seen by the following clause: "Persons of all beliefs will be admitted to membership and fellowship in the congregation with the hope that they may be educated out of Godology, which is the God-idea originated in early times of heathen ignorance."

This section is iron-clad and cannot be amended or annulled. Other sections provide for the routine of church government by the board and for the forming of other congregations under authority from the First Congregation, here in Chicago. The novel form of service is set forth in section 7: "It will be the duty of all ministers or persons who address the congregation to submit their subjects to criticism or approval from anyone in the audience. The time for criticisms and approvals is to be governed by the minister or acting chairman. The speakers to have proper time to answer critics."

Thus the form of service makes it practically a debate, open to any person in the audience.

Another rule is that "No personality allowed by either party in discussions. Any person in the audience can raise a point of order to this effect."

All members proving unworthy are to be expelled by the board after a fair trial by that body. The membership fee is to be 25 cents, dues are 10 cents per month. A secretary and a treasurer are elected from the board by that body, but any officer of the church may preside at congregational meetings.

"It will be the object of this church," says the closing paragraph of the constitution, "to discuss all subjects that come in contact with the interests of manology."

Dr. Barr, who may be called the father of this new sect, is enthusiastic over its future. He contends that it is the best and most sensible creed ever offered. "The one word, justice, contains all the essentials of all the codes of ethics and morality ever propounded," said Dr. Barr. "It is the keynote of right living. Our church is broad, extremely so. We believe in a supreme power, but not in a supreme being. The universe contains all the eternal principles, causes and forces, governed by conditions and circumstances, which produce the phenomena of life and design. A careful study of the above declaration leads to a perfect knowledge of manology."

Thus reform, renovation, purification, cleansing, cleaning, etc., will be the watchword of the Godless and Devilless Club, and the vibration thereof will be felt in the ether realms of space, and finally the spirit spheres will feel the potent impulse, and the benign effects thereof will be wafted back to earth, and echo sweetly in the remotest nooks, until manology takes the place of Theology, and Humanitarianism banishes Christianism, and all fictitious Gods are displaced by Naturalism, and all men become brothers and all women sisters, in fact, deeds and daily performances. These reflections are the direct emanations of an interesting meeting at the last convocation of the Godless and Devilless Club.

We regret to say that the president announced that, owing to the lateness of the hour, Brother Hastings' experiences in the spirit realms will have to be deferred to some subsequent meeting. HIGH SCRIBE.

AFTER THANKSGIVING--A VISION.

How pleased must be Jehovah at the host of earthly cranks,
Who must pause from other labor to send up to Him their thanks,
And the angels all around Him have, no doubt, a pleasant smile
At this cruel way of thanking in a turkey-killing style.

I think I see Jehovah now, up there upon His throne,
A Bible on the altar, in His hand a turkey bone;
Down by His side the Savior, taking notes of all the prayers
That ascend upon Thanksgiving, and that multiply His cares.

"Farmer Johnson," as recorded, "is so thankful for good corn,
And his family is thankful for the turkeys that were born."
"Deacon Brown is humbly thankful that one who owed him, paid,
And that others might do likewise, he most sincerely prayed."

Here's a grocer who is thankful he has prospered all the year,
And is praying that the future be just doubly full of cheer.
Here's a baker and a butcher, and a banker, thankful, too,
And a clothier and a lawyer, here are doctors not a few.

Here's a preacher on half-ration and a salary behind,
Who is thankful to Jehovah for attentions good and kind;
Here's a man who runs a paper, who is full of push and pluck,
He is thankful to Jehovah for his patrons and good luck;

O'er the planet many others are recorded at the throne,
As expressing to Jehovah thanks for that they made and own,
But here comes a sickly widow with her children at her side,
And whose ragged clothing covers not the brown and freezing hide.

When the Savior sees this mother, in His eye there comes a tear;
"Yes, I'm thankful, O, Jehovah," she repeats so he can hear,
"For these darlings thou hast given; hear a mother's earnest prayer,
That another year will find them not so ragged and so bare."

Then the Savior drew his pencil and he marked the book all o'er,
Who were thankful for successes and had plenty laid in store
And forgetful of the brothers who were sick and in despair,
He just blotted from the record, with a justifying air.

And I seem to see Jehovah as He sits upon the throne,
Looking o'er the blotted record, drop his ancient turkey bone,
And he looks so much disgusted with the people of the earth,
Where the Turkey in religion holds a place of highest worth;

Where the Christian lacks religion that is sweet and true and pure,
That looks out for lowly mothers and starvation's lasting cure.
Where a Christian is but Christian for the sake of gaining gold,
And neglects the sacred duty towards the hungry and the cold.

DR. T. WILKINS.

HER BEAUTIFUL EYES.

Oh, her beautiful eyes! They are blue as the dew
On the violet's bloom when the morning is new,
And the light of their love is the gleam of the sun
O'er the meadows of Spring where the quick shadows run.
As the morn shifts the mists and the clouds from the skies—
So I stand in the dawn of her beautiful eyes.

And her beautiful eyes are midday to me,
When the lily-bell bends with the weight of the bee,
And the throat of the thrush is a pulse in the heat
And the senses are drugged with the subtle and sweet
And delicious breaths of the air's lullabies—
So I swoon in the noon of her beautiful eyes.

Oh, her beautiful eyes! They have smitten mine own
As a glory glanced down from the glare of the throne;
And I reel, and I falter, and fall, as afar
Fell the shepherds that looked on the mystical star,
And yet dazed in the tidings that bade them arise—
So I grope through the night of her beautiful eyes.

THE TALMUD, ETC.

Instructive Historical Notes Concerning the Same.

"The Talmud Not Reliable" is the title of an editorial in The Progressive Thinker of Nov. 16. The Rev. Dr. Farrar is quoted as saying that probably "no human writings confounded names, dates, and facts with more absolute indifference." And the learned churchman raises the question whether those writings, "when not founded on the Old Testament, were not directly or indirectly due to Christian influence or Christian thought."

The Rev. Bernard Peck, Ph. D., is also quoted as saying that according to the Talmud Jesus lived a century before the Christian era. This fact was noted by the historian Gibbon who died in 1794. And now we have in the Rev. S. Baring-Gould's "Lost and Hostile Gospels," published in 1874, all the passages in the Talmud relating to Jesus, in commenting upon which the author says:

"That there really lived such a person as Jeshu, son of Stada or Pandera, I see no reason to doubt. That he escaped from Alexander Janneus [106-181 B. C.] with his master into Egypt, and there studied magical arts; and that he returned after a while to Judea and practiced his necromatic arts in his own country, is also not improbable. * * * That Jeshu, son of Pandera, was stoned to death in accordance with Jewish law for having practiced magic is also probable."

Before I had seen Baring-Gould's book I had translated the Toldoth Jeshu story from the Latin and Hebrew, and it was published by the Truth Seeker in a pamphlet with the following title:

Sepher Toldoth Jeschu: Book of the Generation of Jesus.—First English translation of the ancient Jewish story of Jesus, who was born at Bethlehem about the year 106 B. C., being the son of a betrothed maiden named Miriam, (Mary), by Joseph Pandera. By the power of a charm stolen from the Holy of Holies, he cured lepers, raised the dead, and wrought other miracles. Wherefore he was arrested by the elders of Jerusalem, scourged, crowned with thorns, and by order of the Sanhedrim stoned to death and hanged on the day before the Passover and the Sabbath, in the reign of Queen Alexandria, about the year 75 B. C.

Death of Simon Kepha on a tower in the city of the Nazarenes about 39 B. C. How and why the Romans changed "Kepha" to "Petros."

Startling evidence that Paul flourished before the middle of the first century B. C., contemporary with the aforesaid Kepha.

I found that Baring-Gould had made a partial translation of the story, to which he assigned no greater antiquity than the twelfth century. My belief then was that it had come down from the second century.

Voltaire, in his "Philosophical Dictionary," article "Messiah," says that the book was cited by Celsus of the second century and refuted by Origen of the third. But being now convinced that the works of Origen, and also of all the so-called early Christian Fathers, were fabricated after the revival of learning, I am quite ready to agree with the Rev. Baring-Gould in assigning the date of the composition of "Sepher Toldoth Jeshu" to a period not earlier than the twelfth century.

The book was triumphantly cited by the Rev. John Pye Smith, in a controversy with Robert Taylor more than seventy years ago, as a crowning proof of the historical existence of the gospel Jesus. But who now will regard it as such? It was not translated into English until recently, and the Rev. John Pye Smith probably never saw it in Latin or Hebrew. My translation will be found in "Revelations of Antichrist," pages 358-374, copies of which book, of 464 pages, are to be had of me, price, one dollar.

The first sentence in Baring-Gould's "Lost and Hostile Gospels" is as follows:

"It is somewhat remarkable that no contemporary, or even early, account of the life of our Lord exists, except from the pens of Christian writers."

Before the publication of this book I had begun a thorough search for the historical Jesus. After four years of diligent research I believed I had found him in the Hebrew records, as above referred to. But having found those records not only unreliable, but of probable modern fabrication, I have been constrained at last to accept the more reliable Arabian Chronicles as affording the truest account of the person answering to the gospel Jesus.

Several years ago The Progressive Thinker printed a brief history of that person. His name was Isa; he was the son of Mariam, begotten, as alleged, by Gabriel in the disguise of her cousin Yussuf. Mariam fled to Egypt with her child, escorted by Yussuf, who, however, did not appear to be her husband. After remaining there thirty years the mother and son returned to Judea, where Isa wrought miracles. After two or three years a mob sought his life; but he magically transformed their leader, Isoua, into his own likeness, and the result was, they killed their chief and hanged him on a stake, while Isa escaped and was taken up by Allah into heaven.

The whole story is given in Prof. Johnson's "Rise of Christendom," taken from the Chronicle of Al Tabari, conflicted or redacted about the year 900, which Prof. Johnson maintains was earlier than any Hebrew writing.

The Koran is in accord with the same Arabian Chronicles. Mohammed recognized Isa as a great prophet. Our English translation of the Koran falsely calls Isa Jesus, and renders the Arabian word "masich" Christ, with a capital C, as if it were a proper name, whereas it merely signifies a healer. The Hebrew word "mashich," meaning anointed, and translated Messiah, with a capital M, is probably derived from the Arabian word masich.

A few extracts from "The Rise of Christendom" I now submit:

"The Arabs know of no Hebrew books containing revelations of the will of Allah bequeathed from the dim foretime."

"They believed that before Mohammed, had appeared Isa, son of Mariam, about the beginning of the Roman empire; and it seems that the Roman emperors, from Tiberius, had been mostly Masichists, or followers of the Masich * * * They believed that before Isa, had been Musa, and before Musa, Ibrahim the friend of Allah, and his sons Ismail and Ishak."

"It may safely be said that the great Chronicle of the Moslems is the foundation of all the medieval chronicles, not only those compiled in the synagogues, but of those more numerously compiled in the cloisters of the Orders of St. Basil and St. Benedict. We here touch the foundations of our Christianity * * * It is manifest beyond question that down to the time given as the death of Tabaria, or about the year 920, the Moslems ignore both Jews and Christians in our sense of the words* * The doctors of the Mosque know of followers of the Masich, the created human son of Mariam, but they know nothing of those Catholic Christians whose primitive spokesmen are solely the Basilians and the Benedictines.

"What is the date of our oldest Hebrew text of the Scriptures? Our English revisers say in their Preface of 1884, that 'the earliest MS. of which the age is certainly known, bears date A. D. 916.' It would be more accurate to say that we have no certain knowledge of the age of any MS., and that the date given is probably too early by more than two centuries.'

"It is admitted by experts that we have no satisfactory criterion for determining the date of MS., and that few, if any, can be assigned to an earlier date than the twelfth century."

"In a current Anglo-Jewish almanac we read of an edict of the Emperor Augustus in favor of the Jews in England in the year 15 of our era. Recently a Jewish scholar, Mr. Joseph Jacobs, has shown that there is no evidence of the arrival of any Jews in England until about the year 1070."

"Between the years 1000 and 1200 falls the first period of Judaism and its most important literature * * Everything relating to the synagogue cult had to begin in Spain."

"It was the schools of Spain which began to supply Rabbins to Africa, Egypt, Syria and Persia during the eleventh century."

"It is only in Spain and during the eleventh century that we move out of the legendary mist into historical daylight, and pass in review a long line of scholars whose work is crowned by the great Rabbin, the true Moses of the synagogue, who fixed its creed and its law, Maimonides.

"It is probable that the earlier Rabbins wore the turban, and it is doubtful whether any public Synagogue could have been built before the eleventh century."

"They all write in classical Hebrew, little differing from that of the Bible; nor can we discover any schools where the Bible is so likely to have been commenced as in those of Spain."

"The Moslems conquered Spain, which they call Andalus, early in the eighth century. Our historian is here Al Makkari, who is believed to have written in the eleventh century. He makes one or two references to the people called Yahud, which can no more be understood of congregations governed by Rabbins than the similar references in the Koran or the Chronicle of Tabari can be. He knows nothing of Christians and their churches, although he has some quaint allusions to the worship of a virgin, which probably relates to some old Roman goddess."

"In the light of a strict scrutiny of the evidence, the rise of Hebrew literature in Spain cannot be regarded as a renaissance, but must be regarded as a beginning; the Bible and the Talmud first became of close and vital interest in the literature of a people who have become known to us since the time of the Norman conquest."

"In so far as the contents of the Bible run parallel to the great Arabian tradition, we have shown that these contents are based upon that tradition, or upon some tradition common to both the Arabians and the Jews."

"It can hardly be denied that apostates from the synagogue were in some sort allies of the founders of the Catholic church * * * It was this class of men who helped the monks to contrive those clamorous writings 'Adversus Judaeos,' which the monks prolepticlly referred to the fourth century and later times, when the Jews had not yet been heard of in any part of the world."

"The Basilian Order probably did not arise in South Italy or Sicily until the twelfth century."

"In the early records of the Italian Jews, the Basilians and the Benedictines of Monte Cassina of the thirteenth century, are traced the beginnings of that great Catholic system which followed in the wake of the Saracens and the Jews."

In regard to Hebrew MSS., the learned Jesuit Hardouin, who died in 1729, declared his belief that there were none older than the fourteenth century. In Hebrew characters the forgers could not, as in the Latin, pretend a Merovingian, Lombardic, or Saxon form. And Hardouin further maintained that there were no MSS excepting those of the Holy Scriptures, more than 400 years old—i. e., not older than the year 1329. As a Jesuit, he of course, would not dare to publicly affirm that there were no MSS of the Scriptures of earlier date. He believed that the original books of the New Testament were in Latin, which is probably true, for it is evident that the Greek Testament is a servile translation from the Latin. But all MSS purporting to have been written prior to the year 1300 are probably of later date.

THE GREATEST DEBATE WITHIN A HALF CENTURY UPON MODERN SPIRITUALISM

DISPUTANTS:

REV. MOSES HULL,

President New York State Spiritualists' Association, Headquarters, Buffalo, N. Y.

—AND—

W. F. JAMIESON,

Secretary National Liberal League, Headquarters, Cincinnati, Ohio.

PROPOSITION:

Resolved, That the phenomena and philosophy of Modern Spiritualism prove that departed spirits can communicate with mankind.

MOSES HULL'S FOURTH SPEECH.

(Seventh Address of the Debate)

Gentlemen Moderators, Respected Opponent, and Ladies and Gentlemen:—I shall depart from my usual custom and review the speech to which you have just listened, before resuming my affirmative arguments. If any time shall be left after I have swept up and stowed his groundless assertions in the waste basket where his others have gone, I shall use it in presenting other new arguments.

He thinks he has a strong point—one which will justify his present position, in the fact that his present coadjutors were once my fellow Spiritualists; and that I associated with them. On both points he is, as usual, entirely mistaken. They never were Spiritualists, nor were they ever my associates. Von Vleck and Hagaman, to whom he refers, both declare that they never were Spiritualists—they were always tricksters and confidence men. That they pretended to be Spiritualists in order to take the advantage of the credulity and the religion of honest men and women, to wring from them their hard-earned dollars.

Believing them to be tricksters, I never associated with them; nor did I ever quote anything they did to prove Spiritualism. These gentlemen simply prove that the pretended manifestations which came in their seances were fraudulent; they prove nothing more for or against Spiritualism than the confessions of a brace of detected counterfeiters would prove against United States money. When a counterfeiter boasts of the number of people on whom he has unloaded his "green goods," he proves either that he was an adept at counterfeiting, or that those with whom he dealt, had, through having formerly dealt with honest men, become over-confident.

As Mr. Von Vleck, I understand, has gone to the homes of those whose names he used to deceive the credulous, I will leave him in their hands. But Mr. Hagaman, who now poses as a Methodist preacher, and who has been in our audiences, so that I have more than once said what I shall now say to his face, I shall handle him without gloves. I have heard him say in public, that he never was a Spiritualist—that he was in every sense of the word, a knave who deserved the state's prison,—that he not only lied and cheated, himself, but that he trained his little boy and girl to lie and play tricks in the name of Spiritualism.

I have heard him publicly challenge any medium to do what he, or his daughter, or his son could not successfully imitate. I also know of his challenge being accepted on at least two occasions; on both of which he was defeated, and on both of which he acknowledged his defeat. On one of these occasions he pledged to give his home, worth four thousand dollars, and come out publicly as a Spiritualist; on the other he promised two hundred dollars. In each case he acknowledged his entire defeat, but did not pay over either the home or the money. The testimony in one of these cases is established by the oaths of as good men as there are in the state of Ohio, in the other, as good men as Indiana affords are ready to testify. Thanks to the powers that be, he did not again come out and profess to be a Spiritualist. Such men seldom injure any cause except the one they advocate. Brother Jamieson and his Christian coadjutors are welcome to the services of friend Hagaman.

When Mr. Jamieson says Spiritualists encourage mediums to never confess, he tells what he ought to know is not true. Can Brother Jamieson tell when and where he ever heard me, or any other representative Spiritualist encourage a trickster to never tell of his tricks? Mr. Jamieson may not know it, but the allegation is utterly false. What we blame tricksters, frauds and knaves for, is for arguing that because they were knaves and liars, everybody else in the ranks of Spiritualists are as dishonest as they themselves were and are.

Mr. Jamieson charges that Spiritualists have manifested intolerance toward him. It is possible that this is true; but I shall require a bill of specifications before I can believe it. Not that I would charge Mr. Jamieson with making false accusations, but I think he has been expecting abuse and intolerance so much that he has found it where it does not exist. I hardly think it is the duty of Spiritualists to employ him to advocate what they do not believe; they have rather a hard time to support their own preachers. If they employ Mr. Jamieson to go before their societies to repeat arguments against Spiritualism which to them are already stale, there is no reason why they should not also pay Catholics and Presbyterians to come before them with their stale theologies.

Did the Spiritualists prove themselves "dogmatic" when they paid Mr. Jamieson to debate with me at Clinton, Iowa? Has the Cassadaga Lake Free Association proved itself dogmatic or narrow in employing him to come here and receive this mauling? When did a so-called Liberal Society ever employ me to go to them and debate against their convictions. Brother Jamieson, please drop all this ad captandum. Give us real argument in its stead, if you have it; if not, give up your efforts at debate.

Ladies and gentlemen, all this intolerance consists in Spiritualists preferring to employ those who can enlighten them, rather than those who meet their arguments with second-rate ridicule.

The Spiritualists here have employed such men as Robert G. Ingersoll, Morgan Wood, and others who were not Spiritualists to talk on their platform. Does Chautauqua do that? Do they do it in any of the churches? I honestly believe all this talk about intolerance is put in to create a false sympathy, where no honest sympathy is deserved. Even supposing Spiritualists were intolerant, does that prove that spirits do not exist; or that, if they do exist, they cannot return and communicate? Brother Jamieson, please show us the relevancy of all this talk about intolerance. Give us the logic of your argument. It must run something like this:

Major Premise:—If Spiritualists are intolerant, spirits do not exist, or cannot communicate.

Minor Premise:—Spiritualists are intolerant.

Conclusion:—Therefore, spirits do not exist, or if they do exist, they cannot communicate with mortals.

I wonder that some great institution of learning has not offered him a chair as professor of logic. Why Aristotle, Sir Humpherey Davy and Mill never heard of the equal of that in profound logic!

Next, Mr. Jamieson accuses Spiritualists of blaming him because he has changed his mind in regard to some experiences he had when he was much younger than he is now. I deny it. They do not blame him for that. What we blame him for, is denying and ridiculing certain phenomena which formerly took place in his own presence. I ask him, were they honest phenomena? If he says no, then I was right in classing him as he supposes I did, with frauds. If he says yes, then I ask him for an explanation of them, leaving spirits out of the question. This is not blaming Mr. Jamieson, it is only applying the inductive methods to certain phenomena which he knows occurred. Come, Brother Jamieson, did you practice fraud when you supposed you was controlled by those eighty-five different spirits? If not, how do you account for that hallucination which first worked upon yourself, and then upon those who saw and heard you while under the influence of that what-do-you-call-it? Brother Jamieson, we are after that great anti-Spiritualistic light you have come to let shine upon our darkened souls; bring it on, you will find us tolerant enough to receive it; but none of your will-o'-the-wisp shows!

I am next accused of finding fault with his small following. In this, he is, as usual, mistaken. I never did. What I found fault with, is, that a man who has worked for over a quarter of a century, and has not in all that time built up as much as one permanent audience, who nowhere in the world has followers enough to say "we," should demand that Spiritualists should leave their great work and hold these lengthy debates with him, and that before smaller audiences than would assemble to listen to them if Mr. Jamieson were not there to kill half the time.

Spiritualists are always willing to listen to Mr. Jamieson until they find that he has nothing to present against Spiritualism except stale objections which have been worn threadbare. As for the outside world, if they will listen to him that is his best hold; for it will not listen to our debates.

As for me, I am more than willing to debate with Mr. Jamieson at any time or place where he will guarantee me one-third or even one-fourth more of an audience than I can get alone.

I will next ask Mr. Jamieson to tell me just where and when I spoke of spirits "directing the business affairs of this world." The fact is, I never said it; I never thought it. I believe we are placed here for development. When spirits come here and take business out of our hands, they have taken from us our best opportunities to become men and women fit to live in this world. A spirit telling Mr. Partridge as a test that a certain firm, with which he was doing business, had failed, was not taking the business out of his hands. It would have been much better for Mr. Jamieson to have harmonized that particular manifestation with his particular Materialist hobby, than to have sought to dodge the issue by a by-play upon words.

The next assertion worthy of notice in Mr. Jamieson's speech reads as follows: "When Mr. Hull can really believe that Von Vleck was a medium he can believe anything." In answer to this I will say that the balance of evidence is that a majority of those who defraud the people as exposers of Spiritualism have mediumistic power. Mr. Jamieson himself will confess that he has, or had, some unaccountable power by which he did things for which he cannot even now, after forty years' investigation, account.

I think Von Vleck had some of this power; I will tell you why. I have a neighbor by the name of Wortman. There are many in this audience who know him, and nobody who knows him could be induced to think he would lie. He lives on Normal avenue, not more than two doors from Hampshire street. He tells the following as having occurred under his own observation. In Buffalo, Von Vleck gave an expose of Spiritualism, and he proposed to do the same at any private house; this offer was accepted, and he went to a Spiritualist's home to expose Spiritualism. They tied him according to directions; then he requested them to all leave the room and take the light with them. They left the room but did not take the light. Mr. V. remained tied; bye and bye Mr. V. begged them to take the light out of the room, but they refused; they let him try the matter again and again, but Mr. V. failed. He bye and bye began to beg piteously for them to either untie him or to remove the light so that the something which he denied being spirits could untie him. Between one and two o'clock in the morning the light was removed, and in a few moments Mr. Von Vleck was freed. They then gave him his choice to leave the city or to himself be exposed, as he proposed to expose Spiritualism. He left the city as soon as he could get out of it. I first heard Mr. George Winslow, of Kalamazoo, Mich., tell this, but I never repeated the story, for while Mr. Winslow was a truthful man, as Mr. Jamieson well knows, and will testify, he said he was not present to witness the defeat of Mr. Von Vleck. Mr. Wortman told the matter from personal knowledge.

Mr. Jamieson next refers to "some confessions of Mr. Hull." Ladies and gentlemen, I was not aware of having made any confessions. Had any of you before heard of any confession that I had made? Brother Jamieson's powers of imagination are larger than the Munchausen stories of which he speaks. He was not even "amused at my efforts to get out of the trap he had set for me." I presume not. I worry him much more than I amuse him. I do get amused at his efforts to twist certain truthful remarks which I have been making for about forty years into "confessions."

I have argued, and still argue that as long as spirits testify on various sides of various questions, their testimony proved their existence, because they could not even be mistaken if they did not exist; but when they testify on the various sides of various questions the testimony of no one spirit can be taken as absolutely correct as against another spirit. That is the "confession" I presume, wrung from me by the torturing power of "Holy Father, Jamieson." Now, come, Brother Jamieson, haven't we had about enough of this kind of nonsense? If you have real arguments against Spiritualism, please bring them on; if not, please give up like a man; it will look and sound better than this cheap talk about confessions.

He next says I believed and preached this when I was an Adventist. I deny it. Brother Jamieson ought to understand both Adventism and Spiritualism better than such remarks would indicate. Now because I have found it possible for spirits to err, as they did before they passed to that other country, why he has extorted from me a great confession. I suppose he will soon be retailing in pamphlet form the great confession of Moses Hull.

Next we are treated to a dissertation, not very learned, on the relative value of Spiritualism and Mormonism. His predilections are decidedly in favor of Mormonism. There is no accounting for tastes, and so far as I am concerned he is welcome to the religion of his choice. In this his courage is more to be admired than his judgment. But, as the discussion is not on the relative merits of the two systems, and as I should decline to discuss the principles of Mormonism except with an endorsed advocate of Mormonism, I shall decline to, at this time, enter that arena.

Failing in the discussion on the comparison of Mormonism and Spiritualism, he undertakes to ring a few changes on that terrible bugaboo, Freeloveism. What that has to do with the question of whether spirits exist and can communicate I can not tell. If you will allow me to define the word, I am a Freelover, and always have been—not more so, however than is Mr. Jamieson.

But I must ask, why is this matter, which has nothing whatever to do with this question, lugged into this debate. I can see no reason, except to create prejudice, and to turn the minds of the hearers from the real issue. I fully intended to drive him, before the debate closed, to bring in all kinds of extraneous and irrelevant matter, but I hardly thought that he would voluntarily wander into foreign fields so soon. I presume that the most of this matter looks to him a little like argument; it looks to me like an effort to fill in the time without argument. The ad captandum he uses about my calling Colville, Morse, Mrs. Longley and others liars is like the printers'

"Two lines which look so solemn,
Put in just to fill the column."

It will take a greater man than my opponent will ever be to make either of the persons with whom he so thoroughly sympathizes believe that his sympathy is not wasted. No one until this debate ever supposed that I ever thought of calling either of them liars.

His next great task is to find fault because spirits do not go from house to house and visit their friends and talk and gossip as naturally and as fluently as when they used their own physical bodies.

Well, I suppose some of them would if they could; but, if they cannot, let us rejoice that there is a system of signs by which, even though they have lain that aside by which appeals to the outward senses is made, they can still appeal to certain sensitive persons sufficiently to convince them that they live.

I do not ask to see a whole forest of timber to convince me of the existence of such a commodity; there is proof enough in the existence of a single tooth-pick to convince the inductive thinker of the existence of the forest out of which it came. So, if "spiritual beings," which Milton said "walk the earth unseen, when we wake and when we sleep," can come into close enough touch with poor, blind mortals to affect them in the least, I will gratefully accept that and not make a fool of myself by demanding impossibilities. If my friends may not be able to speak to me directly, but can approach me through others, as once upon a time I found my opponent when he found himself a poor orphan, away from home, and without friends. I was a good ways from him, and our method of communication was unsatisfactory and costly, nevertheless I managed to convey a wee bit of "comfort" to him. He found consolation, though I was not present to maul him as I am doing this evening. We used the mediumship of telegraphic operators. Brother, I could at that time have demanded more severe tests; or you could have demanded that Moses Hull should come more directly and tangibly to you, but circumstances alter cases. Mr. Jamieson was not so unbelieving then as he is now.

We are next informed that "Spiritualism is a clumsy counterfeit of the witch stories and ghost stories of the past." So is sleep a "clumsy counterfeit of the sleep of past ages. Eating apples counterfeits grandmother Eve's escapade in the garden of Eden. How hard pushed must that cause be, which resorts to such ad captandum as that. Brother Jamieson, let your cause die an honorable death; it will be much better than to save its life by such remedies as you are using. Those witch stories, ghost stories, etc., when true, were nothing in the world but Spiritualism. Spiritualism is a continuation of manifestations which came in the past ages of the world—manifestations which were by the majority of the world as sadly misunderstood as Mr. Jamieson's misunderstanding of the Spiritualism of to-day.

Mr. Jamieson next manifests his superior wisdom by saying: "If Spiritualism is true, no spirit ought to be dependent on any human being to make the fact of his existence known." How profound! If men can sit or stand one hundred miles apart and write, or talk to each other, they ought not to depend upon the telegraph or the telephone. Certainly not; but somehow it happens that that is the very method used. Is it not strange how inconsistent a man can make himself? It seems that the greater a man's ability, the greater his power to transcend the bounds of consistency. Mr. Jamieson refuses to accept the very means provided by which he can prove for himself that the dead return because there are not other and better means selected. It is only in Spiritual things that friend Jamieson rejects common sense. I will simply inform him, that if the spirit world could, I doubt whether it would go a great way out of its road to make a Spiritualist of him. I do not know but that Paul was right when he spoke of the Jamiesons of his day, when he said: "It is impossible, if such fall away, to renew them again to repentance." Is it not strange how inconsistent a man can make himself, by refusing to accept the very means provided in nature by which to communicate with his friends, because other and better means have not been discovered. I am truly thankful that means have been provided by which even the most faint gleams can be obtained of the trans-mundane existence.

Now comes the all-important question, repeated over and over for the last quarter of a century, why did not the spirits find Charley Ross? Thus he refuses to believe what spirits did do, because of something he imagines they did not do, or of somebody they did not find. How does he know they did not find Charlie Ross? We know that some of them claimed to have found him; does he know that they did not? How does he know? The claim was made by mediums that his captors, fearing detection and punishment, loaded him down with weights and sank him in the sea, so deep that he never could be found. Even Mr. Ross did not take stock enough in Spiritualism to investigate the matter. I do not know that this is not true.

Rev. Minot J. Savage states in detail the circumstance of his finding a drowned boy by the aid of a strange medium, and that after every other means had failed.

I know that I went down to Norfolk, Virginia, and found a lost boy; I had no guidance in the world except messages through mediums. I say I had no other means, because I have heard it hinted that the mediums, or somebody else had a definite knowledge of where the boy was. No definite knowledge was given to me; I went on what would be called a wild goose chase after a strange boy, and was mysteriously led to him. Let us give spirits credit for what they do, instead of blaming them for what is not done.

Here, I have followed Mr. Jamieson through all the dark labyrinths of his eccentric doubts, on purpose to illustrate to you the extreme credulity of his incredulity. I may possibly, before this debate is done, follow once or twice more as I have followed him in his last speech. It seems to me like something of a waste of precious time, but he is worth wasting a little time on. A glance at his arguments and at my review of them will make the solution of the reason why he has been so unsuccessful in making converts away from Spiritualism one that one does not have to go far to find.

THE HIGHER SPIRITUALISM.

Spiritualism, like most of the great religious movements of the past, was ushered in with supermundane phenomena which seem always to have been essential credentials to the avatars or heralds of a new dispensation. Esteemed as supernatural, they produced a sense of awe in the beholder and a reverence for the teacher in whose presence or through whose influence they appeared to occur. The materialistic tendencies of the nineteenth century, however, due largely to the wonderful revealments of physical science, had materially modified the belief in the supernatural, and the prevalent skepticism first looked for a natural or mundane solution of the phenomena associated with the advent of Modern Spiritualism. That it was essential to compel public attention to the subject there can be no doubt, and that the associated spirits who produced it had to multiply and increase the variety of the phenomena presented to overcome the intense skepticism of the scientific world, is apparent; that those of religious tendencies were often awestruck and profoundly impressed by the manifestations of spirit power and intelligence during the first two decades of the dispensation there are many instances recorded, but in the great majority of instances, especially of late years, the investigators who have approached the subject have done so in a skeptical mood, and not unfrequently with an expectation of discovering imposture. Notwithstanding this, however, a large percentage of converts have been made and the phenomenal facts may now be fairly considered to have been established. In the October and November (1900) issues of this paper, under the title of "A Galaxy of Eminent Spiritualists," we gave a list of twelve Fellows of the Royal Society of Great Britain, two members of the Smithsonian Institute (its Americal equivalent), over thirty professors in other universities, fifty-five doctors of medicine—mostly eminent in their profession, three astronomers (including Camille Flammarion), several LL.D.'s and M.A.'s, quite a number of ecclesiastics (including two Bishops and an Archbishop), also many eminent literary men, poets, statesmen and judges, all of whom had after careful experimental examination, extending in most instances over many years, affirmed the reality of the phenomenal facts and their conviction of their spiritual origin. No amount of disbelief or denial will avail against such testimony as this. The phenomenal facts are proved.

The question now is, what is the meaning of these facts, what do they represent? And we reply, they are the foundation of a magnificent superstructure reaching from earth to heaven; a portion of which has been already built by such able architects as Andrew Jackson Davis, Hudson Tuttle, J. M. Peebles, Wm. Stainton Moses and other inspired workers of the past fifty years. Their work on the edifice is sound and symmetrical, they have raised it a considerable distance above the foundation, and now the call is for clear-headed earnest men and women who are satisfied that the foundation is well and truly laid, to leave the basement and concentrate all their energies on what may be called "The Higher Spiritualism," the furnishing of material and labor for the upbuilding of a harmonial structure which shall be beautiful and soul-satisfying in its every aspect. No faulty material must be used, no soiled or uneven stones, and if by accident or lack of judgment any such have been introduced, they must be removed as soon as noted and replaced by pure and sound ones.

But to leave metaphor, what is now needed is the promulgation of the Ethics, Philosophy and Religion of Spiritualism, and the discarding by harmonialists of those things which are inconsistent with the high ideals which have been set before us by some of the leading minds of the spirit world, which appeal to the reason and satisfy the religious needs of intelligent humanity. Place no blind faith in spirit communications, as such they are of no value unless they commend themselves to your reason; this must be the touchstone. Wise spirits appeal to your reason and do not dogmatize. Until you are assured of the competency of those professing to teach you, it is better to rely upon the teachings of such recognized seers and mediums as those we have referred to; amongst their voluminous writings is to be found evidences of facts and a philosophy adequate to satisfy any intelligent and unbiased mind; you can test the matter by personal investigation to much better advantage after. But to those who are already satisfied of the facts and who realize the importance to humanity at large of a pure and healthy Spiritualism, we appeal to do their part in assisting to dissociate it from all that is inconsistent with reason and the highest morality.

SEEING IN THE DARK.

The Manawatu Farmer gives currency to a story of a little boy, eight years of age, living in the Horowhenua county, near the Manawatu River, who has the remarkable gift of seeing in the dark—who can tell every movement of any person sitting with him in a dark room; can tell what a person is doing miles distant, and even see the bones in the human body. The Farmer contains a letter from the boy's father relating how he tested his son's powers, and a representative of the paper, having obtained permission to sit with the lad, corroborates the father's testimony. Besides this, two other persons testify to its truth.

The father says that one evening when he was sitting with the boy the latter exclaimed, "I can see you, papa!" The father put his hands over his head and asked the boy to tell him what he was doing; he did so correctly. The father next took a silver coin from his pocket, and held it up; the boy said it was a half-crown; the father says it was a florin. One evening the boy saw a relative who was miles distant. This was too much for the father's faith, but the boy was positive, so the father arranged with the relative to act in some way at a certain fixed time one evening. They were ten miles apart. The boy said he saw this relative sitting in a chair holding a paper in his hand. It turned out to be correct. After this the lad saw all the internal organs of his father's body, and described the various organs. The boy sits in the normal state; there is no hypnotism in the matter, and in an artless childish way he describes wonderful scenes.

The Farmer says, in concluding the story: "The parents have no wish to court the curiosity of the public; they consider their son is too young to be ushered into public life, and prefer that he should go on with his schooling in the usual quiet way. At some later period, if the gifts which have manifested themselves in such a striking way strengthen, they will consider the wisdom of allowing unprejudiced and intelligent men to test the boy's powers. It is because the parents do not court notoriety that we do not give the name of the family."

Since the above was in type we have received from the boy's grandfather, Mr. W. C. Nation, of Levin, a letter in which he informs us that the mother, Mrs. F. Barrett (his eldest daughter), was one of the girls through whose mediumship striking spiritual phenomena occurred many years since at Wairarapa, some of which were reported in the Harbinger at the time. Mr. N. tells us that another brother of the boy's, two years older, also sees the pictures, and can tell what any person is doing in the dark.

WHEN THE EVENINGS GROW COLD AND GRAY.

When the evenings grow cold and gray,
And the leaves drift over the way,
When the birds are still that did coo and bill,
And the lambkins have ceased their play,
When the flowers lie pale and dead
On their snowy and frozen bed,
Then we long for the sight of the warm fire-light,
And the home where its luster is shed.

When the evenings grow cold and gray,
And we close up shop for the day,
And haste down street, 'mid snow and sleet,
We revel in thought, on the way,
Of the cheerful, warm evening meal,
Where happy, bright faces reveal
Dear hearts true and sweet, who wait us to greet
With the truest love mortal can feel.

When the evenings grow cold and gray,
On the farm where the corn stalks sway,
And the cattle wait at the old lot gate
For their ration of corn and hay,
And every horse, chicken and pig,
Young and old, little and big,
Are tucked out of sight, in shelter for night,
We smile to hear the wind play.

And then seated around the bright fire,
While the flames rise higher and higher,
We talk and sing, and the angels bring
Unto us nigher and nigher.
Our mutual good all desire,
And to cleanness of life we aspire,
For if there's a spot where evil is not,
'Tis the circle around the fire.

When the evenings grow cold and gray,
And the snow drifts over the way,
Think of the feet half bare in the street,
And the children with no place to stay.
Think of those when the wild winds blow,
The poor with no home, no place to go;
E'en the pig in the sty, or the sheep near by,
Are better protected from snow.

O, I would that in this great land,
Where there's plenty on every hand,
A plan might be had which all would make glad
By supplying each urgent demand.
The charity system I hate,
Which makes man a beggar by fate,
Who finds himself cast by adversity's blast
On the mercy of church or state.

When the evenings grow cold and gray,
And the snow drifts down to stay,
Let us work and pray for the glad new day
When we'll find out a better way;
When no child shall hunger for bread,
Nor want for a warm, cozy bed,
And none weak and old shall waste in the cold
When the evenings look cold and dead.

SPIRITUALISM.

Is Making Converts Everywhere.

COMMUNICATION WITH THE DEAD, BY AUTOMATIC WRITING AND BY ACTUAL CONVERSATION, IS ALLEGED TO HAVE OCCURRED.

The experiences of "B.," as related in the Record-Herald of last Sunday, have proved so interesting to many people who have little or no knowledge concerning the psychic phenomena of Spiritualism that I am impressed to add to his testimony that of a novice in another phase of psychic development—the so-called automatic writing.

Until within the past year I had never come in contact with a Spiritualist; had read nothing on the subject, and it held not the slightest interest for me. Puritan of ancestry and Presbyterian of faith, my religious development had been along strictly orthodox lines, and I cannot say that I was ever greatly concerned over the problem of existence after death. The loss of my mother affected me deeply, and I hoped, as all Christians hope, that at some time, in some place, I should meet her again, though I felt no positive assurance on the subject.

MESSAGE FROM THE DEAD.

Last January I was invited to spend an evening at the home of a friend, where I met a young woman who is a gifted psychic. She is not a professed Spiritualist, in no sense a public medium, and only at my urgent request consented to try to get a letter for me from my mother.

We sat around an ordinary parlor table upon which rested a tablet and pencil, our hands resting lightly upon it. After a brief interval passed in ordinary conversation the hands of the medium beat rapidly upon the table, she seized the pencil and began to write slowly and laboriously, as one unaccustomed to the use of the pen. The message was from my mother and began thus:

"Oh, so long have I wanted to let you know that I was always with you in all your joys and sorrows!"

Then followed many details of my life since she left me, and a warning concerning a certain business transaction in which I had intrusted money to a third party whose honesty I did not question.

WARNING WELL FOUNDED.

The medium had no knowledge whatever concerning my personal affairs, and subsequent investigation proved the warning to have been well founded. The handwriting was a perfect facsimile of my mother's, and, a most peculiar characteristic, she wrote "cross-ways" of the tablet, as had been her invariable custom.

I was naturally much impressed by the indisputable evidence of my mother's personality, and when convenience permitted visited my friend again and secured other letters, all bearing the same stamp of her individuality and dealing with my personal affairs, in which she evinced an anxious interest.

The psychic power is natural in this family, a brother of the young lady referred to being a perfect clairvoyant. The subject is never mentioned outside the family circle, however, and I was admitted as a mark of special friendship. On one occasion a few months later I spent an evening with them, and we sat a party of three in a dark room while the gentleman in question described the spirit friends he saw.

CALL FROM A PREACHER.

Suddenly he said "Here comes a minister!" giving a minute description of him, which would indicate either an Episcopalian or a Catholic. By conversation we learned that the stranger had come on a mission to me, and after the gas was lighted he stated in writing that he wished to use me as an instrument for carrying on his work with the pen. I was requested to sit alone for a half hour each evening in a dark room for development.

The next evening I retired to my room and sat at my desk, resting my arm lightly thereon. In less than fifteen minutes my hand began to vibrate, the motion gradually extending to the arm with what is known as the "muscular movement," a system of penmanship I had never been able to master.

For about two weeks the programme did not vary. I covered countless sheets of paper with the markings familiar on copy-books. Then I suddenly began to write a letter at my mother's dictation, in which she expressed her great joy at being able to communicate with me direct, and related much that I wished to know concerning other relatives in the "far country."

SERMON IS DICTATED.

The next evening my ministerial friend, who I now learned was a Catholic priest, stated that he wished to dictate a sermon. I took about a thousand words as rapidly as the pencil could fly over the paper, the subject matter dealing with conditions in the Catholic church of which I had no knowledge and toward which I had inherited an unusual prejudice.

This was followed by other articles of similar or greater length, a lecture, oration, poems, etc.

This personality of a man I never knew on earth has modified my views on many questions, taught me patience, gentleness, self-control. The story of his life, which began in Ireland, never ceases to interest me, and his descriptions of the life beyond are full of beauty and charm. I have asked questions on every conceivable subject, and the replies are always prompt and satisfactory.

Within a few weeks from the time I began to write automatically I developed the power of clairaudience, and can carry on a conversation of any length with any friend in the other sphere I may choose to ask for. Incidents have been related to me concerning the passing away of certain friends whose relatives I have never seen since and so had no opportunity to learn of them through the ordinary channels.

NEWS FROM HER MOTHER.

My mother has told me of certain events happening in the homes of relatives at the present time which a letter of inquiry proved to be absolutely correct.

I may say in passing that I have visited a so-called "trumpet seance," described by "B." and received the same apparently reliable confirmation of what I learned through other sources.

With all my experiences I have come in contact with but two professional mediums, and that only on three occasions. They were vouched for by reliable persons. I have no reason to doubt their honesty, and the sharpest investigation could detect no signs of fraud.

I have read, with unprejudiced mind, Hudson's "Law of Psychic Phenomena," also minor works on the same subject, and I cannot in the face of my personal experiences accept the theories advanced, though I am not prepared to disprove them.

Summing the matter up, the situation is about as follows:

So far as I can judge, I am perfectly sane. My intellect is normal; if anything keener than heretofore.

I show no signs of eccentricity if the comments of my family may be relied upon.

SLEEPS LIKE A CHILD.

My health is as good as it has been for years past and I sleep like a child. An accomplished hypnotist was unable to have any influence over me and I know nothing of the trance condition.

In spite of the above facts I can converse at any time with an invisible personality by the power of telepathy, or by writing, the letter appearing as one-sided, as a conversation heard over the telephone.

The only rational conclusion I can arrive at is that the existence after the change we call death is similar to that in this world, minus the physical body.

That the mentalities of our friends are ever near us, longing to give counsel and comfort and debarred only by the dullness of our comprehension.

That the power of communication only awaits development in every human being, and that the time must come when such power will be universally recognized.

When that day arrives the grave will be robbed of its terrors, the mystery of death will have lost its sting and the reign of the public medium, with its opportunities for fraud and imposition, will be at an end.—Chicago Record-Herald.

WAH LEE'S GHOST.

It Appears in the County Jail at Sioux City, Ia.

INVITATION.

The Prisoners in the County Jail Request the Attendance of the Public at Their Temporary Home All Nights of the Week at 12 O'Clock p. m.

Ghosts. R. S. V. P.

The sheeted apparition of a Chinaman appears nightly in the jail in the Court House basement, the prisoners of past and present say.

Eighteen years ago Wah Lee, alias Lee Sam, hanged himself to the steam pipes in the jail.

It is his ghost, clad in the flowing robes of the celestial kingdom, his long queue dangling down his back, that disturbs the nightly slumbers of the prisoners in the strong cage and has driven strong men, who flinch not at bullets, into wild paroxysms of fear.

This nightly visitor is no hoax, conjured up by the wild stories of idle prisoners, but is so recognized a personage about the jail that Chris Krege, the jailer, does not ask any prisoner to sleep in the "haunted" cell, and if he does, the prisoner has never failed to make other arrangements for his lodgings without delay.

CHINAMAN'S CRIME.

In the spring of 1883 Wah Lee killed a brother Chinaman in a building that stood at the alley on Third street, between Pearl and Douglass, facing south. He used a dagger and by a swift blow disemboweled his victim. By the murder he stole a large sum of money.

Wah Lee was arrested and confined in the county jail. He was indicted for murder. He was confined in what is called the "bum cell." This opens into the west branch of the corridor. The cell is situated immediately behind the "cage," which is placed in the first cell from the entrance. Only a wall separates the "cage" from the "bum cell," and there is an opening in the wall through which the steam pipes pass.

FOUND MURDERER DEAD.

Wah Lee's crime hung heavily on his conscience. As the weeks went by and the day of accounting drew near, it was evident to his keepers that the Chinaman was brooding. One morning his body was found hanging from the steam pipes in the "bum cell."

A few years ago the friends and relatives of the suicide came to Sioux City, dug up his bones and carried them back to China.

And now his troubled spirit, doomed for a space to walk the night, is said to re-visit the scene of its release, to haunt the sleep of those who cannot, like his vapory form, escape through iron bars.

There are three sleeping cells in the iron cage. A corridor runs within the cage, in front of these cells, and connecting them. The cage is used for the more important prisoners, and when full all the sleeping cells are occupied.

"GHOST" COMES AT MIDNIGHT.

The phantom appears at only one of these sleeping cells. Sometimes it comes a little before 12 o'clock at night, but at 12, the dread hour, it is almost certain to knock at the door of the cage.

The specter first makes known its presence by an uncanny rattle of the locked and barred door of the cage. A moment later his form melts through the ironed wall and he appears at the door of the first sleeping cell.

PRISONERS AFFIRM IT.

"Come here at 12 o'clock any night and you can see for yourself," said Ed Powell, a muscular six-footer, confined in the cage.

"They all tell about it," said Ben McKnight, the uxoricide, "but I have never seen it. I sleep in the far cell."

"There's no joke about it," said Pat Murray, sentenced to the penitentiary for doing a hold-up job. Murray is not a nervous man. His square jaw, cold blue eyes and well-knit form bespeak the dauntless courage which he is conceded to have.

And yet this man took his cot from the haunted cell at 2 o'clock at night, lay down beside James Maguire, the negro, in the far cell, and cannot be induced to return.

SAW IT NIGHTLY.

"It was all right as long as Martin English was there with me in the cell," he says. "We saw the blamed thing every night, but there were two of us, and we kept our nerve. Then they took English away, and the next night the confounded ghost came into the cell and walked around as if it were at home. It was too much for me and I got right out. No, sir, I won't go back there."

"What does the Chinaman do?" Murray was asked.

"Well, he comes in at the door of the cage there. He always rattles the door and then jumps inside. English heard him say, 'Good shat,' as he landed in the cell one night. Then he comes in to the sleeping cell and walks around. He breathes just like a man being strangled to death. The breath comes hard and keeps choking more and more till it stops with a kind of gurgle. He throws his arms about, too, as if he was struggling."

VISITS LAST TEN MINUTES.

"How long does the thing stay?"

"Usually about ten minutes," answered the prisoner. "He will come back in an hour or two."

Chris Krege, the jailer, said: "Every prisoner who has been in that cage since I came here last March, except McKnight, says he has seen the ghost, and swears up and down to it. They began telling me about it as soon as I came, and I thought they were trying to frighten me. But I soon found out they were really frightened. William Baker, a colored boy, was scared nearly to death. William Plummer didn't have the nerve to sleep in the first cell, and you know he has lots of nerve.

PRISONERS ALL CONFIRM IT.

"I guess there have been twenty-five prisoners in that cage since I came here and they all tell the same story. It's no joke. I can't make them sleep in the first cell. Murray sleeps every night with Maguire, so he won't have to stay with the first cell, and you know how well an Irishman likes to sleep with a negro."

W. C. Davenport, ex-sheriff, confirms the story. He says that the prisoners told him about the apparition all through his term of office.

"You know this big negro, Brock, don't you?" asked the ex-sheriff. "He was simply terrified. He almost went into paroxysms over the thing and he's no coward."—Sioux City Tribune.

DIAGNOSIS OF DEATH.

Forecasting the Time of Transition.

"I am not so superstitious as some of you physicians—men of science, as you are pleased to be called," said Hawver, replying to an accusation that had not been made. "Some of you—only a few, I confess—believe in the immortality of the soul, and in apparitions which you have not the honesty to call ghosts. I go no further than a conviction that the living are sometimes seen where they are not, but have been—where they have lived so long, perhaps so intensely, as to have left their impress on everything about them. I know, indeed, that one's environment may be so affected by one's personality as to yield, long afterward, an image of one's self to the eyes of another. Doubtless the impressing personality has to be the right kind of personality, as the perceiving eyes have to be the right kind of eyes—mine, for example."

"Say, rather, the usual kind of eyes, purveying sensations to the wrong kind of brain," said Dr. Frayley, smiling.

"Thank you; one likes to have an expectation gratified; that is about the reply that I supposed you would have the civility to make."

"Pardon me. But you say that you know. That is a good deal to say, don't you think? Perhaps you will not mind the trouble of saying how you learned."

"You will call it an hallucination," Hawver said, "but that does not matter." And he told the story.

"Last summer I went, as you know, to pass the hot weather term in the town of Meridan. The relative at whose house I had intended to stay was ill, and I sought other quarters. After some difficulty I succeeded in renting a vacant dwelling that had been occupied by an eccentric physician of the name of Mannering, who had gone away, years before, no one knew where, not even his agent. He had built the house himself and had lived in it with an old servant for about ten years. His practice, never very extensive, had after a few years been given up entirely. Not only so, but he had withdrawn himself almost altogether from social life and become a recluse. I was told by the village doctor, about the only person with whom he held any relations, that during his retirement he had devoted himself to a single line of study, the result of which he had expounded in a book that did not commend itself to the approval of his professional brethren, who, indeed, considered him not entirely sane. I have not seen the book and cannot now recall the title of it, but I am told that it expounded a rather startling theory. He held that it was possible in the case of many a person in absolute health to forecast his death with scientific precision, several months in advance of the event. The limit, I think, was eighteen months. There were local tales of his having exerted his powers of prognosis, or perhaps you would say diagnosis, and it was said that in every instance the person whose friends he had warned had died suddenly at the appointed time, and from no assignable cause. All this, however, has nothing to do with what I have to tell; I thought it might amuse a physician.

"The house was furnished, just as he had lived in it. It was a rather gloomy dwelling for one who was neither a recluse nor a student, and I think it imparted something of its characters to me—perhaps some of its former occupant's character; for always I felt in it a certain melancholy that was not in my natural disposition, nor, I think, due to loneliness. I had no servants that slept in the house, but I have always been, as you know, rather fond of my own society, being much addicted to reading, though little to study. Whatever was the cause, the effect was dejection and a sense of impending evil; this was especially so in Dr. Mannering's study, although that room was the lightest and most airy in the house. The doctor's life-size portrait in oil hung in that room, and seemed completely to dominate it. There was nothing unusual in the picture; the man was evidently rather good looking, about fifty years old, with iron-gray hair, a smooth-shaven face and dark, serious eyes. Something in the picture always drew and held my attention. The man's appearance became very familiar to me.

"One evening I was passing through this room to my bedroom, with a lamp—there is no gas in Meridan. I stopped as usual before the portrait, which seemed in the lamplight to have a new expression, not easily named, but distinctly uncanny. It interested but did not disturb me. I moved the lamp from one side to the other and observed the effects of the altered light. While so engaged I felt an impulse to turn round. As I did so I saw the figure of a man moving across the room directly toward me! As soon as it came near enough for the lamplight to illuminate the face I saw that it was that of Dr. Mannering himself; it was as if the portrait were walking!

"I beg your pardon,' I said, somewhat coldly, 'but if you knocked I did not hear.'

"He passed me, within an arm's length, lifted his right forefinger, as in warning, and without a word went on out of the room, though I observed his exit no more than I had observed his entrance. Of course, I need not tell you that this was what you will call an hallucination and I call an apparition. That room had only two doors, of which one was locked and the other led into the bedroom, from which there was no exit. My feeling on realizing this is not an important part of the incident.

"Doubtless this seems to you a very commonplace 'ghost story,' one constructed on the regular lines laid down by the old masters of the art. If that were so I should not have related it, even if it were true. The man was not dead; I met him to-day in Union street. He passed me in a crowd."

Hawver had finished his story and both men were silent. The wind had risen and was rattling away at the closed shutters just as if this had been a real ghost story. Dr. Frayley thoughtfully stirred the coals in the grate.

"Did he say anything to-day?" he asked—"anything from which you inferred that he was not dead?"

Hawver stared and did not reply.

"Perhaps," continued Frayley, "he made a sign, a gesture—lifted a finger, as in warning. It's a trick he had—a habit when saying something serious—announcing the result of a diagnosis, for example."

"Yes, he did—just as his apparition had done. But, good God! did you ever know him?" Hawver was apparently growing nervous.

"I knew him. I have read his book, as will every physician some day. It is one of the most striking and important of the century's contributions to medical science. Yes, I knew him; I attended him in an illness three years ago. He died."

Hawver sprang from his chair, manifestly disturbed. He strode forward and back across the room; then approached his friend, and in a voice not altogether steady, said: "Doctor, have you anything to say to me—as a physician?"

"No, Hawver; you are the healthiest man I ever knew. As a friend I advise you to go to your room—you play the violin like an angel. Get this cursed bad business off your mind."

The next day Hawver was found dead in his room, the violin at his neck, the bow upon the strings, his music open before him at Chopin's funeral march.—Ambrose Pierce, in Chicago American.

THE OCCULT WORLD.

A Weird Experience of the Wife.

SAYS THERE WAS A MAN IN HER ROOM AND SHE FELT THE CLASP OF HIS DEATH-LIKE HAND.

A most remarkable thing in connection with the death of a man at Smith's Grove is reported. For some time John Mustain, of Horse Cave, who was a well-known citizen of that place, and a painter by trade, had been at Smith's Grove engaged in painting a house. Yesterday morning early before the citizens of Smith's Grove were astir, Mr. Mustain was awakened with a terrible pain in the region of the heart. He got up and dressed himself and hurried to a dentist, Dr. Thomas.

The latter gave him some whisky, which seemed to give him some relief, and started to make him a mustard plaster, but it was too late, for Mr. Mustain sank down and in an instant was dead. He died at 5:07 o'clock and his family at Horse Cave were notified and came down on the noon train. Then the most remarkable thing in connection with his death was disclosed. Just at the time he died, precisely at 5:07 o'clock, Mrs. Mustain, his wife, who was at home in bed at Horse Cave, awakened with a piercing scream and called to her son who hurriedly answered the call. When he reached her she was terribly frightened, and said: "There is a man in the room. He took hold of my hand and his hand felt cold and clammy, like the hand of a corpse."

Her son hurriedly turned up the light in the room, but no one was to be seen and the dial of the clock showed the time to be 5:07 a. m.

He tried to reassure his mother by telling her that there certainly had been no one in the room, as the doors were securely locked and the windows down, but she still strenuously insisted that there had been and that she could not be mistaken. Shortly after they received news of the sudden death of Mr. Mustain at Smith's Grove, which occurred precisely at the time at which Mrs. Mustain was awakened and felt the clasp of a death-like hand.

The matter has since been the subject of discussion at Smith's Grove and Horse Cave and the people are at a loss to account for her strange vision at the time of the death of her husband.

Did she really feel the grasp of her dying husband's hand, though she was in one town and he in another? Was his disembodied spirit in her room, taking its long farewell? In his dying moments did he commune with her through the medium of telepathy or otherwise? These are questions that are being asked, but will never be answered this side the portals of the unseen world.

Suffice it to say that the incident was a remarkably strange one and is giving rise to a great deal of speculation. —Bowling Green (Ky.) Times-Journal.

The Women Would Be Against It.

"The women would be against it," remarked one of the shrewdest politicians in the state of New York, not long ago, in discussing a question for the popular vote. "I am fast coming to the conclusion that the influence of the women counts for more in our politics now that any other single element." Certain it is that the time has forever passed for the old sneers over the idea that women should help in the solution of our problems, and nobody except the hopeless Bourbons longer ridicules any suggestion for utilizing the services which they may render the community. The revised city charter provides for the establishment of forty-six local school boards, composed of five members each, and there will be general approval among thoughtful people of the policy advocated by Superintendent Maxwell in an address yesterday, when he said:

"I need not emphasize the importance of inducing men and women of intelligence, public spirit, and interest in educational work, to become members of the local school boards. I sincerely hope that the Borough presidents will appoint two, if not three, women on each school board.—New York Evening Post."

Spiritualists Win in Nebraska Court Decision.

Judge Holmes yesterday entered a decree in the case of the state against G. S. Klock, who was fined in police court for practicing clairvoyancy without securing a license from the city. The court holds that Spiritualism is a religion and that Mr. Klock, in acting as clairvoyant, was following his religious beliefs. The decision follows:

"That on the 2d day of December, 1901, the defendant, G. S. Klock, was the duly elected and ordained minister of a Spiritualistic society incorporated under the laws of the state of Nebraska providing for the incorporation of religious societies.

"That as a part of the rite and ceremonies the practice of clairvoyancy was engaged in as proof of the teachings and doctrines of the Spiritualists' belief.

"That as the minister of such Spiritualistic organization and claiming to possess clairvoyant powers, the defendant engaged in the practice of clairvoyancy, and held readings as a clairvoyant, both among those belonging to such Spiritualistic organization and those seeking the said defendant, and engaging him in the manifestation of his powers as aforesaid and that the defendant did demand and receive fees for such clairvoyant readings and Spiritualistic manifestations, as produced by him.

"That the defendant, as minister of such organization, received no salary, but under the provisions of his said church organization was duly authorized and allowed to demand and receive such fees for the exercise of his clairvoyant powers.

"Spiritualism is defined as the belief that departed spirits hold intercourse with mortals by means of physical phenomena, as by rappings, or during abnormal mental states, as in trances or the like, commonly manifested through a person of special susceptibility called a medium. The defendant claims this special susceptibility and is believed by the members of his organization to possess mediumistic powers—a power, while in a mesmeric state, of discerning objects not perceptible by the senses in their normal condition. Hence the Spiritualist believes the doctrine in opposition to the materialists, namely, that all that exists is spirit or soul, that what is called the external world is a succession of notions impressed on the mind by Deity. Does this constitute a religion?

"Religion is defined as the outward act or form by which men indicate their recognition of a God or gods, having power over their destiny, to whom obedience, service and honor are due, or again, religion is that feeling or expression of human love, fear, or awe, of some superhuman and overruling power, whether by profession of belief, by observance of rites and ceremonies, or by the conduct of life. Because, therefore, one does not believe in the rites and ceremonies or the doctrinal teachings of any organization, it cannot be claimed that it does not constitute a religion, for many of the rites and ceremonies or the doctrinal teachings of any organization, it cannot be claimed that it does not constitute a religion, for many of the rites and ceremonies of the Christian church in the teaching of theology, would appear as ridiculous and nonsensical to some as does the practice of clairvoyance and the idea that the spirits of those departed from this life held intercourse with the living.

"The question, therefore, presented to this court by the evidence adduced at this hearing is, whether or not the city council can legislate specially as against the Spiritualists practicing clairvoyance and compel a license therefor.

"The constitution of Nebraska guarantees to all subjects of the state an indefensible right to worship God according to the dictates of their own consciences and provides that no preference shall be given by law to any religious society nor shall any interference with the rights of conscience be permitted.

"The ordinance upon which this prosecution is had is certainly an interferance with the rights and privileges of those believing in Spiritualism, a religion that seeks the piety of those believing in its teachings, and is, therefore, special legislation and prohibited by the constitution of this state, and the ordinance upon which the prosecution is had is, therefore, void.

"This action is, therefore, dismissed and defendant discharged."—State Journal, Lincoln, Neb.

Stirring Words from Iowa.

To the Editor:—Reading Brother Hull's appeal to the presidents and executive boards of the different states has aroused all the Spiritualistic patriotism in me, and for one I say amen. I believe the time has come to separate commercialism from the phenomena of Spiritualism and to purify our public servants, in sending out honest, pure-minded mediums and public speakers.

I agree with the brother that we should exercise the most rigid precaution in ordaining ministers of the gospel of Spiritualism. I also believe the executive boards of the different states should adopt some plan, of uniform rules and regulations governing mediums and speakers.

The fraud that is being perpetrated under the guise of Spiritualism is doing more to injure and retard the growth of our beloved philosophy than all other antagonisms combined. When mediums are traveling all over this beautiful land of ours, mulcting the over anxious sensitives out of large sums of money, for alleged assistance in their development, and daily perpetrating fraud on the friends of the cause, these same mediums not even being Spiritualists, it is high time something was done to stop this wholesale desecration of the only true religion, the time has come to cry aloud, in season and out of season, until fraud is stamped out of our ranks.

This may seem to some to be too rash, however if we do not act, and act now, our cause in the future will be retarded, and the growth of Spiritualism in the future as in the past, be held back by causes within our province to remove, if we only have the courage of our convictions.

I write this with malice towards no medium, but with the kindest of motives and with the express purpose of good to the cause. I would suggest that the executive boards of the different states send delegates to a convention to be held at some central point in the near future to organize the executives into a society to work for the betterment of our teachers and mediums.

PASSED TO SPIRIT LIFE.

[Obituaries to the extent of ten lines only will be inserted free. All in excess of ten lines will be charged at the rate of fifteen cents per line. About seven words constitute one line.]

Mrs. A. B. C. Arnold passed to spirit life, Dec. 5, at the residence of her daughter, Mrs. V. A. Betts, at Clyde, Ohio, at the ripe age of 87 years. She had been a Spiritualist for many years, and waited anxiously for the change. For over five months she had been a great sufferer, but amidst it all she was ever happy and cheerful, making all arrangements for her funeral. The writer, a friend of the family for many years, was chosen to officiate at the funeral which was very largely attended at the home of her daughter. The consolation that Spiritualism alone can present was given to the family, who are all Spiritualists.

G. H. BROOKS.

Passed to spirit life, Nov. 13, 1901, near Camden, Mich., William L. Lords, aged 80 years. He was a life-long Spiritualist and one of the noblest and best men I ever met. As there were no Spiritualist speakers within reach, all funeral ceremonies were dispensed with according to his last request. To know Uncle William as he was familiarly called was to love him. The writer has great reasons for loving him, for it was he who first caused him to investigate Spiritualism.

B. V. SPRINGER.

Funeral services over the late Mrs. Trickler were held Dec. 8, from the Spiritualists Temple, Anderson, Ind. Dr. Hilligoss conducted the services and in speaking of the deceased paid her a high tribute, mentioning in touching words the woman's most notable character and loving disposition. The sterling qualities and true friendship of the lodge of Knights and Ladies of Columbus were evidenced yesterday by almost a full attendance, the inclemency of the weather not being allowed to interfere with a desire on their part to pay to their beloved friend and lady the high mark of respect in which she was held by all.

Miss Eliza Stebbins passed to the higher life, Dec. 3, 1901, at the home of her sister, Mrs. M. L. O'Dell, in Paw Paw. The funeral services were conducted by H. L. Chapman of Marcellus, Mich.

MRS. M. L. O'DELL.

Clara B. Gardner, 83 years of age, passed to spirit life at Sturgis, Mich., Nov. 28. For nearly fifty years she had been a Spiritualist.

LAURA C. ANSLEY.

Passed to spirit life, November 21, Mrs. Emma F. Vogan. She was a true Spiritualist and had no doubts as to her future state, and for months before the transition, expressed her desire to enter the beyond and be free to learn more of life. According to her expressed desire services over the remains were conducted by the Richmond Psychical Research Society, of which she was a zealous member. We shall miss her from our midst. Still we know her spirit will surely be with us

F. L. JOBSON.

Richmond, Va.

Mrs. H. Houghton-Chaapel entered more progressive spheres of spirit life, Nov. 20, 1901, from her home in Palmetto, Fla., after a brief illness; aged 78 years. For some months she had presentiments that her long, active, useful life on earth was near its end. She gave directions for a plain coffin and funeral—no prayer or invocation, and that her husband, Jay Chaapel, speak over her lifeless form, which he did for about twenty minutes, after reading a poem, "Mon Ami," from her book published over a year ago. She left several bequests to the poor, and $4,000 to $5,000 to the Freethought University at Silverton, Oregon. COR.

Passed to spirit life, from his home in Leon, Wis., Richard DeWitt, aged 83 years. He was the oldest man in the community in which he lived yet he retained in a remarkable degree his mental powers until the close of his long and active life. His entire family, a wife and six children, the circle until now unbroken, were gathered at his bedside to catch the last sign of recognition and good-by before he passed to his home beyond. He was a highly respected citizen, a devoted husband and loving father, and passed on as he had lived, with full faith in the glorious teachings of Spiritualism. The writer officiated at his funeral and was again permitted to shed some light upon the minds of those who were bound by creed, superstition or prejudice.

CATHARINE M'FARLIN.

Mrs. Julia Lyon, aged 75, passed to the higher life, from her home, 174 Gladys avenue, Chicago, Dec. 9. Mrs. Lyon was a consistent Spiritualist, and found in its beautiful teachings great comfort during the years of physical weakness that preceded her transition. She was patient, loving, and a true friend. It was a blessing to her to be attended by her daughter, who lived with her in their home. The funeral services occurred Dec. 12. Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond officiated. Beautiful flowers attested the love of her friends, and were mute sermons of joy for the release of the unseen sister. Cremation at Rosehill.

Mrs. Mary Durfee, aged 83 years, passed to spirit life from the Old Ladies Home, 3850, Indiana avenue, December 9. Mrs. Durfee was a strong believer and advocate of the Spiritualistic philosophy, and neglected no opportunity to present its truths to others. The funeral services were held on the 12th in the chapel of the Home, conducted by Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, pastor of the Church of the Soul. It was Mrs. Durfee's request to have Mrs. Richmond officiate, and the officers of the Home were most desirous (as they always are) of carrying out her wishes. Many inmates of the Home and many members of Mrs. Richmond's congregation were present. The music was by members of Mrs. Richmond's choir. Burial at Oakwoods. X.

Edna, the only child of Solon and Edna Kinsmen, aged four months, passed to spirit life, December 1. Mr. and Mrs. Kinsmen are mediums of Fitchburg, Mass., who have been very useful in making many happy in the knowledge of the truth, and now this beautiful truth comes as a great support to them in their great sorrow. The writer officiated at the funeral.

MRS. J. W. KENYON.

Wm. Porter passed to spirit life, November 5, from his home near Leonidas, Mich., aged 64 years. Services were conducted by F. M. Aunks.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1901.

For the Good of Our Cause.

If Spiritualism is on the decline, as some writers claim, if it manifests any apparent tendency that way, it may safely be taken for fact, that the chief cause of such apparent decline is chargeable to the remissness of spiritual societies in organizing and sustaining children's lyceums as a vital auxiliary to the support and spread of our cause.

The great question should come home to every Spiritualist: Shall our children be miseducated in the warping and enslaving dogmas and teachings of the current orthodox Sunday-schools; or shall they be educated in the living, vital truths of Spiritualism—its facts, its phenomena, its philosophy and ethics? By all except the utterly careless and indifferent, there can be but one answer given, and that answer should incite Spiritualists to activity in earnest work in children's lyceums. The prosperity of Spiritualist societies, the good of the children, and the spread of our cause demands this work.

Sunday-schools fill the minds of children with false ideas which are instilled as God's truth, taught by His infallible word, the Bible. Deep, awesome reverence for that "word of God" is inculcated and impressed upon the child-mind, until the impress is well-nigh, if not quite, ineradicable; even by the maturing of mind under the growth of years and the impact of knowledge acquired in the great school of life, thought and experience.

Supernaturalism, even to the verge of fetishism, is taught in the Sunday-school; the lyceum, in accordance with Spiritualism, teaches naturalism—that nothing is or can be supernatural.

Miracles, as understood by orthodox expounders, are supernatural; as such, Spiritualists declare them impossible.

In the Sunday-school, dogmas and Bible texts must be received and believed without question, under peril of the soul's everlasting damnation. To doubt is to incur God's anger and risk the soul's endless misery.

Spiritualism and the lyceum encourages full and free inquiry and fearless investigation, and the bravest acceptance of truth wherever found.

Hence, Sunday-school studies and teachings make cowardly minds, that fear to believe contrary to the teachings of orthodoxy, lest they fall into the power of the Devil and be forever lost.

Spiritualism through the lessons inculcated in lyceums, makes brave, fearless, progressive thinkers, who fear not to follow truth and reason wherever they may lead and however far away from the old landmarks of venerable superstitious beliefs.

Instead of fettering and tethering minds to ancient puerilities and falsities because a so-called infallible book teaches the same, the Spiritualist children's lyceum encourages the full and free exercise of one's best common sense, reason and judgment in all things, not excepting things given or purporting to be given by spirit inspiration. It recognizes no inspiration as infallible and to be accepted and believed as truth even though it teaches contrary to our moral sense of right and justice. Herein the lyceum differs from the orthodox pattern of Sunday-school.

As a result of Sunday-school training, the churches to-day are full of cowards, who dare not think freely, because they know such thinking will surely lead them away from the church, from the Bible as an infallible, inerrant book, and from orthodox doctrines and teachings generally. They feel that, for their soul's salvation they must hold fast, at all hazards, to their plenary-inspired Bible, and the orthodox doctrines derived therefrom.

A question now comes home to Spiritualists—a question big with import to the cause of Spiritualism, and to the world at large—do Spiritualists want their children trained to be moral mental cowards, or trained to be brave, fearless, manly and womanly independent thinkers, with minds progressive, and ever ready to accept new truths?

Spiritualists, what are you going to do about it?

The Lord's Prayer Forbidden.

From Minnesota comes the information that Attorney General Douglas has recently upheld a ruling of former Attorney General H. W. Childs in an opinion given to State Superintendent Olson that under the state constitution the Lord's prayer cannot be used in the public schools. This ruling is because of section 16, article 1, of the state constitution, which says:

"Nor shall any man be compelled to attend, erect or support any place of worship."

The question came to Superintendent Olson of the department of public instruction from a school director of Pierz, Morrison county, Minnesota.

In Wisconsin.

H. D. Barrett, president of the N. S. A., is now in Wisconsin, where for a season he will answer calls to lecture. Mr. Barrett is highly interesting and instructive as a lecturer, and we hope every society in the state will have an opportunity to hear him. He can be addressed at Whitewater, Wis., in care of Morris Pratt.

The Astral Body.

As set forth in the Harbinger of Light, Melbourne, Australia, Dr. Constantin-Alexandrowith Bodisco who, in 1892, published in French, a book which we reviewed at the time of its appearance, entitled "Psychic Researches Between 1888-1892, Dedicated to the Incredulous and the Egotists," has just addressed to El Spiritualista of Valparaiso, a letter in which he describes a discovery of the highest importance in connection with the science of Spiritualism As the value of a statement of this kind depends, to some extent, upon the intellectual capacity and attainments of the author of it, it may be mentioned that Dr. Bodisco's father was the Russian Ambassador to the United States, married an American lady, that the son was born in the United States, that the son became, in course of time, secretary to the Embassy at Washington, and Russian Commissioner to the Philadelphia Exhibition in 1870, likewise married an American wife, and on his return to St. Petersburg, was appointed Chamberlain to the Emperor, by whom he was entrusted with several confidential missions of a diplomatic character; and it is well known that Russian diplomats are reputed to be the ablest in Europe. For the last twelve years, Dr. Bodisco has devoted himself to psychic researches, and has especially investigated the nature of the luminous matter which forms what may be called the "substance" of the astral body, aura, or perispirit of every human being. He has done so, he says, in the presence and with the co-operation of persons worthy of the utmost confidence, and under strictly scientific test conditions. In the work above referred to, he expressed his conviction that that substance would prove to be the link, or mediator, between the visible and the invisible world. He has now satisfied himself that it is so, and is certain that "when the laws to which it is subject have been discovered, it will produce an enormous moral revolution in the whole of humanity."

We will now let Dr. Bodisco describe the discovery in his own words: "In Tsarkole, one of the suburbs of St. Petersburg, we met, to the number of five persons, in a darkened habitation. Two of these persons fell into a deep and tranquil sleep, merely under the imposition of hands, and without any passes; and in a few minutes we all of us saw a luminous white spot enveloping the hand of one of the sleepers, which gradually increased in intensity. This brilliant substance had all the appearance of a snow-flake with a certain blue tint in it, and through it we could clearly perceive the hand of the subject. The point of departure of this luminous substance appeared to be the palm of the hand, and its light was sufficiently intense to illuminate perfectly the various objects we brought near it. The hand of the medium began to move over the table until it reached a pencil, which, likewise illuminated, was enveloped in the astral and began to make attempts to write upon the table independently of the hand, which continued illuminated. Suddenly the medium, without coming out of trance, pronounced the following words:

"'This is the astral body; you have been witnesses of its power of attraction.'

"The substance separated itself gradually from the pencil, and, at the same time, considerably augmented in volume. Then the subject, taking a part of this spongy and imponderable substance, formed a ball of it and placed it in my left hand, and in my right hand a hard and heavy body, intensely white in colour, which had been formed in my sight.

"The subject again spoke to the following effect:

"'You hold in your right hand a portion of the astral fluid, and in your left another portion, which is astral matter condensed. You hold in your hands the immaterial part of the human body; that which is indestructible, and out of which the material world has been created. That which you touch at this moment is indestructibly bound up with my being, yet you could not perceive it by itself; for to your sight, they are two separate things.'

"I continued to observe these bodies with the liveliest interest, when I began to feel that the 'stone' I held in my hand emitted a powerful heat, at the same time that it diminished in luminosity. Presently the medium took these objects from my hands, laid the 'stone' upon the table, and with the spongy substance, lightly brushed my head and face; and at the contact, it felt something like a hank of cotton, or of very fine tulle. Then he blended this latter substance in his hand, which liquefied, and placing it on the stone he presented it to our view. I observed for five minutes, with the greatest attention, this extraordinary body. I touched it, admiring the constitution of its brilliant texture, and watching its progressive diminution in light and volume until it finally disappeared. Then I lighted a candle, and observing that the subjects were still in trance, I proceeded to awaken them by means of passes. The experiment had lasted for more than an hour. After tea, we seated ourselves at the table, and in about two minutes, one of the subjects fell into a magnetic sleep. He walked behind the curtain and told us to light a magnesium lamp. The sudden glare forced us to close our eyes, and when we opened them again, we saw the medium immersed in a luminous substance analogous to that seen in the previous experiment, which softly illuminated the whole room with the effect of moonlight. The medium arose from the arm chair in which he was seated, slowly gathered together around his head the marvelous garment of light which covered him, and approaching the table enveloped the whole of us in this veil.

"Three of the persons present saw and heard what took place, and can verify the accuracy of my statements. The fourth and fifth were in a trance."

New Trial and Yearly Subscribers.

All new trial or yearly subscribers will have their subscriptions commence with the Hull-Jamieson debate, unless otherwise ordered. After publishing the debate in our regular edition, we combine them in one paper, No. 624, Nov. 9, at which time the debate commenced. That date contains six addresses of the debate. The next paper that all new trial and yearly subscribers will receive will be number 630, bearing the date of Dec. 21, and containing the seventh address of the debate.

SPIRITUALISM A RELIGION

So Pronounced by the Nebraska Courts, and Is Entitled to Protection by Laws.

Dispatch from Lincoln says: Spiritualism has been pronounced a distinct religion by the Nebraska courts, and its believers are entitled to all the protection guaranteed by the State Constitution.

Recently the Rev. Mr. Klook, head of the Lincoln colony of Spiritualists, was fined in the police court for practicing clairvoyancy without a license. The defendant admitted foretelling the future by spirit communication and charging a fee for the information.

To-day District Judge Holmes set the Spiritualistic elder free, decreeing that his punishment was an abridgment of his rights under the Constitution and that the ordinance under which he was fined was special legislation and therefore unlawful.

A Priceless Paper.

J. CLEGG WRIGHT.

A New Scientific Discovery.

A woman, Mme. Slodowska Curie, a Pole, assisted by her husband, a Frenchman, is reported to have discovered a new metallic substance which they have named polonium, which threatens in some measure to revolutionize our ideas of light.

The regents of the Smithsonian Institute, at Washington, in their annual report, discuss the metal, and show it possesses wonderful properties. One portion of a specimen never exposed to sun-light, hence could not have borrowed its rays, having been kept in entire darkness for many weeks, when opened in a perfectly dark room, glowed and gave out a bluish light from which photographic impressions were made.

Some of the scientists connected with the Institute, maintain that this mineral bears light, just as hardness is a property of iron.

This discovery of itself may not be so important, but others incidental to it, is powerfully suggestive that we are on the eve of astonishing scientific discoveries which will revolutionize current ideas in regard to matter.

The X-ray has demonstrated that light can penetrate solid matter, and reveal much that is within. Even copper eight-tenths of an inch in thickness did not resist the transmission of light. Some of the Professors of the Institute made bold to assert their belief that all matter must be regarded as possessing life. Reporting them accurately, they say:

"The molecules of which all bodies are composed are not something rigid. They live; that is, an atom or a corpuscle, is continually being detached from this or that molecule, and it wanders through the gas, the liquid, or even the solid; another atom may next take its place in the broken molecule; and so a continual exchange of matter takes place within the gaseous, liquid, or solid bodies, the wandering corpuscles always carrying with them the sort of motion we call an electrical charge.

"We know that in solutions the so-called unstable compounds play an immense part. They are continually broken up, losing part of their atoms, and are continually reconstructed as they take in new atoms. And we know that in living matter the most compound molecules, those of albumen, are those which are split up most easily, and that what we call life consists in a continual splitting up and rebuilding of these molecules."

The idea that all matter is eternal, and is instinct with life, has been repeatedly maintained in these editorial columns, and particularly in the leader of August 24 last, headed "Gigantic Thoughts." This confirmation of that theory by the leading scientists of the Smithsonian Institute, is very gratifying to the writer, and he is confident it will become general so soon as the X-rays of knowledge is turned in that direction.

Instead of a dead and senseless world, all matter is but a congeries of living germs, each atom filling its true place in the economy of Nature. A germ may die, but with its death another springs into being, and thus life is maintained.

These new discoveries follow closely along the lines of the occult, and are tending up to the plane of Spiritualism, and the theory that all life is perpetuated in ethereal forms, disrobed of grosser matter. Every honest thinker bound by no creed halls with delight these new revelations of science.

The Ignorant Woman's Vote.

Women's suffrage prevails in Colorado, and the Denver Republican, discussing the grant says that the percentage of illiterate female voters in States where women suffrage prevails is ridiculously small as compared with the reported percentage of illiterate male voters. It would require arduous search on the part of enumerators in Colorado, Wyoming, Utah and Idaho to discover a large enough percentage of illiterate women voters to cut much figure in the census returns. In fact, the demand of the women of these States has always been for the severest educational tests, showing that the sex is willing to accept the franchise only on the highest plane.

Influence of the Mind.

A lesson of great value may be learned from the following account given by the Chicago Chronicle. Many a serious sickness and also death has been caused by the power of suggestion, and cures have been wrought by the same principle rightly used. The potency of suggestion is not so well understood as it should be, and it were well that the matter were studied and humanely applied for the good of suffering humanity. As stated by the Chronicle, the fact that the imagination exercises a powerful influence over the physical system is not new to medical science. The potency of this form of suggestion is well illustrated in the case of Jerome Kennedy, a fourteen-year-old boy living in Jersey City, who was bitten on the face and arm by a dog on November 4. The wounds were cauterized and the dog killed. Two days later the boy returned to school, but was told by the principal to remain at home until the wounds had thoroughly healed. Whenever the lad went out on the street some of his playmates would warn him to look out or he would have hydrophobia. The boy was much worried by this constantly suggested danger.

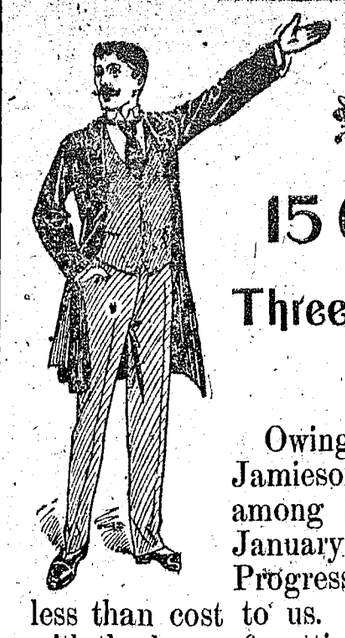
On Monday night last the boy was seized with convulsions. He foamed at the mouth, tore his pillow with his teeth and made a sound not unlike the barking of a dog. The physician who had first attended him was summoned and advised the removal of the patient to the city hospital. At the hospital the doctors assured young Jerome that he was in no danger of hydrophobia, and before long the boy fell asleep. His temperature and pulse were about normal the next morning and he relished a drink of water, though at the time of his admission the evening before he was unable to swallow. The house surgeon says he believes the boy is suffering from hysteria. He is taking no chances, however, and will keep Jerome under treatment for prevention of hydrophobia for a week, at the expiration of which time the danger point will have been passed.

Every physician encounters from time to time pathological conditions produced solely by suggestion. Long brooding over a fancied danger produces conditions so like the disease itself as to deceive even the doctor. As in this case, the suggestion is quite as powerful, if not more so.

But if suggestion can produce conditions closely simulating certain disease conditions it can also be cured. Every physician knows this fact and uses it with a frequency that would startle some of his patients. The "bread pill" is no fiction. It's a cold, hard fact. Its potency lies in suggestion. It accomplishes as many cures as any other remedy, and has none of the limitations of the recognized remedies of the pharmacopoeia. In the case cited the apparently hydrophobic symptoms subsided under the suggestions of the hospital surgeon that there was no danger from hydrophobia, and twelve hours later the boy was practically normal. Instead of brooding over disease, why not brood over health? The result would be far pleasanter.

More Missionaries Wanted.

The supply of fat missionaries having run short at Rio Muni, a Spanish settlement on the west coast of Africa, the natives were compelled to feast on the bodies of seven marines they had captured. A light juicy, non-tobacco eating nor whiskey drinking missionary, blond at that, is said to be greatly preferred to Spanish marines as diet by these dainty epicures of the Congo forests. Let them be hurried forward.



Froze Over.

Said a colored pulpiteer down South: "Ever time Satan looks down and sees de Lord's work gwine on, fire flashes from his eyes. Dat's lightnin'. W'en he fails ter hit a church wid it, he lays back and hollers. Dat's thunder."

"But," inquired the Deacon, "whars Satan in de winter? We have no lightnin' den."

"Hit may be, Br'er Williams, dat hell's froze over den."

THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER

15 CENTS! 15 CENTS!

Three Months Trial Subscriptions to New Subscribers.

Owing to the unparalleled interest in the Hull-Jamieson debate, and desiring to spread it broadcast among Spiritualists and Freethinkers, we will, until January 1, 1902, receive trial subscriptions for The Progressive Thinker THREE MONTHS for 15 cents—less than cost to us. This offer is made to NEW subscribers only, with the hope of getting them interested in Spiritualism. Bear that fact in mind. Every Spiritualist, every Freethinker, every Christian—in fact everybody should read this debate. There will be other attractions—a vast amount of miscellaneous matter will appear of special interest and value each week.

FROM THE N. S. A.

A Genuine Home for Mediums.

To the Editor:—It is with pleasure that I can now inform the public through your valuable paper that a genuine home for mediums is under consideration and preparation by the N. S. A. A building has been purchased by this association; the money for the same has been paid from our treasury and we are beginning the work of founding and maintaining a true home for wornout and needy mediums. The building mentioned is at Reed City, Mich. It adjoins the well-known sanitarium of that staunch Spiritualist, Dr. A. B. Spinney. It is as yet in a crude condition, and must be altered and repaired to serve the purpose of a Home. This building must also be furnished suitably and comfortably; when the work is complete it will be heated by steam from the heating plant of the sanitarium. For a low cost Dr. Spinney offers to feed the inmates, and to give the best of medical care and nursing to any who are sick; these can be removed into his hospital and be well cared for. Dr. Spinney also intends at once to deed a lot of land adjoining this Home to the N. S. A., that additions can be made to the building as soon as possible. We know that it will take much money to equip this home, maintain it, and to keep its good work in operation; but we hope and believe that the liberal Spiritualists all over the country who learn of its mission, and who are in sympathy with it, who desire to see the poor and needy of our workers kept from the poor-house or from suffering elsewhere, will heartily respond to our appeal and send in their contributions to the special fund we shall at once create for this noble work.

The board desires to have the work on the building progress as rapidly as possible, so as to have the home ready for the occupancy of at least twelve or twenty inmates by next summer. This can be readily done if our good friends will send in their contributions of dimes or dollars; all we be appreciated and properly acknowledged. Contributions may be sent directly to these headquarters of the N. S. A., and will be especially applied to the Medums' Home when specified. Donations of bedding, towels and such necessary articles will be gladly accepted. Societies, individuals, or groups of friends can endow or furnish a room if they wish, and name it to suit themselves, by paying fifty dollars or more, and any good work done for this Home, will indeed receive the gratitude of the N S. A., the thanks and appreciation of weary souls who will find a comfortable habitation there, and the sweet benedictions of the angels. Please, dear friends, send in your aid, and help us to carry on this this needed work for humanity.

The home is not sectional in any respect; it will be open to applicants from all sections as far as accommodations can go. Its facilities will be increased as the fund grows, and we feel that success will shine upon this unselfish work for the good of our way-worn mediums. Dear friends, listen to our appeal, aid us in this noble work, and help to build by so doing, heavenly homes for your selves in the bright Beyond.

To the Friends of Our Noble Workers.

I come to you once more, as the holiday season approaches, desiring to interest you in the needs of that worthy pioneer medium and worker in our cause, Mrs. E. V. Wilson. She is the widow of our arisen brother, E. V. Wilson, who for thirty years battled for our cause when it cost something to be be a Spiritualist. Mrs. Wilson is very feeble, being under the doctor's care, and she is in need of financial aid. She asks not for charity. She has copies of the last edition of her husband's book entitled "The Truths of Spiritualism." It is neatly bound in cloth and contains just what its name indicates. It is a grand work and will make a beautiful Christmas gift. The purchaser and donor will confer a lasting benefit upon the recipient of this gift, at the same time he will be aiding a worthy and needy sister worker.

Reader, please do not lay this aside and forget it, but send $1 to Mrs. E. V. Wilson, No. 1 Union street, Valparaiso, Ind., and you will receive the book, postpaid, by return mail.

MATERIALIZATION.

Musical Needs of Spiritual Services.

Materialization is a failure in that while it has within itself the possibilities of an educator in things spiritual far superior to any other form of phenomenal demonstration, it accomplishes little or nothing in this direction. The actual result to the average outsider of witnessing the phenomena is that such a person is simply stunned and dazed, for no rational comprehension of what he has seen comes with it; and this is just as true of the other forms of physical manifestation.

No seance should ever be held without an explanation of at least some of the fundamentals upon which this truth stands. It is true the guides of the medium give some very necessary remarks at the opening, but these are mainly descriptive of the common routine, and for the protection of the medium, in doing which they realize that their work is done.

There are some things which if impressed on the mind of the stranger would add much to the value of the demonstration of spirit intelligence and power. For instance, they should know that in the materializing phase they cannot see a spirit. No mortal eyes have ever beheld one. We do not see each other—we can only see the physical body whose mission it is to represent to mortal sight the ego that belongs with it. The materialized forms differ from ours in this, that in the accustomed way, creation takes nine months for the preparation of the human to begin mortal life; while in this case, through unknown and uncomprehended laws of spirit chemistry, a temporary body is put together in a very short time, and as soon disappears. Right before our sight a fluffy speck of white appears; then increases in size and volume until about two feet in height, when rapidly it rises to the ordinary person's height and appears as if instantly transformed into a perfect human being that moves and speaks as though one of us. Yet to the practiced eye these forms have certain peculiarities and limitations. Speech is either absent or difficult—generally in husky or suppressed voice. The individuality, evidently has all it can do to keep itself together, so to speak. The eyes have a preternatural brightness, and the movements of the body are generally made with care. While the medium's looks are incorporated into the forms more or less, yet some bear no resemblance whatever. This shows the necessity of explaining the law which makes the forms partake more or less in looks and appearance of the medium-battery from which their material is mainly drawn.

An essential for people to know is the fact that all creations in the phenomenal as well as in the world of external life are begun in an envelope of darkness. This applies to the entire vegetable and animal kingdoms. Nature furnishes her own dark cabinets for all forms of life, and this phenomena but adheres to the common law, and must. Even the creation of a photographic reflection requires its preliminary dark room.

It so happens that deception is a common factor in this world of undevelopment, and some are so unwise as to suppose that nature's laws can be put aside, that the counterfeit and the evil can the more readily be detected. It is a dull student who has not observed that the introduction of the least quantity of light at once weakens all physical manifestations. The spectator should be told that demonstration rests upon evidence, not on that which excites wonder only; though the wonderful character of materialization must ever exist, as its operations so far transcend anything on our side of life; but the proof of its truth rests in the identification of the made-up forms. These must always be more or less imperfect and this evidence may come in what they may communicate; for allowance must be made for all kinds of shortcomings in their make-up. Spirit forms that are perfectly recognizable are exceptions, not the rule.

The ordinary manner of conducting the seance is subject to severe criticism. It is a common practice in trumpet work to open with the recital of the Lord's prayer. While this is proper enough in its place, if any one will take the trouble to analyze it line for line, not a single thing will be found adapted to this latter-day demonstration of a future life. On the contrary, much will be found which flatly contradicts that which all truth-seekers know through these investigations. I would have song in place of ritualistic prayer. Instead of thus borrowing that which is so clearly untrue, for the purpose of giving a religious color to our work, how much more ennobling as well as self-respecting, to plant ourselves on the sacredness of human affection and the great consolations offered through spirit communion.

Our holy of holies should be the circle or seance, and our hour of prayer the seance hour. No religion has ever come to man that equals Spiritualism in giving healthful play to the emotional nature in the exercise of this gospel of life.

When Modern Spiritualism came, the religions extant were mainly made of two things; a belief in Deity and in a future life. The united testimony of the decarnates at once proved that our religious teachers know no more of the future life than unborn babes; and the same testimony gave no more knowledge of Deity. Now the ideas contained in religious songs are replete with the ignorance, superstition and untruth belonging with this old order of things. Yet the world over, these are sung at all our seances. What must Christians who attend our circles think of us when they find us unitedly singing their sentiments and making no voice of our own?

I have attended many—so many seances by many different media, and have never heard any but religious or sentimental songs, save one or two for child's use as proved by their depth and scope. The great difficulty is in supplying that which all can sing, and this is got along with by borrowing untruth where we should be voicing a demonstrated immortality. The church people have united on songs that are nearly or quite material in their use; but we have as yet none outside of their vocabulary. A great want would be supplied if the N. S. A. musical committee would gradually prepare words and music for general commitment to memory and singing in unison; provided, the songs shall embody our truths and eliminate others' untruths. We care not whose songs these shall be or where they come from; but want none made up of crowns, kingdoms, thrones of God or rulers, streets of gold—or other rubbish—ideas belonging to the barbaric, primitive mind. If the spiritual press will co-operate with an occasional print of these, one at a time, till they are universally learned for standard songs to be memorized and ready anywhere on call, we can soon have something for universal use. A great work is before us in which we can make its demonstrative department thoroughly educational and in every way uplifting and ennobling.

A common seance method of evading songs that teach the miracle of blood, and other vocal inadaptedness, is the use of the music box. If thoughts are really things, a surer method to prevent harmony as a means to success, could scarcely be found; if while the mechanical monotone of sweet noise goes on, the thought of the circle must be with the latest display of the simian persuasion ascending the telegraph pole in the presence of the organ-grinding director; a subject for contemplation, it must be confessed, quite at variance with a season of communion with one's dear departed.

It is to be hoped the time may come when Spiritualism shall be honored in its fundamentals, instead of rostrum display; when it shall be acknowledged as resting upon its phenomenal demonstration. While its proofs are now simply tolerated and accepted, we hope they shall be made the most prominent—the real thing in fact as they are, the rest being only accessory.

What we want in our rostrum work is not display, speculation or metaphysics, but common sense explanation of things spiritual; and it is the failure to get this, with a surfeit of what people do not come out to hear, that thins out the audience. Every department of spiritual work should be essentially educational. We should educate not the intellect alone, but the emotions and the religious nature as well.

THE CABIN ON THE CLAIM.

Lonely, you say, and with this arch
Of sky so grandly blending,
By bright-hued clouds and glittering stars
A tender message sending?

Joyless, when out of crimson clouds
The sunrise pours its glory,
Morn after morn repeating well
Aurora's cheerful story?

Peaceless, when night with noiseless feet,
From fields of herbs and flowers,
Sweet odors in her mantle dark
Bears to this cot of ours?

Like faintest sounds of distant seas
Around some castle hoary,
We hear the great world's roar and fret,
And trace her changeful story.

And like a faraway gleaming sail,
Turning a bend of river,
A noble deed with radiant flash
Makes every heartstring quiver.

So, thankful where the kindly stars
Spangle the blue with beauty,
We look, and breathe the fervent wish
That all may do their duty.

The Uses and Perils of Psychism, Spiritualism and Hypnotism — A Lecture — Delivered in Chicago, By Colonel H. S. Olcott.

Mr. Chairman, Ladies and Gentlemen:—The three subjects of discourse this evening may be grouped under the head of occult sciences, because so little is really known at the present time as to the nature of the forces and the intelligences which are involved in the phenomena. That is nothing against them, however, because everything of any importance has been occult at some time or other; from printing and gunpowder downwards, everything has been ascribed to the agency of the Devil. The Devil has subsequently left the premises and left science to adopt the new idea and put it into practice.

Generally speaking, I should say that it is a very unwise thing for a person to undertake the investigation of these subjects unless he has a well-balanced mind, great courage—moral courage that will enable him to accept the phenomena that he sees and to follow them out to their legitimate inferences, and no trace of credulity or superstition, because from the very outset the experimenter is startled by the nature of the phenomena which he sees and the bearing that they have upon his past experience and education. It is most difficult to get an unbiased judgment from any unprejudiced person upon any of these phenomena, until he has had time to correct his previous judgments by experience. The fact of the matter is, we are not prepared to see anything. We are not able to see anything for which we have not been prepared by experience.

I read recently in a medical journal of a doctor at St. George's Hospital, London, conducting a clinic before a medical class in which he said: "Now, gentlemen, I have shown you here a patient who had a certain abnormal development of a certain part of the body, and out of this class of thirty-nine only two understood what they were looking at. The others thought it was a tumor. That shows us that the human mind is incapable of seeing a thing for which it is not prepared."

Now in the investigation of these transcendental phenomena one must have a mind which will extend itself to observe things on the transcendental plane—the plane of transcendental physics, as Prof. Zollner calls it. The difficulty with the exact scientist is that his training has not prepared him to admit the possibility of phenomena which cannot be measured and cannot be compelled to come within the rules which he lays down for his laboratory.

PROF HARE'S INVESTIGATIONS.

Some of you remember, probably, the history of Prof. Hare's investigation of Spiritualism at Philadelphia nearly fifty years ago. Prof. Robert Hare, Emeritus professor of chemistry at the University of Pennsylvania, one of the most eminent men of science whom America has produced, announced that it was his intention to take up this baneful phenomena of mediumship and with the help of scientific research put a stop to what he considered delusion which was doing harm to the public. So he went to work at it and invented various apparatus for testing the force, the presence of which he saw in connection with the person of the medium, and of making it possible for him to receive intelligent communications without the possibility of affording the medium any opportunity to deceive him. His book contains a number of drawings of apparatus which he invented, and I think that you will say when you see it, that it is a most intelligent report upon obscure phenomena. Certainly nothing could be more effective than for instance his dial plate.

We will suppose a table like this; on this side a tilting desk arranged with a lever; on this side a vertical disc with the letters of the alphabet and the words "Yes" and "No" and "I don't know," and the numerals, painted upon it; here a hand like a clock hand going round. It was impossible for the medium to know what was going on this side of the dial plate. If the observer sat here he would put a question sometimes in writing, sometimes verbally, and the answer would come on the dial plate. That was only one of a number of apparatus he invented. He pursued these investigations, adding more and more interest, and he went on until he was convinced that as an honorable man he ought to give a verdict in favor of the genuineness of the phenomena. He did so. Instead of being greeted with the respect and honor that his age and scientific knowledge and dignity entitled him to be, he was hooted at, and he was considered half-cracked by his colleagues, and his influence waned from that time forward.

SIR WILLIAM CROOKES' WORK.

Take the case of Sir William Crookes. He also many years later announced that he would undertake to investigate Spiritualism for the purpose of putting a stop to this delusion which would not be put down, and which came up much stronger after every attack upon it. He was the editor of a journal of science at that time, and he laid down the points of evidence which would be required in the nature of proof. Among other things he said the chemist uses a scale so sensitive that it weighs the thousandth part of a grain. Now we ask only a pair of scales like that, properly protected from contact from outside, shall be deflected in the balance one degree. We are told of large bodies of stone and wood and iron being lifted and carried through the air. Now that is all that science can absolutely demand; it does demand, under test conditions, the balance shall be deflected at least one degree. Then he went on with a number of other propositions. This was before he had attained the high eminence he now has in the scientific world, but the people at large who were opposed to Spiritualism applauded his definition of the evidence that would be acceptable to science. He also, like Hare, invented a number of apparatus. He found by experiments with the medium Home, that some kind of a force traveled through his body to such a remarkable degree as to produce striking scientific effects. So among the apparatus that Crookes invented was this one: He had a tripod which was connected with a hanging lever. Along the base of the lever here was connected a bowl that was of perforated copper, contained in an outer vessel filled with water. The water went in the inner place and the other end of the lever was hung on a spring balance. The medium was placed here and at this end was a short fulcrum. It was impossible for the medium to do anything with this end, because it was contained in a copper vessel in another copper vessel. He found this scale was very remarkably deflected, and by a simple clock-like apparatus he measured the force that was pressing through Home's system. He went on with these investigations, inventing new apparatus. He finally got hold of a Mrs. C—, who was a medium for the spirits, an alleged spirit calling herself Katie King. He saw this figure materialize itself so as to be to all intents and purposes like a living person. He got communications from her, and talked with her, and got on very good terms with her, so that he was able to take hold of her, and she allowed him to walk into the cabinet where her medium was lying on a sofa in a state of trance, and she and the medium together were seen by him at the same time. Then he made a report in a work called "Researches in the Phenomena of Modern Spiritualism." He again, being a courageous man, reported in favor of the genuineness of the phenomena. He did not go so far at that time as to say that he believed in Spiritualism, but the reality of the phenomena produced through mediums he unreservedly certified to. I take it as a sign of remarkable moral courage on his part quite recently, not more than seven years ago, when president of the British Association for the Advancement of Science, in discussing the finer forces of nature in his address, he reaffirmed the assertion made thirty years ago. He had then lived down all of the contumely and sarcasm and persecution shown by his colleagues as a reward for his candor and magnificent bravery. He discovered the radiometer and made a number of important discoveries in regard to the different elements, the temperature at which they are evolved. He stands before the world with a reputation as a first-class chemist and he was given the most honorable position in the gift of the British government, that of President of the British Association for the Advancement of Science. Standing on that platform on that occasion he reaffirmed his opinions of thirty years previous.

PROF. ZOLLNER AND AKSAKOF.

There was a Prof. Zollner, of the University of Leipsic, professor of physical astronomy, who had an idea that if the phenomena of mediumship were really as reported, that it went to prove a fourth dimension of space; that is, in addition to the length, breadth and thickness which we know in nature, there must be a fourth dimension; why, he did not go into, except that the fourth dimension must exist, showing the interpenetrability of matter.

The University of St. Petersburg, at the command of the father of the late Czar, had undertaken some experiments to test the truth of spiritualistic phenomena. On behalf of the committee the Honorable Mr. A., Privy Counselor, wrote to me to find a medium who could stand scientific tests; so I made in connection with my colleague, Madame Blavatsky, investigations of a number of mediums, and finally after three months' testing of Dr. Slade I recommended him to the committee. The money was sent to me for his expenses. He went, and scientific men here know what happened him in England. He very foolishly, instead of going straight to his post and putting himself in the hands of the St. Petersburg committee, stopped in England and gave some seances, and he was taken hold of by two materialistic men of science, Professors Lancaster and Duncan, and they got him at a disadvantage. They made charges against him before a police magistrate for obtaining money under false pretenses. The magistrate or judge of the police court happened to be of a very low order of intellect, without the least knowledge of science, and he decided Slade should be held for trial. An exception was taken by his counsel and he was got off on some trivial charge. He left to accept an invitation to go to Leipsic. A Mr. Van Hoffman invited him to come on and had him at his house. A committee of the professors of the Leipsic University met and witnessed his phenomena. Prof. Zollner then used his presence to test his theory of the fourth dimension. Now he proceeded in this simple manner. He took a cord and fastened the ends together and sealed them to a card on which he impressed his seal, making a loop like this. Then he sat down together with the committee of Professors of the University. Prof. Zollner put his hand on this cord which hung down between his knees under the table. He asked the supposed spirits that if they could do so, they would tie knots in this endless cord. The ends being secured, you see that that would be a request absolutely impossible to grant unless the theory of Zollner was true, that there is such a property in matter as interpenetrability. After the usual phenomena they heard raps to signify that the thing was done, and he looked at his cord and there were two or three knots tied in it. He published a book on "Transcendental Phenomena," which was translated by a friend of mine, Mr. Massey, of London, and illustrated it with engravings. You can see for yourselves. Probably you have it in your library.

He did something else. He went to a wood turner and got turned a ring of a certain kind of wood. They had in the room of Prof. Hoffman's house where the seances were held a small stand with a pillar, and three legs at the bottom, which stood at the end of the table round which they were sitting. Zollner took this wooden ring and passed a cord through it and sealed the ends. Then he asked that a knot might be tied around the ring in the cord. So they sat there and by and by heard raps to say the thing was done. Zollner said he heard something like a cracking of wood striking wood. When he looked down the ring was gone off the cord, the ends were sealed to the card which he had under his hand. Matter must have passed through matter and caused the tying of knots in the cord. They looked through the room and could not find the ring; they looked on top of the book-case, under the sofa, under the pillar, behind chairs; they could not find it until someone noticed the stand, and going behind it, there was the ring thrust upon the pillar, where the turning left a space for the ring to go on; between the two bulges below and above it it was driven. Under a powerful magnifying glass they found the wood absolutely intact, no break of fiber or continuity. That has been put in the Museum in the University of Leipsic, standing as the principal testimony of the truth of mediumistic phenomena.

I have made myself a great many experiments stretching over fifty years, for I have been studying the matter since 1852. I need not trouble you to dwell on those because those I have mentioned are quite enough. The reputation of those men of science no one can question. Even Zollner was received in the same way as his colleagues before him. He was broken-hearted over it.

Then we have the testimony of Harvey, the discoverer of the circulation of the blood. Years after he made his discovery a paper was read before the Royal Society to prove the impossibility of the circulation of the blood in the way claimed.

REICHENBACH'S EXPERIMENTS.

Reichenbach, of Austria, the discoverer of glycerine, and a metallurgical chemist, a man of wealth, conducted at his castle of Reisenberg for several years experiments with a new force which he claims to have discovered, to which he gave the name of "od" or "odyle." His book is one of the most interesting in the annals of science. He neglected no detail to make his experiments absolutely convincing. He discovered that this odyle exists in nature and flows across the magnetic current, and all substances in nature are imbued with it. He found that it existed in crystals and that crystals have polarity like the magnet. He found it in vegetables; he found it in the human body; he found that the two eyes of man are foci of this odyllic force or light. He found it streaming normally from the ends of the fingers. He found that it flowed through the body with a rise and fall like the tide. He made observations running through twenty-four hours with men and women. He had this recording pencil—I don't know the scientific name of it—that would go up and down; in this way he showed the fluctuations of the force. He has got in his book a page of illustrations which was taken to show the nature of this luminosity that goes to the ends of the fingers, showing how it gathers at the poles of crystals; showing how it shows itself in minerals and in vegetables. Then he took from his laboratory a long list of chemical substances and tested them and found they arranged themselves in two groups, positive and negative, and he gives out of them which are plus odic and which are minus odic. Again he met the same fate as the others. He was denounced by Baron De ——, of France, in the most bitter and unscrupulous way. He was called a charlatan, devil and everything else. The result was he died without knowing that one day he would be appreciated, and people would be discovering the same thing which he had discovered. For so it appears, that while the white banner of science is emblazoned with the words "know thyself," and truth and justice are supposed to be the guardian principles of the college and of the laboratory, yet we find that scientific men have shown themselves in so many cases, from the beginning of the revival of science, to be subject to prejudice, blinded by prejudice and capable of doing gross injustice to inventors.

MESMER AND MESMERISM.

You will remember in the history of science, how the discovery of Franklin was received, the bitter sarcasm with which he was treated by the sister of the king when he went to Europe. You remember also how his scientific reputation became established, and he acquired first rank among men of science. And this brings me to another portion of this discussion. He was appointed by the king to investigate the claims of Mesmer. This brings us to one of the subjects of the discourse this evening, mesmerism.

Mesmer came from Vienna to Paris claiming he had discovered a universal agent and that the human body was the reservoir of this, and that it could produce marvels in the way of healing. The idea took the fancy of the fickle populace of France. The Court went wild about it. Classes were formed to learn the secret. Immense fees were paid him for communicating it, and scenes of the wildest sort of hysterical disturbance and madness took place in his consultation room where he had the baquet, which was nothing but a tube with water in it, iron filings and pieces of glass. A covered tube went from that and people sat round the baquet and took hold of it, and hysterical crises were provoked; and hysteria is contagious. If one person has a hysterical attack, it is likely to be carried to all the sensitive persons in the room; but cures were made. He got a number of eminent men as pupils and followers. The matter of money was associated with it, and that brought about his downfall in the estimation of the scientific world, as it ought to always, for when persons degrade a scientific discovery into a mere claptrap affair for making money, they should be punished by the scorn of the public.

But still he was a great man and a great discoverer, and introduced to the world a most important fact, and the consequences have been going on with an increased breadth and spread up to the present time. Among his pupils was the Marquis Puysegar, who went so far as to mesmerize a tree in his grounds at Chartrey, outside of Paris, and he had cords attached to the tree, and sick persons would sit there and take hold of the cords and get cured. Now he has written also for private circulation a most interesting book, of which I am fortunate enough to possess a copy, and find in that an extremely interesting fact, that is to say, that in his cases a large number of his patients developed the clairvoyant faculty, which we do not find in the cases of Mesmer. That is a most remarkable thing. Sir Walter Scott has told in one of his novels that he knew of a seer who if he would touch another who had the same gift would transmit his vision to the other. I have seen two little girls looking in a crystal to see different pictures in it; at the same time when they held their heads together to look in the crystal had the same vision in common. Prof. Gregory, professor of chemistry in the University at Edinboro, a fellow of the Scottish Royal Society, published about 1850 a very interesting work entitled "Letters to a Candid Inquirer About Animal Magnetism." I read that book two or three years ago, and it made so deep impression on my mind that I was able about that time to apply this mesmeric power to a young woman who underwent a surgical operation without any knowledge of it until it was over, and she also under these circumstances developed the clairvoyant faculty.

I have not pursued the study of mesmerism for amusement. I have not made experiments upon it simply for my own experience. The experiments that I have seen have been in the presence of a third party; because I think it is dangerous power. I think it is one that should be very carefully employed, for it is a very grave responsibility to take upon one's self to reduce a fellow being to a state of servitude, such as mesmerism is in the hands of the mesmerizer. But at any rate I had from the very first the proof needed of the exercise of the power, and from the Marquis Puysegar it appears he had the faculty of making his patients clairvoyant, and his book, which is a very modest report written in the utmost candor and from the standpoint of a high nobleman who had an assured position and would not stoop to any falsehood or pretense, is very interesting to the student of psychology, as showing the personal quality of the mesmerizer which influences the possession of second sight. Prof. Gregory said in his book that he had not been able to provoke clairvoyance in more than two or three cases during the course of his researches, but he mentions others who would provoke it every time. Among others there was a mesmerizer, a fellow by the name of Lewis, who figured as a clairvoyant and practitioner of mesmerism. This man had a most marvelous power. Gregory also quotes a case of a certain Major Buckley, of the British army, who had very remarkable powers. He could simulate death. He could by nothing but will throw himself into a state simulating death; the pulsations of the heart, the action of the lungs, would cease, the temperature would be reduced; but he could restore himself to consciousness by will. This Major Buckley had the faculty of provoking clairvoyance to an extreme degree. There were in England confectioner's candies made for children's parties. Two shells of an English walnut were held together with a little melted sugar. Inside them were candy and a motto wrapped around. They sell by the pound. Major Buckley used to buy a pound of nuts when he experimented with his pupils. He would take a nut and hold it in his left hand and make passes from his brow down to this nut in this way. This nut would become translucent to the pupils and they would be able to read the motto inside. Then the nut would be broken open and the reading would be verified.

CLAIRVOYANCE.

This clairvoyant faculty is of enormous use in certain cases, for instance in the diagnosing of disease. What is the object of vivisection? The object is to try to find out something about the nature of disease in the human being, to enable science to detect it, and also the action and counteraction of serum. Now supposing that a patient were made of glass so that all his internal organs could be correctly seen and the operation of them detected. Then what would be the use of putting the poor animal to such excruciating torture for the sake of getting merely that faculty? And yet that is what happens in the case of clairvoyants who can diagnose disease. I have seen it done frequently. I have seen it practiced on myself about four years ago when I was in Paris. I was talking to that remarkable clairvoyant, a woman whose name I mentioned before in my lectures, Madame Mongruel. She has been long known in Paris as a respectable practitioner of this art. She has a prophetic gift also, and at the time of Louis Philippe she predicted the downfall of the ministry, of Roland, the fall of the Orleans family, the fact that Louis Bonaparte would become emperor, and various other things. The Bonaparte prophecy gave her great notoriety and they have liberally patronized her ever since. From time to time the prophecies of this woman have been published. And just now, very recently Mr. Stead, of the Review, published in London an account of a visit to Madame M., which he obtained by my intervention. He went to her—this was at the time when the embassy at Pekin were supposed to have been massacred. That was the general opinion throughout Europe. Circumstantial accounts of the atrocities had been telegraphed from China, and the London papers generally believed a bloody massacre of the legations had occurred. She told him that they were not murdered, and that they would be released, and told the troops that would be engaged in the release of the legations. She mentioned the fact that the Germans would not participate in it. It so appeared that they did not take part in the advance.

She also prophesied the invasion of China by the allied forces of Europe years before it occurred, and this was also published in a magazine called La Revue or something like that. At any rate I have seen the copy in a scrapbook and I am certain of the fact that it was published long before the Chinese question became active or any talk of a military invasion. She also prophesied to Mr. Stead of something that is not yet fulfilled. I give it to you and you can remember yourselves and see how it turns out; that a general European war is coming out of the complications, in which Great Britain and Germany and Italy were to be arrayed against Russia and France, and Russia would abandon France and leave her to be overwhelmed and great disasters would happen to that country.

That is a sample of what can be done in the way of foresight by people who have been mesmerized and put into this state of lucid somnambulism. Here we have a gift of prophecy that enables us to foresee events. The most marvelous events are those predicted by Nostradamus in the 16th century, in regard to Catharine de Medici and her two sons who successively occupied the throne of France. He left to his son a copy of verses in the old Provencal of France, very much mixed up and difficult of clear reading, but this has been analyzed to a certain extent. I have counted forty-two of those prophecies fulfilled in history since that time. There is no doubt at all about the genuineness of the prophecies, because they were put into book form in the Library of France and preserved from the 16th century down.

Here we have the matter of the diagnose of disease, a most important thing. In my own case I was talking with her and she said: "You seem to be so strong that you are built to last a hundred years; but isn't there something wrong that is chargeable to your body? Do you not suffer from pain and swelling of the feet?" I said "yes." She said, "That is a gouty tendency, and it is provoked in your case by eating butcher's meat; you must not eat that because it poisons your blood." Then I thought I had already tried experiments for the sake of science, though not of interest to myself. Now I would try an experiment for myself. I did so, and I may say that all the symptoms which troubled me disappeared and I have had no return of them to this day.

CLAIRVOYANT DIAGNOSIS, ETC.

I have known doctors who would employ this diagnosing faculty of the clairvoyant for finding out the diseases of their patients, and in some cases obscure diseases have been discovered. This sight of the clairvoyant which penetrates through the human body and through walls, etc., and can fly across to different lands and countries is only a form of that force that we have discovered called the Roentgen ray. We have discovered that we can photograph it, so that we can see in the body of a man any bullet that is lodged there, or any body that is opaque by the Roentgen ray can be detected, and also disturbances in the system. We are on the way then to prove psychical means the possibilities of this transcendental sight which has been known from time immemorial, as possible by persons who are called clairvoyants, by the French called somnambule.

Then, again, for the testing of drugs. You may give to a clairvoyant, or even to a person not endowed with that extraordinary sight, but to a person who would be able to use the psychometer, a new invention by Prof. Buck, only four years ago, who says that four people out of ten are able to give descriptions in this way. I have made experiments and seen them made by the discoverer himself. You take a number of dry powders of different substances very different in qualities of taste, say ginger and pepper and mustard and acetic acid and sugar and salt and quinine, aloes, opium, such as that, and make them into powders all exactly alike, as the druggist prepares powders, and no sign on the outside by which they can be recognized. Put them on a table or into a hat and try the experiment with a number of persons. Let each take a powder and hold it in his hands. After while you will ask them if they can tell what they have got there. I saw the thing tried on the reporters of the press—they are very sensitive gentlemen, as you know—in New York. Prof. B. wanted to have this matter brought before the New York public, and as I knew the reporters pretty well, I invited a certain number to the Doctor's house. He made experiments. He also had some not reporters. Out of a dozen people perhaps two could tell what substance they took in their hands.

Suppose that you have a drug, let us say, a new drug is brought from some distant country, South Africa or Sumatra or Java, for, mind you, you have not begun to discover all the drugs that are available there; in fact, the Medical Society has appointed a commission to report upon the new drugs. Suppose you have some of these drugs brought, and you have within your call a person who has this sensitive faculty, and he can take it and tell what qualities it contains; if he has a fine perception he can tell you exactly what that remedy will do. This is a psychic faculty that is usually employed in various ways. In diagnosing disease and discovering the nature of drugs. You may go farther and employ this faculty for the finding of water.

PSYCHOMETRY.

That method is now used by the railway companies of Great Britain and Australia. I was at B., in Australia, and I saw a man who kept a dry goods store and had this natural gift of finding water. He would take a rod of some hazel or something in his hand and walk rapidly over the ground, if they wanted water in a particular place, and hold it in his hands, and when he came over a spot where there was water it would twist itself in his hands; if he held it as tight as this it would draw; some power in his nervous system would cause the rod to bend down over water, and in every case the man's indications were correct. There was a well found that way for the railway company in the station yard; and planters were employing him to find places where they could make wells for the watering of their stock in times of drouth.

The faculty is also used for discovering metals, and in one case at least, that hysterical case called the Jack Aymar case, a French peasant, was brought to the notice of the French Academy. He had the water finding faculty, and also one of finding murderers. Because he seemed to have an instinct in following up criminals, the police employed him to find two murderers. They started on the place where the murderers had lived and traced the murderers from place to place, and finally he ran them both to earth.

I met one time a member of the legislature of New York who had the same faculty as a hound in hunting a deer. If he crossed the track of a deer the scent sent him flying, by lying down and putting his nose to his track he could feel something that would indicate when the deer had passed by and what sort of a deer it was.

The fact is that here is a faculty that is latent in all of us, and B. says that four out of ten can use it in reading letters or reading drugs. Take a piece of writing. When you write you impregnate your character upon the paper, because this luminous current which Reichenbach calls odyllic force permeates everything. There have been illustrations made by photograph of this luminous force on paper. So long as the paper will hold together you can give the paper to a psychometer, they will put it against the forehead and give you a description of the writing. B. says, the oldest manuscripts and old tapestries and particles of mummy shrouds, and things very old, but still preserving enough of this power in them to enable a psychometer to trace the article to the time when it was made or worn.

In a book called the "Soul of Things," by Denton, in three volumes, there are reports of hundreds of experiments with fragments of metal and stone from ancient buildings like the pyramids, like the Roman baths, etc., bits of mummy shroud and sarcophagus and lava, the psychometer by holding the thing in the hand or against the forehead has been able to describe the events connected with them, been transported to the places from which they came, and at request could go back or forward in time at will. You will find this a most interesting book to read, whether you are interested in scientific study or not, "The Soul of Things," by Prof. Wm. Denton.

HYPNOTISM.

Now, then, hypnotism is a mesmeric state provoked usually by mechanical means. There was a committee appointed to report on the discovery of Mesmer. On that committee, appointed by the King, in 1780, I believe, was Franklin. Franklin, although he had been recalled and persecuted for his pretense that he had discovered the nature of lightning, yet when he was appointed on that committee by the King of France, in company with the most distinguished scientists of France, turned around and denounced Mesmer as a fraud, showing that the scientific prejudice which had been shown against him led him to commit an injustice, and not give a fair chance to another scientific discoverer whose claims he was investigating. It was a long time a mystery to me why he did this, but in a book by Benet on animal magnetism, which is one of the International Scientific Series, I find there a copy of a secret report made by the committee to the King. The report included the King's reason why he would not allow mesmerism to be practiced. It was the very serious charge that by means of that great moral offenses might be committed; that a person of the opposite sex who was under the mesmeric control of the operator might have the gravest injury done her.

Now that is an aspect of mesmerism and hypnotism which should be taken into serious consideration, for it is true. I know that a great many books have been written on mesmerism in the last 25 years, and some people say it is impossible for a subject to be made to do a criminal act unless they have the seeds of criminality in themselves. I know that is so, but I know also what I have seen with my own eyes, for I have assisted at experiments in the two rival schools of France, one the clinic of Charcot, at Salpetriere, the other by Bernheim in the hospital at Nancy in Eastern France.

Now as you know, you scientific men know, there have always been among the alienists (that is the physicians who treat the insane) two schools, one believing that consciousness was functioned in the brain, as digestion is in the body; the other that the mind was an entity which employed the organs of manifestation. The Charcot schools adhere to that physiological theory of hypnotism; whereas the others claim it is a matter of psychological phenomena.

Among the experiments made by Bernheim for my instruction when he was kindly showing me around through the hospital, (I spent a week there), were cases of criminal suggestion. One perfectly honest man, who bore an unblemished reputation, was made to cross the ward when our backs were turned and steal something from the bed of a patient and conceal it under his own pillow. We turned around and came back, and the Doctor fastened his eyes upon him and said: "I am astonished to see you a thief." The man's face flushed with embarrassment. He said, "How dare you make such a charge; there is no stain on my reputation; I am an honest man."

"But," the doctor said, "my dear sir, I saw you go across the ward there and steal something from that bed."

"No, sir; no, sir, I did not, I did not."

"Why, I saw you bring it over here." Then the doctor stopped for a moment and put this hand under the pillow. The man started forward, anticipating the doctor lifting the pillow, and the doctor took out a snuff-box which he had stolen. Then the doctor said, "Did you do this because of any suggestion I made to you?"

"No, not at all; I merely saw the thing and I thought I would like it. I am heartily ashamed."

Then the doctor put him under hypnotic suggestion and said he should forget all about it and never receive a suggestion again to do any criminal act; that impression was received, and then he brought him back to consciousness.

The doctor made a suggestion of evil to a decent young woman, a patient there, very sensitive if the doctor had not interfered it would have resulted in her ruin. I assisted at that experiment, and when the young woman had that impression taken off her mind and went into the ward I asked the doctor, "Do you mean to tell me that young woman would have carried out your suggestion?"

"Absolutely," he said. "The moral sense was completely paralyzed."

There you have the two schools. Undoubtedly we give what we have got to give. If we have disease in our system the disease is affecting our vital principle which flows through us, which is the very life, which is the sum total of the functions of the body, which is derived from the atmosphere, from the sunlight, from the food we take and the water we drink. These things go altogether to make up our vitality.

DISEASE AND HEALTH.

I explained in my lecture on the healing art what I considered disease and health. We have pulsations through our whole cosmos which we call the divine life. We know by scientific observation that nothing is in a state of static equilibrium, but vibration everywhere. Even the heart of the rock vibrates, because the rock is not solid substance with atoms held together; the atoms are separated by cushions of the universal ether. This esoteric mind that pervades everything and from which everything has come. These cushions then are between the atoms, making them in a state like as though on India rubber springs. The pulsations of divine life running through the different kingdoms of nature keep vibrating. It goes through the mineral kingdoms; it goes through the vegetable kingdom and the human kingdom. We make every twenty-four hours a surplus of this vital fluid. If anyone takes what he actually requires for his own vital functions, what he does not want is discharged like a cloud overcharged with electricity discharges it. So the human body that is overcharged with vitality discharges it either by nervous action, muscular action, hard labor or efforts at some activity of the brain or body, whatever it may be; or it streams off from the extremities. Observations were made by R. and pictures in his book by Baraduc; they put up the negative and we have the result in the printed photograph. That is the fluid which flows from the extremities in a state of health. Sometimes we evolve just enough for our use in a state of health and nothing to spare, and a little extra exertion will make us feel over-fatigued. Sometimes we run short and then we are in a decline and go down, down, down, down. Then we try to get up by a change of air or dress or food, or use some stimulus upon the sources of life; build up the brain or some vital organ which will cause more activity. We have reduced this vitality in the body.

Then I also said that health in the man means a sympathetic vibration in himself of his nervous system in harmony with the pulsations throughout the cosmos which we call divine life, and that the restoration of health means the changing of a negative state of some particular organ in which for some reason the vibration has been changed, into the normal vibration which we call health. That is all. That is the secret of disease and health. One vital organ may be changed from a state of health to a state of disease, or from a state of disease to a state of health.

Now you can do an enormous good by using this power of yours either by transmitting to someone your own surplus vitality, or by causing someone's own mind to act upon his own vital organs and effect a cure. You can do that without robbing him of one particle of his independence or liberty. It is not necessary for you to go and dominate a person's will to bring him to health, or bring him to a state of slavery such as is in too many cases brought about by ignorant or unscrupulous people. To dominate a subject to a state of abject slavery, where his brain ceases to govern his own actions, but is dependent upon the will of another brain; the two brains become absolutely like one.

THOUGHT TRANSMISSION.

I think I told you one night of an experiment I made in Rangoon in connection with the municipal fire department. I tested the transmission of thought from the operator to the subject. Here was a Hindoo servant who was sensitive, and he was mesmerized and brought to the suggestive state and put with his back against the wall

WEAK EYESIGHT.

All Imperfections of the Eye, Even Blindness, Cured without the Use of the Knife.

If any reader is afflicted or has a friend afflicted with cataract, granulated lids, cross eyes or any affliction of the eye, they can have that affliction positively and permanently cured without pain or without the knife, through a mild medicine method originated by Dr. F. Geo. Curts. It is a home treatment, self-administered by the patient. Rev. J. M. Dinsmore, 1317 Penn street, Kansas City, Mo., says: "I have been under Dr. Curts' treatment but a short time, but from the good he has done me I feel warranted in saying that his Mild Medicine Method is scientific, safe and effective." O. B. Emerson, Rock Island, Ill., conductor on the C. B. & Q. Railway, was deaf seven years, but Dr. Curts cured him in two months. This eminent oculist has just prepared a wonderful treatise on the eye, appropriately illustrated, containing much valuable information, which will be sent absolutely free to those writing to

THE SPIRITUAL SIGNIFICANCE.

A VERY IMPORTANT WORK.

The Spiritual Significance is by Lilian Whiting, author of "The World Beautiful," "After Her Death," "Kate Field, A Record," "A Study of Elizabeth Barrett Browning," Cloth, $1.00.

Miss Whiting finds the title of her new book in these lines from "Aurora Leigh:"

"If a man could feel
Not one, but every day, feast, fast, and working-day,
The spiritual significance burn through
The hieroglyphic of material shows,
Henceforward he would paint the globe with wings."

The aim of this book is to reveal the curiously close correspondence between the developments of modern science and spiritual laws; to note that new forces, as discovered and applied in wireless telegraphy, are simply laws of an unseen realm into which humanity is rapidly advancing and thus gaining a new environment. From this evolutionary progress, as illustrated by physical science the author of "The World Beautiful" continues the same argument presented in those volumes in a plea that the future life is the continuation and development of our present life in all its faculties and powers, and that the present may be ennobled by the constant sense of the Divine Presence, and a truer knowledge of the nature of man and his relations to God tend to a higher morality and increasing happiness. The book is characterized by the same essential style and qualities that have insured for "The World Beautiful" volumes an almost world-wide popularity.

OTHER BOOKS BY LILIAN WHITING:

Kate Field, A Record. Price $2.

A Study of Elizabeth Barrett Browning. Price $1.25.

The World Beautiful. Three Series. Each $1.

From Dreamland Sent, and Other Poems. $1. These books are for sale at this office.

LISBETH.

An Interesting Story of Two Worlds.

Elevating, Fascinating, Instructive Throughout.

This work by Carrie E. S. Twing is exceptionally interesting. She well says: "These characters which have brought out the highest and lowest in different religious beliefs, have moved me, not I them." The whole book is interesting, fascinating, and instructive. Price $1.00.

Self Contradictions of the Bible. One hundred and forty-four propositions, theological, moral, historical and speculative; each proved affirmatively and negatively by quotations from Scripture, without comment. Price, 15 cents.

The Development of the Spirit. After Transition. By the late M. Faraday. The origin of religions, and their influence upon the mental development of the human race. Price, 10 cents.

THE VOICES By Warren Sumner Barlow. The Voices contain poems of remarkable beauty and force. They are most excellent. Price $1.00.

The Devil and the Adventists. An Adventist attack on Spiritualism repudiated. By Moses Hull. Price 10 cents.

The Koran Commonly called the "Alkoran of Mohammed." The standard Arabian or Mohammedan Bible. Cloth, $1.00

LIFE OF THOMAS PAINE. By the Editor of the National, with Preface and Notes by Peter Eckler. Illustrated with views of the old Paine Homestead and Paine Monument, at New Rochelle; also portraits of Thomas Clio Rickman, Joel Barlow, Mary Wolstonecraft, Madame Roland, Condorce, Brissot, and the most prominent of Paine's friends in Europe and America. Cloth, 75 cents.

VEDANTA PHILOSOPHY.

Lectures by the Swami Vivekananda, on Raja Yoga; or Conquering the Internal Nature, and other subjects; also, Patanjali's Yoga Aphorisms, with commentaries and a copious glossary of Sanskrit terms. Revised and enlarged, 12mo., Cloth, $1.50. Raja Yoga is an ancient system of Indian Philosophy, and one of the four chief methods that the Vedanta Philosophy offers to obtain freedom and perfection. Swami Vivekananda became a familiar figure in several American cities during the three years following the Parliament of Religions at Chicago; he was cordially received in America, where the breadth and depth of his teachings were soon recognized. His teachings are universal in their application. The book is cheap at $1.50. For sale at this office.

POEMS OF PROGRESS.

By Lizzie Doten. They are really valuable. Price $1.00.

FROM DREAMLAND SENT.

A volume of Poems. By Lilian Whiting. Cloth, $1.25.

DEATH AND THE AFTER LIFE

By Andrew Jackson Davis. Something you should read. Price 60 cents. For sale at this office.

Discovery of a Lost Trail

BY CHARLES B. NEWCOMB,

Author of "All's Right with the World." Cloth 270 pages. Mr. Newcomb made a distinct success with "All's Right with the World," which continues in the front rank of the Metaphysical books that are now so popular. The great number who have been cheered and strengthened by him will welcome another book by that wise teacher whose words of help are doing so much to make the world better by making men and women better able to understand and enjoy it.

"Discovery of a Lost Trail"

is a simple study of that strange and beautiful thing called life, but grand in its scholarly simplicity. It will be in demand by the many who have not previously read metaphysical writings. Price $1.50. For sale at this office.

..GENERAL SURVEY..

THE SPIRITUALISTIC FIELD—ITS WORKERS, DOINGS, ETC., THE WORLD OVER.

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best subserved thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet we wish it distinctly understood that our space is inadequate to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that The Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy, to insure insertion in the paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require. Every item sent to us for publication, should contain the full name and address of the writer. We desire to know the source of every item that appears. This rule will be strictly adhered to.

Keep copies of your poems sent to this office, for they will not be returned if we have not space to use them.

Bear in mind that all notices for this page are cut down to suit the space we have to occupy when received.

Take due notice, that all items for this page must be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer. It will not do to say that Secretary or Correspondent writes so and so, without giving the full name and address of the writer. The items of those who do not comply with this request will be cast into the waste basket.

Letter received from Dansville, N. Y., with $1.00 enclosed, and no name signed.

Mrs. Carrie E. S. Twing and husband will start for Lake Helen, Fla., January 2. Mrs. Twing will be one of the principal speakers at the camp-meeting held there.

Mrs. Carrie F. Curran writes from Toledo, Ohio: "I have just returned from Geneva, Ohio, where I was called to lecture and give tests. Both sessions were very well attended and appreciated, so much so the friends wish to engage me for the last of this month or the first of next. Much credit is due to the officers and members in making one feel at home and giving conditions for spiritual work. They have a temple which belongs to the society. They are appreciative people and desire to hold meetings, but their finances will not permit them to have a speaker very often. I would advise any speaker in passing through Geneva, or who should have calls in their vicinity to correspond with their secretary, Mrs. Hattie Ward, Box 740, Geneva, Ohio. Mr. and Mrs. Bartholomew are royal entertainers and made my stay in their city very pleasant."

Mrs. Carrie Firth Curran writes: "We would like to hear from all Spiritualists in Ohio who are desirous of holding meetings. We have missionaries in different localities of this state and other states also who would be pleased to organize new societies and stimulate old ones and by keeping in touch with these missionaries we may save a great deal of expense to the National, state, and local societies. Address all communications to 123 Indiana avenue, Toledo, Ohio."

G. F. Perkins is now located at 1073½ Market street, San Francisco, Cal., where he will give readings.

Dr. Hilligoss has been deluged with letters from every State in the Union. And all because of that fake story recently published that some wealthy Spiritualists intended to buy Chesterfield and convert it into a Spiritualistic community. The story got into the Associated Press and has had an immense circulation. Many of these letters are written by men who have big schemes which they desire to convert into ready cash. One man offers to sell a gold mine in California for $175,000, which he declares will make the investors rich enough to start a dozen colonies, and to enable the association at Chesterfield to richly endow a college. There is untold millions in this mine, says the writer. Many letters are offering advice, others want to take stock in the enterprise, and many are from persons who want full particulars, presumably that they may be able to get in on the ground floor of this tremendous enterprise.—Anderson (Ind.) Daily Bulletin.

Mrs. T. Boyd writes: "I would like to ask through the medium of your paper whether there are any Spiritualists in South Dakota, and if there are I would esteem it a favor to have them write to me at Vandervoort, South Dakota."

Sunday meetings at 7:30 p. m., at Temple of Honor Hall, 591 Massachusetts avenue. Mrs. S. E. Hall, 421 Green street, Cambridge, Mass.

The Register, of Hampshire, Ill., says: "A haunted house is stirring the inhabitants of Carpentersville. Its owner is David Hill, and the house was until recently occupied by Robert Zorneck. The house was built by Wm. Wilbur, who resided there several years and met death on the railroad track. The next inhabitant also met a violent death, committing suicide. Chas. Coon moved into the house soon afterward and a few years ago was run over and killed by a train. After this a family moved into the house, and one night the daughter retired and the next morning was found dead in bed. About two years ago Jos. Warner moved into the house. He was driving home one night and was thrown out of his buggy and so badly injured that he died. Last week Zorneck was sleeping in his room upstairs, and was awakened by the door being opened. He closed it several times and it each time was reopened. The last time he locked the door, but it soon afterward opened with a bang. Looking about the room he thought he saw a person moving around, and from the description given the next day all agreed it was Jos. Warner, who had lived there. Zorneck has vacated the premises."

H. C. Green writes: "The dance given by the Spiritualistic Social Circle, December 7, at Kenwood Hall, 4308 Cottage Grove avenue, was a most delightful affair, and a large and enthusiastic number of people participated. When Mr. H. F. Coates, of 233 Thirty-second street, president of the society, made the announcement that the dances were to be given twice a month, exclamations of satisfaction and pleasure were heard from all present."

The Chicago Record-Herald has the following from Copenhagen: "Mrs. Abend, the famous medium of Berlin, who lately gave startling seances at the house of Princess Kargdia, at Stockholm, came to Copenhagen to repeat her performances at the house of a professor of the university here. When the medium's traveling bag arrived it was accidentally upset and its contents spilled on the floor, disclosing instruments into which by breathing one might produce strange figures bearing a striking resemblance to the 'spirits' which showed themselves in Stockholm. The professor told Mrs. Abend to leave his house, and she took her departure very abruptly."

J. S. Russell writes: "Dr. E. E. Hall lectured for us last Sunday, and I want to say that his lecture on the 'Power of Suggestion' is a mental developer, just the thing needed."

Dr. J. A. Bailey, inspirational speaker and test medium, is now in the work at Davenport, Iowa, subject to call. Will attend funerals. Open for engagements on reasonable terms. Address him at 1522 Brady street, Davenport, Iowa.

Jacob Kopp writes: "It is my humble opinion that The Progressive Thinker ought to have 1,000,000 subscribers. This debate between Hull and Jamieson is a treat."

J. Q. Adams writes: "The Spiritual Science Church at 77 Thirty-first street, is being built upon such lines of liberal and progressive thought as to call together 'many men of many minds,' all anxious to express the truths that they believe will be for the betterment of mankind. Sunday evening, December 15th, we give an entertainment for the benefit of our free circulating library. A very diversified and interesting program has been arranged."

John W. Ring writes: "Mrs. Nettie M. Wood, secretary of the Texas State National Association of Spiritualists, wishes to hear from all points in Texas where the friends wish the services of Mr. and Mrs. Geo. W. Kates, who are to be in Texas from February 10 to March 16. Address her at No. 2011 Washington street, Houston, Texas."

John K. Scott, attorney at law, of Rock Island, Ill., writes: "Let me compliment you on publishing the best Spiritualistic paper in the country."

Peter Miller writes from Dunkirk, Ind.: "We had J. W. Journigan, of Richmond, Ind., trumpet medium, come to our place, staying two days. He gave us some fine manifestations of spirit return at the writer's home. On the second evening we had a good gathering, among them some of our prominent merchants; also some of our business ladies, and after being fairly started a spirit came and bid us all 'good evening,' and said: 'I would like to send a message by one of you here to Isaac Barnes, from his son George.' The spirit then requested Mr. Leitz, our city boot and shoe merchant, to deliver the message. The spirit then told where and how he was killed, giving the distance and location where his father lived. Every word was plainly spoken and heard by all in the circle. The next day Bro. Leitz found a Mr. Whetsel, who knew the Barnes family well, and when Bro. L. got through telling the message, he replied that every word was true."

The Sentinel, of Fairmount, Minn., says: "J. Randall Brown, the mind reader and Spiritualist medium, held forth at the Opera House to an interested and appreciative audience Monday night. Mr. Brown certainly possesses remarkable powers as a mind reader. The tests given cannot be considered other than genuine without questioning the integrity of a committee of six of our most prominent citizens who chose the subjects for the tests and otherwise assisted Mr. Brown. The most unusual test given was that of reading the mind of a subject by means of an insulated wire. The experiment was a perfect success. Mr. Mathwig was the subject chosen for this test. He took a position at a distance of some thirty feet from Mr. Brown and was then requested to ascertain the number of his watch. This Mr. Mathwig did, after which, acting under the direction of Mr. Brown, he pressed his end of the wire to his forehead and thought strongly of the number. Mr. Brown also pressed his end of the wire to his forehead, and by this means of communication alone was soon able to reproduce the number, which contained six figures, upon a blackboard. During the test Mr. Brown was blindfolded. This test it is claimed is not duplicated by any other mind reader. The spiritual manifestations were certainly very mysterious, but we are not prepared to say whether or not they were genuine, as this is a subject concerning which much skepticism exists. Mr. Brown, however, possesses the ability to give a good entertainment, and undoubtedly is as genuine a medium as any before the public."

I. O. Brown writes from Wheaton, Minn.: "I have the pleasure of announcing that Wm. E. Bonney, of Lincoln, Neb., has just finished a course of lectures for our society. They were grand. We call him the Thomas Paine of modern times. We had fair audiences, notwithstanding the weather was against us, as well as public sentiment. Spiritualism must come to the front rank of the religions of the world. Our society is growing slowly."

Laura B. Payne writes from Topeka, Kan.: "I desire to thank the many who have written letters endorsing the article concerning fake mediumship, which appeared in your paper some two weeks ago. It must have 'struck the key note of the sentiments of a great many, for the kind words of sanction and encouragement have been many. At first I began to answer each personally, but they are so numerous I take this plan to show my appreciation of their kindness. Dozens of letters now lie on my desk from earnest, honest Spiritualists and investigators overflowing with kind congratulations, for which I sincerely thank you, my dear friends and co-workers."

Rev. Alexander Campbell, in his report after a thorough investigation of Spiritualism, said: "Few of those who have believed ever fall back, while numbers of investigators are added daily. Everywhere the intercourse has extended, skeptics in the existence of God or a future state have been converted to a belief of both."

There is no cessation of stories of the marvelous. One of the latest comes from El Dorado, Kans., where it is said, there is a girl, thirteen years old, who possesses mysterious powers. Two years ago her parents were disturbed by rappings about the house. As the girl became older the rappings grew louder and louder. Finally it occurred to the girl that the agents responsible for the noises sought means of communicating with mortals. Therefore she kept a slate and pencil near her. Her thoughtfulness was soon rewarded, and from time to time when the slate is covered the pencil writes. The names of bad boys who killed a dog belonging to the girl's father were inscribed on the slate, and the information was confirmed. The spirits evidently are not entirely satisfied because they continue to rap sometimes very angrily.—Worcester (Mass.) Spy.

J. Clegg Wright will be at Toronto, Canada, during December; January, Washington, D. C.; February and March, Lake Helen, Fla., and April back to Washington.

The Chicago American says: "'Hallucination,' declare the doctors in Bellevue Hospital, New York. Mary Hoffman does not understand the word. What she sees is only too real to her, and the dreadful presence that has haunted her for two years will, it is feared, rob her of the last vestige of reason. The case is peculiar. Mary Hoffman is a normally healthy girl, twenty-three years old, and in daylight is happy and cheerful and as busy and bright as any girl of her years. But at night, around her, dogging her steps, circling about her path, in the dark, is the figure of a man in white, beckoning and moving his silent jaws. She is kept in a room constantly and brilliantly lighted. Deprived of her sleep, with nerves wrung to breaking tension, the girl is in terror of the presence. All methods of mind cure are being adopted to restore her reason. Mrs. Hoffman's aunt, Mrs. Agnes Hoffman, with whom she lived at 1175 Fulton avenue, in the Bronx, said that her niece had come from Alsace seven years ago and that the 'haunt' which oppressed her had appeared two years ago."

Emma Zoe Sostheim, of Chicago, writes: "I now have the eight premium books, and it would be hard to tell which I like the best. All are good. The Progressive Thinker grows better all the time, and I think it is the best Spiritualist paper published."

Do those of the dead numbered among the worthy members of the human race live again on this earth after they die? Is the immortality of the soul a corporeal immortality brought about by a series of several births, lives and deaths of each individual? These questions are answered affirmatively by the Rev. Columbus Bradford, a prominent Methodist minister belonging to the Southern Illinois district, who is at present visiting friends in Clifton Heights, Mo. At the regular meeting of Christian ministers Monday he expounded his views on the doctrine of the soul's immortality. The address provoked a heated discussion. Not all of the ministers, however, decided against Dr. Bradford. While not agreeing with him, the Rev. Frank Tyrrell said there was not one minister out of a hundred who thoroughly understood the theory of a future life. Mr. Bradford said: "Now, I contend that by and by the unworthy members of the race will drop out by failing to be born again after they die. In other words, that the immortality promised in the Bible to the faithful is a corporeal immortality, not an endless life after death, in the form of a bodiless spirit or ghost. Yes, I suppose you may call it a theory of survival of the fittest. That is what it amounts to. I refute absolutely the theory that it is by dying that we reach immortality."

M. F. Everbach, of Seymour, Ind., writes: "I will, after two years of trial at home and abroad, now be permanently engaged as lecturer, and travel over Indiana, Illinois and Wisconsin, in company with a newly developed and highly educated lady medium, who is a good clairvoyant, and clairaudient, as well as healer. I speak German and English."

Henry H. Warner, lecturer and platform medium, would like engagements in Iowa and Nebraska and en route to Oregon City, Oregon, by way of Denver and Salt Lake. Address him, Box 117, Eagle Grove, Iowa, during December."

J. W. Kenyon writes: "Mrs. J. W. Kenyon lectured during September in Worcester, Mass.; during October in Fitchburg, Pawtucket, R. I.; during November in New Bedford, Mass. She will fill more engagements during the season in all these cities. Large numbers of people are converted to a belief in Spiritualism through the tests. It is a mistake to say that Spiritualism is declining, or that the N. S. A. represents the great body of Spiritualists, as Mr. Kates asserts. There are millions of Spiritualists in the United States who never go to a spiritual meeting, but do visit test mediums. Members of all the churches visit mediums, and believe in them; even priests and ministers. The N. S. A. is, no doubt, doing a good work, but Spiritualism will grow and spread independent of its work. I find the great body of Spiritualists indifferent to its literature, either its books, journals or public teachers; but announce a test medium, the hall is packed. There are but few good public test mediums; hence there is a good deal of disappointment, and even disgust, on the part of the public. To-day a well-developed medium gives very excellent tests, full names, facts, dates and characteristic messages, and every one goes home happy, joyful and in full faith. Next Sunday comes a new medium, half developed, who blunders, half truths, guesswork, etc. Then come the brazen fraud—many names given, none recognized, and every one goes home disgusted. Still Spiritualism grows and spreads because of the true and honest mediums' work that underlies the whole."

Laura C. Morse writes: "Through the kindness of friends, I have for an indefinite time been blessed with the reading of your valuable paper. My best wishes go out to you in your glorious undertaking to elevate humanity. Your 'Symposium on Prayer' was a number to be kept for reference. I am not through laughing yet at the remarks of 'The Man Up a Tree' in that number."

Virginie Barrett writes: "I shall be in Chicago this month. I would like to aid societies while in the city; also like to hear from towns in Illinois and Indiana on my way. Friends, please address me here. Will make terms reasonable. I am still soliciting engagements as vocalist and speaker for camps for 1902. I will largely use C. Payson Longley's beautiful spiritual music. Friends and workers at this time, with thoughts of the angels, let us remember the poor of earth. Address me at 810 E. 16th street, Indianapolis, Ind."

L. Hamdcher writes: "I am delighted with the premium book, 'A Wanderer in Spirit Lands.' I found it interesting from the first to the last page."

Mrs. I. Tisdell writes: "Your paper is indeed a light in my home. When reading it I am always under control and have been able to give tests, dating back many years. Many times there comes to me for you a little girl; I should say five or six years old. She comes through an open door, and running across the room to where you sit, she lays a bouquet of flowers beside you. This I see as you are sitting in your office."

B. V. Springer writes: "I have the eight premium books, and if they could not be replaced, money could not buy them, and although I have never had an opportunity to witness any of the phenomena of Spiritualism, I am thoroughly convinced of the truth of its philosophy. It effectually sweeps away the cobwebs of tradition and superstition. Orthodoxy with all its Gods and inconsistencies are back numbers. I shall always bless the day that I first saw The Prfogressive Thinker."

A. K. Venning writes: "All right-thinking people will heartily endorse Mr. Coleman's sentiments in your last: 'Vaccination and re-vaccination of all children of school age has been compulsory in Germany since 1874, and in 1899 when this law had been in operation for 25 years, the total deaths from small-pox in 285 German towns, with a population of nearly sixteen millions, were only four. That is one side of the position. The other side is supplied by France, where vaccination is far less universal. Here in 116 towns, with a population of eight and one-half millions the deaths from small pox in the year 1899 were 600.' This is an extract from the Spectator; it also appeared in the Times. I have a certain respect and admiration for Dr. Peebles, but every one who has studied this subject can not help saying that he is mistaken thereon. Abuse and violence never help any cause."

Ben F. Hayden writes from Indianapolis, Ind.: "Spiritualism has again been 'killed'; utterly annihilated this time, by the presiding elder of the Muncie district of the M. E. Church, who 'exposed' it at the M. E. church in Sheridan, Ind. He succeeded in arousing quite an interest in our cause, and when the society there secured my services for a series of lectures, I found the people there ready to give respectful hearing. A well-filled opera house greeted me; the closest attention was paid, and from the nods of approval, I am led to believe that Spiritualism is better understood and a deeper interest manifested than before it was 'killed' by the doughty bishop. I am now permanently located at 1431 Columbia avenue, where we will stay for the winter, holding public circles every Tuesday and Friday evenings, and regular services every Wednesday afternoon from 2 to 4 o'clock. We will go out for Sunday services anywhere within one hundred miles of Indianapolis, lecture and give tests and conduct funeral services, etc. We are also open for engagements for camp work, season of 1902. Spiritualist friends visiting the city are cordially invited to call on us at the above number. We solicit correspondence with societies with a view to engaging our services."

Geo. H. Brooks writes from Newport, Ky.: "I finished my second month's engagement with the society the last Sunday in November and am now on my second engagement of two months more—December and January. The work is moving on nicely. I established a Sunday afternoon service the second Sunday I came, and have kept it up. The attendance is fair in the afternoon, but the house is filled in the evening, and the interest is on the increase. There has been quite a large accession of members, and more to follow. The society has taken the stand that no medium shall step on its rostrum who cannot come well recommended. They feel that their past experiences have been such that any medium who comes among them either for their Thursday evening meeting or Sunday service must come with the recommendation of some one who is known. I call the attention of the friends in Kentucky as well as in Southern Ohio and Indiana, that I would like to make arrangements to hold a few week-night meetings in your place. Write me on the subject. Let us make arrangements, and please do so at once, for my time here will soon be up. I go for February and March to Milwaukee, Wis., and serve the Unity Society there. Come, friends, let me hear from you and let us hold meetings in different parts of the country. I will respond to calls for funerals. Send all mail and telegrams to 120 East Third street, Newport, Ky."

C. W. Jackson writes: "I have been much interested in the letters appearing in The Progressive Thinker, purporting to come from Spirit Frances E. Willard. In the Date, December 7, she makes some statements that need explanation. She says: 'There is a second death, the annihilation of the sin-stricken spirit.' Is it possible she means to say that the soul is annihilated? If so, what power is it that does it? If it can destroy a sin-stricken soul, can it not destroy one that is stricken with an excess of joy? Are they destroyed by a fixed law or by some God or Devil? In speaking of intemperance, she says: 'One should use moderation, one can be intemperate in eating or dress, in house furnishing, or in love of one's husband, and refers to Martha Abbott. Now, does the sister aim to compare such things with the excessive use of alcohol or opium? Once she taught true temperance was to abstain from the things that are evil and to use the things that are good in moderation, and there were many thousands who think she was right then, and who think is she has changed, it is for the worse. Has not the sister let some Jesuit priest impose on her?"

S. R. Anson writes from Marshalltown, Iowa: "Our rostrum has been occupied for the last several Sundays by Mrs. H. C. Westlake, teaching the higher thoughts of Spiritualism. She is now contemplating going out for the Iowa State Spiritualists Association as a missionary. If all organized societies would be as choice in their selection of workers in the spiritual cause, the next symposium for The Progressive Thinker would be on the wonderful growth of Spiritualism. Undeveloped mediumship and unscrupulous persons are the cause of the so-called decline in Spiritualism. Spiritualists themselves are responsible for this state of affairs. Invariably Spiritualists are looking for tests and messages to convince themselves they are still Spiritualists. Spiritualism as taught through the mediumship of Mrs. H. C. Westlake carries us to a higher plane of intelligence and refinement, where Spiritualism belongs. Such mediumship is rare and should receive substantial support from those interested in the betterment of our cause."

Frederick Schroeder writes from Marthton, Ill.: "We have had several fine meetings in Watseka at Brother Upsall's home, through the trumpet medium, Mrs. Pemberton. I will have her come to our home this winter for a day or two, which she promised to do. She is, I believe an honest lady and medium. For two days she was kept busy giving seances to a great many, who came in from far and near. Let the good work go on, is my desire, and to do good whenever possible."

A dispatch from London, Eng., says: "A new craze threatens to grip society. That is crystal gazing. Andrew Lang is the prime mover. He has been recommending that everyone should possess a crystal ball, and to sit down with it in the hope of seeing uncanny pictures. Mr. Lang succeeded even beyond his dreams. People everywhere are buying crystal balls. They have read Mr. Lang's article in a monthly review, and on its advice are writing to the Psychical Research Society in Buckingham street, the Strand, for the necessary crystals. Mr. Bennett, secretary of the society, says that as a result of Mr. Lang's article the demand for crystals has gone up with a bound. So many are the orders that he is unable to execute them all. 'There is something weirdly attractive in Mr. Lang's instructions to crystal gazers. It is best, he says, to go into a room and sit down with your back to the light. Place the ball at the proper focus on a piece of dark cloth. Try to exclude reflections. Think of everything you please. Stare, say, five minutes at the ball. That is all.' Mr. Lang says he has known people to see in the crystal things actually happening miles away. More wonderful still, he has known people gazing into separate crystals at the same moment each to see the same picture."

The Society of Spiritual Science of New York meets every Sunday night at eight o'clock, at Etnis Hall, 132 West 23d street. The true principles of life as taught and demonstrated by Jesus the Christ, are given. Psychometric delineations from sealed envelopes. Address of secretary, P. O. Box 1903, New York City.

G. W. Kates held meetings in New Haven, Conn., December 11 and 12, in place of H. D. Barrett, who has been summoned to Wisconsin. A local society will likely result from the meetings.

Ella C. Preston writes from St. Louis, Mo.: "Our bazaar is over, and was a grand success. It was given by the ladies of the First Spiritual Association, Brother Thomas Grimshaw lecturer—afternoons and evenings of the 3rd, 4th and 5th of this month. We had the Banquet Hall of the Masonic Temple, a very roomy place, and had many booths, tables, etc. It was a grand success. The booth and paper booth was the banner booth, netting some $49; next, the lyceum, $40. We are very thankful to you for your year's subscription for same, and the winner is Mr. J. O. Breech, 3403 Bell avenue."

A CALL

To the Spiritualists of Minnesota.

Arrangements have just been completed with the State Spiritualists Association of Minnesota, whereby I am to act as your and their state missionary for the ensuing year.

Minnesota stands today prominently in the foreground as regards work done in the cause of Spiritualism, and naturally the officers of the association as well as the writer are extremely anxious that the past splendid record be sustained.

There is every reason to believe that this can be done, if we will all work with that end in view.

We are desirous of reaching every available point in the state, and every locality, great and small will be visited if desired.

While the workers in the field are willing to work incessantly for the advancement of the cause they represent, they cannot do it all unaided. Every Spiritualist represents a spoke in the wheel of progress, and if one be weak, the same burdens cannot be borne. Therefore is this call issued to every Spiritualist in the state. In order to facilitate the work, and make possible the greatest degree of success, it will be necessary to have the hearty co-operation of every one who has the interest of truth and progression at heart. We want you to send in your names to either the state secretary, Mary K. Calmus, 2816 11th Ave. So., Minneapolis, Minn., or to the writer at his present address in La Crosse.

Let us hear from every locality that wishes one or more meetings. In order to work to the best advantage it will be necessary to make all engagements en route.

For the month of January, every point in the Southern and Eastern portion of the state will be visited. During February, the north and western portion will receive the bulk of the attention. Do not wait before writing to fix dates but let me hear from you at once, as we must be up and doing if we would continue in the front ranks. Never before has our beautiful philosophy received the attention or seen the activity that will prevail during the coming year. We cannot afford to procrastinate as nearly every state in the Union will be stirred to an activity never before witnessed; this means we will have to work to retain the laurels won for the state by my predecessors. A vigorous programme is being outlined by your executive board, and whenever feasible mass-meetings will be put on to increase interest, etc. Talent of the highest order will be presented.

We have the truth and we know it, then Spiritualists, let us make the best of the opportunities before us, and show the world that we were never so vigorous as now. The stronger we make our state organizations the better protection and greater liberty we shall enjoy.

In conclusion, let me say I am in the field to work, and am at your service. Let me hear from every town, city or village in the state where the friends wish for lectures, tests and readings.

FIELD NOTES.

Tribulations and Blessings of the Field Workers.

I want to write up some of the incidents of field work and impressions thereon for the purpose of showing some of the tribulations and blessings that come to western field workers. The first place I struck was Beloit, Kans., about the 22d of November. I had been invited to come to this place and organize them in the early part of August, but was disappointed to find that only one or two families wanted me. I was only a lecturer, a mere caterer in intellectual and spiritual matters, and they didn't want any of that. I found people there sitting for development as trumpet mediums and slate-writers, but I found only one Progressive Thinker and no other Spiritualist paper there. I think another family gets The Progressive Thinker, but they live out of town and my coming was of so little importance that though it was known in advance, no word was conveyed to them.

They have had two mediums there lately; one Mrs. Bartell, I know to be good, the other who shall be nameless here, I have never met, but have heard both adverse and favorable reports concerning him. Everything went swimmingly until a pair of handcuffs were put on him which according to program he was to free himself from. This he failed to do, but in a lecture subsequently he called it "a trick," and promised to explain it. He did not. Indeed the only thing he did was to discredit all the manifestations produced by him or through him, whichever way the reader wants it, and all other manifestations that had ever been enacted or perpetrated there. This is one of the beauties (?) of public mediumship. In Beloit the better class of people regard Spiritualism as a sort of a Gypsy show. And why shouldn't they? This is the only phase that is presented to them. If there is anything intellectual about it they have no means of learning it. Last spring a poor stranded lecturer came to Topeka where I was. I saw some Spiritualists from another town and asked them, "Can't you get up some lectures for Brother —— in your place, and help him along? The reply was: "We are not ready for lectures yet, we want to get a good materializing medium there first." And ten chances to one when they get a materializing medium there a large number of the people will decide the whole thing is a fraud. They had the cart before the horse as every phenomenalist I ever met has. The first thing that is needed is lectures explaining the philosophy, and then the next thing is to not have a public medium, but persuade them to hold family circles where it will be know that everything is honest; but if you must have a public medium, be careful who you get and allow no one to enter the circle but honest investigators, I would even exclude chronic test hunters, as they are no good in a circle in a Spiritualist society, or any where else.

It is thus seen public mediumship stands in the way of Spiritualism here in Kansas; that the class they interest most are the do-nothings, and I might say, know-nothings. Their only talk is about the last test and the next one they expect to get, and their only effort is to thrust some so-called medium in front of our lecturers and teachers and prevent the community from receiving any educational or spiritual teachings.

While in Beloit I made my home with Brother and Sister Hickman, old veteran Spiritualists, who love Spiritualism for its philosophy and intellectual tendencies as well as for the evidences it furnishes that our friends still live.

My next point was Neodesha, where I met with quite a different reception. Here I was aided by Sister Sarah C. Scovell, of Galena, with readings and tests. Our audiences increased to the last, and some of the best citizens of Neodesha became much interested. Here we organized a society of eighteen, and several who did not join will co-operate with them. At this series of meetings it was my pleasure, assisted by Sister Scovell, to ordain Sister C. Belle Fleming as a minister of the pure gospel of Spiritualism. I think she feels the responsibility of the work she has undertaken, and I hope she may live long (she is comparatively a young woman yet) and be much honor to the cause after your writer has gone up higher.

In this place, I had my home with Brother and Sister George Shelly, who have been Spiritualists for many years. Indeed Sister Shelly grew up a Spiritualist and a medium. Brother J. H. Fleming is the secretary of the society there, and when they accumulate funds sufficient they will have a few more lectures there.

From there I came to Empire City, Kansas, and am stopping with Brother and Sister Sweet here. I shall remain a couple of weeks here holding meetings in Galena, at Joplin, Mo., and this place.

"AS IT IS TO BE."

A VERY SUGGESTIVE WORK.

It Beams With Spiritual Truths.

This is a beautiful book, by Cora Lynn Daniels, and it scintillates with grand spiritual thought. An idea of this work can be obtained by reading the titles of a few of the chapters therein:

The Process of Dying; Light and Spirit; The Law of Attraction; Senses of the Spirit; What Is Unconscious Will; Fear; Astrology; The God-Soul of Man; The Drama; A Day in Heaven. Price $1. For sale at this office.

"NO BEGINNING."

An Excellent Work for Thinkers.

This book, "No Beginning," is by William H. Maple. The Arena says of it: "The argument is unanswerable. The book will at once appeal to the reason of every reader, and leave him more amazed than ever at the prevalence of the theory of Creation." The Two has always been a fateful number. Free Thought Ideal says: "We found it full of glittering thoughts for thinkers, and the very death warrant of Christian superstition shines upon its pages." Price 75 cents.

LIGHT OF EGYPT.

The Second Volume of a Most Valuable Work.

This is the author's posthumous work left in MS. to a few of his private pupils in occultism, and like Volume I. is (a valuable addition and) a library on occult subjects. Spiritual astrology is especially elaborated. Alchemy, Talismans, the Magic Wand, Symbolism, Correspondence, Penetralia, etc., are a few of the subjects treated of in a scholarly and masterly manner, showing the author to be familiar with his subjects. You cannot afford to be without it, as well as all his other books, viz.: The Light of Egypt, Vol. I., bound in cloth, $2; paper, $1. The Light of Egypt, Vol. II., bound in cloth only, $2. Celestial Dynamics, cloth, $1. The Language of the Stars, paper, 50 cents. For sale at this office.

Glimpses of Heaven.

Through the hand of Carrie E. S. Twing automatically By Gilbert Haven, late Bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church. This is the second book from this eminent divine since he passed to Spirit-life. Price 20c. For sale at this office.

Life of

WILLIAM M'KINLEY,

Our Martyred President,

With Short Biographies of Lincoln and Garfield, and a Comprehensive Life of President Roosevelt.

Edited by

RT. REV. SAMUEL FALLOWS, LL. D.

The book contains 453 pages, weighs a little more than three pounds, is printed from large clear type, has 51 illustrations, including half-tone portraits of Mr. and Mrs. McKinley, and his mother, the author and members of his cabinet and warm friends, Lincoln, Garfield, President Roosevelt and family; battle scenes of the rebellion in which Mr. McKinley participated; also a photo of the assassin, scenes of the tragedy, the death-bed, Mrs. McKinley's leave-taking of her illustrious and devoted husband, and other interesting illustrations.

This massive work contains a complete biography of the martyred President, and many of his masterpieces of eloquence as a statesman, and a record of his beautiful home life and untiring devotion to his wife and mother. It also contains sketches of Lincoln and Garfield, and a brief history of Anarchy, its purposes and results.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected. Geo. R. Bicknell: Q. If a church member keeps his soul pure and spotless by the cultivation of pure thoughts and noble deeds, does he not have as good chance for a beautiful thought-built mansion as a Spiritualist, even if he does believe that Jesus is the only begotten son of God?

A. The preservation of Christianity, depends on the one fact that it presents an ideal which fills the utmost capacity of every human soul. Christ the perfect man, who sacrifies himself for others; who is pure, true, just, with infinite love and charity. He is a common type for all Christians, and those who earnestly engage, realizing in their lives this exalted ideal, forget creeds and beliefs, and are not confined by church lines. They are few in number to those who take the beliefs and doctrines, the dead forms and senseless ceremonials as all there is of the Christian religion, and make only a show of conforming their lives to a high morality.

He who lives true to a noble ideal will find nothing to complain of in the next life, whatever may be his beliefs. He may be a Methodist or Presbyterian and immeasurably more spiritual than a professed Spiritualist, whose belief has done nothing to Spiritualize his thoughts. I have listened to the ideas of many of these, of the spirit world, and doubted if they would not be more disappointed when they came to enter it than the church deacons whose conceptions or want of conceptions they ridiculed.

Spiritualism should be the most exalting and uplifting of moral forces. If it is not, the blame rests with those who receive it.

The church member may become better than his creed. He often does. He is nobly true and good in spite of his creed. The Spiritualist can never reach the ideal the perfect spirit constantly presents for an example.

Enquirer: Q. A few of us are talking of starting a progressive lyceum, and we do not know how to do so. Are we obliged to secure a charter from the N. S. A., or its Lyceum Branch, or have one of its agents come and organize for us?

A. Thus far the National Association has done little for the lyceum movement, and the outlook is that it will do less. Its missionaries have organized societies but few lyceums.

To have a progressive lyceum, that will live and thrive, there must be good home material. There must be a few souls willing to give time, strength and means to the work. They must do this unselfishly, and put into the movement the precepts of true Spiritualism. The Lyceum is spiritual and rationalistic, diametrically opposed to old methods.

The Old has sought to force man to call to his aid foreign and external agencies while this substitutes growth by self-dependency.

Not in the past; not on cross, or in dungeon; not in the mouldering parchments preserving the dead ideas of dead men are we to see the truth to be sought; but within ourselves, and the living present. There are no books that teach this knowledge—they are only aids. Tradition, the clinging to the old, dread of the new, all are against us. Success depends on individual efforts, and the harmonious blending of such efforts.

The lyceum is a growing institution; it is living. Forms and stereotyped sessions should be avoided. Its field is as broad as the universe. Hence helps such as Sunday-schools receive from "Lesson Leaves," and texts with commentaries, are of little service. The essential element of success is efficient, self-sacrificing officers and teachers who are willing to put all their energies into the work. Such will find in their efforts to interest and instruct others, they are disciplining their own minds and reaping for themselves even more than they sow for others.

The great mistake is the belief too often entertained that the lyceum is only for children. It is for adults as well; for the oldest as much as for the youngest. Its value lies in its wonderful adaptability, whereby it is a school where all may teach, all learn.

No, you do not require a charter from any head society, nor the assistance of an agent or deputy. Wherever a few persons of liberal thought are able to meet, a lyceum can be inaugurated. All that is necessary is to send for a Lyceum Guide, which gives full directions for the establishment and maintenance of such an organization.

C. H. Mathews: Q. I saw a statement lately that among the civil offices in Greater New York there were eleven chaplains to be appointed, or reappointed.

Is it possible that under our boasted "free institutions," the people of that tax-ridden city are to be burdened with the additional cost of paying chaplains to mumble orthodox prayers for no other use than "the benefit of clergy?"

Is not such misgovernment an incitement to insubordination, rebellion and anarchy?

Under the new regime recently inaugurated there, would it not be well for the new city government to dispense with the chaplains entirely?

Might not the United States Congress, now in session, dispense with numberless army and navy chaplains for the same good reason?

A. These questions carry with them their answers. Not only is it true that the state maintains chaplains at all penitentiaries, reformatories, asylums, and for the state assemblies and national, it is further true that a host of these preachers are sent with the army and navy, and all receive a high salary. It is a survival of a very old custom. In Egypt the army was controlled by the priests. In Rome, when a great battle was impending the priests were consulted, and fixed the auspicious time when the gods would lend their assistance. In the dark ages, down to a quite recent time, the priests went before the soldiers carrying a relic of some titular saint, a piece of bone, or shred of clothing. All this has been discarded with the supremacy of the priest, and all that remains of the dreadful power, is the chaplain, who with more or less elocutionary effect, prays when required, and persuades God to do or not to do. When Christian armies are drawn up in opposing forces, both sides having their chaplains appeal to the same Father God, through Christ to give success to their banners and send them victorious over the mangled forms of the prostrate foe! Oh, was there ever such blasphemy? Such a Satanic lie in the face of intelligence?

And yet will it continue. A superstition with a thousand ages of heredity dies hard, if it ever is quite dead. It will be a brave man who dares suggest that the curtain be rung down on the farce, No one will claim for a moment that all the chaplains of army, navy and legislatures have ever had a prayer answered; and no one expects they ever will, yet they will remain because no legislator dares to suggest their uselessness. The office of chaplain is held in defiance of the Constitution of our government, for Buddhist or Mohammedan priests might as appropriately hold the office as ministers of the gospel. It is supporting a religion, and compelling those who do not believe to give their means through taxation to support this army of ministers who have failed by their mediocrity to gain a place elsewhere.

SCIENCE OF BEING.

A Chapter in the A, B, Cs of Theology.

The great searchlight of human endeavor turning itself upon the various strata of theologic inquiries, deductions, metamorphoses and eventuations as varied as are the earth's changes in its accumulation of atoms since its oolitic crust first gave it a place as a crystallization, shows us the human race to have ever been reaching out through some indwelling power toward a something apprehended yet not comprehended.

We call Egyptian civilization vastly ancient, yet there had been predecessors to them. The Egyptian theologists in their God, Ptah, embodied more of genuine truth than any orthodox creed of the present day indicates, so they must have been epitomes of their past to have been able to hold such a high concept as some of their recently discovered work indicates Stumbling along the highway of life, man has here and there left footprints that are waymarks to us, showing here a beaten path and there one overgrown with trees and furze, offering no inducement to the seeker after truth to re-tread them. We of to-day, we who have followed the long-trodden path of the so-called evangelistic churches and who have found in them so little food for really hungry souls, have turned ourselves to gaze upon an illuminated sky and have been able to read thereon a new scripture. Turning thence to the parchment of the years we discover that parchment to be a palimpsest and the first writing thereon to have been that which we are called upon to study to-day.

The brain that received those thoughts for recording did not altogether grasp the philosophy intended to be conveyed, and later interpreters were less able to open up the principles on which that philosophy was based, therefore confusion. And this confusion became intensified as those teachings went from mouth to mouth, blending themselves with other isms and ologies until the first speaker's words and sense became lost or entirely disfigured. Result, the creeds of to-day.

Upon these creeds men and women have been and are trying to place the lever of upgrowth as upon a true fulcrum, and have succeeded just so far as they have followed the writing of the old palimpsest. Just as far as lives have been actuated by the principles and ethics of truth have people succeeded in building up a spiritual structure that has stood the time of transition and the demands of the life beyond, even though they could give no clear synopsis of the way by which they had reached a plane of being which gave them happiness.

To the close student, the methodical one though, there is real pleasure in being able to have a chart by which a course can be laid out for a sail over the ocean of life. To this chart we will give the name of the "Science of Being," for religion is this and nothing more. All sciences are based upon proven facts, whether those facts have been demonstrations from cause to effect or from effect back to proven cause. All facts have their bases in principles, and when we have discovered these and have facts to back them we have formulated a science.

Facts of being we have; now on what principles are they based?

According to light received from those who have traversed the ages, we have these three primordial principles upon which Being is based: First we have Love; second, Intellect, and third, Will.

Our first premise is that All is Thought; and this must be true for Love, Intellect, Will are thought properties. And we have the further asseveration that every atom, however infinitesimal in itself, is a living organism, a thought in itself and capable of affiling itself to any other atom of like kind for a definite purpose, that purpose ever being Good. The offices of Love are attraction, cohesion, adhesion, selection, implying rejection; its method is by impulse, taking the word in its inmost sense; those of Intellect are, devising ways and means of accomplishing; while Will puts into effect.

Here we have Nature's formula, and Nature, or all there is, is God. To this who can add; from it who would take away? These are the A, B, Cs of theology, the "Science of Being" and out of the alphabet all words are formed.

THE USES AND PERILS OF PSYCHISM, HYPNOTISM AND SPIRITUALISM.

here, sitting on a chair, and outside on the veranda the operator stood; the boy sat there looking into the room, no possibility of seeing what was going on outside. I had in my hand some papers of bright colors, such as samples used by wall-paper dealers. There were different colors, red and blue and green and yellow, etc. The operator would take his handkerchief and say, "Tommy, what have I got here?"

"A handkerchief."

"What color?"

"White."

I would hold up a red paper and he would say, "what color is this?" "Red." The sense of the color would pass from the operator's brain into the brain of the boy and the boy would immediately get the impression of red. I changed the paper and each time the boy would reflect the color seen by the eye of the operator. There you have the identity of thought between the operator and the subject.

Then we tried this experiment. The subject would taste whatever was put in the mouth of the operator and feel whatever was done to the operator, although insensible to what was done to himself. If you pricked or pinched him he was insensible to the touch, but if you pricked the operator that sensation was given to the subject.

USES AND ABUSES.

Suppose you have a person under your control like that, you could make that person do whatever you liked. I say it is a terrific responsibility to take upon yourself to interfere with the liberty of any person. What right have you to put a fellow man into bondage worse than that of the negro? Because the poor thing gets nothing for it, he merely contributes to your pleasure or curiosity, etc Do you know that you could kill a person by making a powerful impression on his mind? For instance, lead him in imagination up the high Masonic Temple Building, and say, "You are pretty high up; look down, do you see?" "Yes."

"It is a long way down; if you jump you will fall." And you could kill a person, because it brings on such shock, and then the person will actually fall, through space if you choose to lead him there, he would undoubtedly kill himself because the shock will bring on heart failure and he will die. That is, the chances are he would die. You could stop him and say, "See, now I have brought you up here, now I bring you by the window; it is a great distance down there; if I had not been here you might have fallen down; now it is all right." Remove the impression from his mind before consciousness comes.

But you know there are people who practice sorcery. Sorcery is this mesmeric or hypnotic power used for selfish or evil purposes. A brilliant writer in India, a Mohammedan, told me he had one time had an unholy desire for a certain lady, and he went to a sorcerer who told him to—No, I won't tell you, because somebody might practice it. At any rate I will tell you this: He had to do a certain thing and repeat a certain thing over and over and over and over again, thousands of times, for a certain number of days and to think to himself the face of the person for whom he had the desire. When he got it so the face was absolutely life-like and could see her like the living person, then the charm would be complete and his object would be attained. And so it turned out. But he said all the misfortunes resulting he believed to be from the result of putting himself under the power of evil entities that were under the control of the sorcerer who worked the charm.

BROWNIES AND FAIRIES.

Now, mind you, I do not consider the stories of brownies and fairies as eccentricities of certain peoples. I have the courage of my convictions. I have not studied for fifty years without learning something. I have learned some things other people have not learned. I know many things about these things. I merely mention that, for some people might call me insane. I recollect once delivering a lecture in Dublin on "Irish Fairies." I defended the belief in the existence of fairies. The London Daily News said: "Col. Olcott must be a man of great moral courage to defend the Irish fairy in this stage of civilization." They are real. The stories told by the Irish peasantry are true; fairies do exist. The books you give the children to read are not illusions, but are true. There are kingdoms in nature which are inhabited by sub-human beings. They are inhabited because nature has no vacuum. There is no department of nature that is not occupied by intelligences which are functioning actively in various ways. There are evil ones that are attracted to evil persons. The Bible says a certain person took to himself seven devils and was worse than ever; I forget the exact quotation (laughter). But it also speaks about a devil having run into a herd of swine and they ran into the water, without any compensation to the owner, so far as we learn. That these things exist is admitted in sacred writings and were believed in by the people. They can be employed for good or bad purposes.

ILLUSION.

This illusion that you have often read about the juggler in India who unrolls a tape and throws it into the air and a boy climbs up high in the air and you hear his voice crying, "Take me down," to the man down below, who pulls him down and gets angry and dismembers the boy, and you see his bleeding body which he calmly puts under a sheet and pulls in the tape, suddenly the boy appears all well and uninjured, is nothing but an illusion. That is the employment of hypnotism which the juggler has learned from his father, and he learned it from his father, and the thing has been done in the family for generations. Many things are done by the use of psychic powers. Mesmeric powers are substantially the same as hypnotic powers, and can be employed for good or bad purposes.

Where you are employing the power for an unselfish object you will do good, you will not do harm to the person; but you must remember there is a great difference in the sensitiveness of persons. I was pointing my finger at a person whom I was trying to mesmerize, who would resist apparently up to a certain point, and suddenly he fell like an animal struck with a hammer, fell on the floor and rolled under the table. You must be careful in making experiments on sensitive patients or you can do great harm. Let the person stand up so he cannot see what you are doing; put his face toward the wall, make passes on his back to his shoulders, fix the mind and will that he should become a magnet, and draw your hand slowly away, if he is very sensitive he will lose his balance and fall over. You can recall him if you go in front of him, he will come forward and you can restore his consciousness. A person like that can be cured at once. You can simply collect yourself together, gather your will and fling a current of it at the person, immediately he will get cured. And there is an immense amount of charlatanism in this, where people make a great pretense of divine power. People only haven't confidence, or they could do it as well as any public character who pretends to do it by means of God. You must not run wild over a person who happens to be a charlatan, and charge him at the same time with being a trickster. He may have power. A bad man can have power as well as a good man. You can employ it for a bad purpose as well as for a good purpose. So a man who puts a turban on his head and wears a garment of red material with embroidered scrolls and crosses on it, and calls himself the incarnation of Nicodemus or something like that, may have a tremendous healing power all the time, and it is not a wise thing to go and set the hounds at work and run him down because his system of theology does not appear sound, or his patients seem to be misled. The man may have healing power and yet be a charlatan or a misled fanatic. The power is psychic power, nothing spiritual about it at all.

HEALING POWER.

I tell the people in this audience, if they have any pains, to stand up. You will see twenty or thirty standing. I say, "look at me!" When I get their attention fixed upon me, I concentrate my will power and I say, "Be healed." That is quite enough, because the thought I hurled at them in that way is an exhibition of psychic power. The sensitive will keep it; the disposition to be cured is created in their minds and they heal themselves. There is no miraculous power from that, whatever. I give the suggestion, and they keep it and heal themselves. In that way it can be employed to great advantage. Suggest to a person that he can be cured of a certain disease, you will make it possible for him to be cured. Tell him it is hopeless, he will die. In cases of typhoid fever there is always hope for the patient until he loses his grip and begins to whimper like a child, then he will die.

You can use psychism for a good purpose that way. What is it but psychism that causes a man in the fever of a political campaign, or in a question of foreign invasion, to come out and stand before the people a pillar of power; full of patriotism, fire and enthusiasm he stands there before the people and waves of influence go from him to the audience, and are kept up as the leaves of the tree are agitated by the breeze; they stand there through his address and he sends his thought plunging into their hearts and makes them all rise and shout to arms. What a magnificent appeal was that of Gustavus Adolphus of Sweden: "There was a time, my friends, a glorious time, when not a single man of your forefathers," etc.

What power there was in that, and how he turned the Swedes to victory.

Look at Sheridan in the fight with Longstreet, when there was a flying army, and Sheridan twenty miles away; he galloped up and saw the din of the battle and the men flying, and he cursed them and dashed among them and dashed toward the enemy. His immense power of will and enthusiasm changed the flying army into a victorious one instead, and they rushed forward to victory. That is psychic power, a person dominated by a great thought, perhaps a person of great spiritual power, deep character and deep convictions, but he can also employ psychic means for that good purpose.

There was Peter the Hermit who raised an immense army for the crusade; he went around preaching salvation to the people, they were swept as by the wind, they turned around and went to Palestine, but they did not accomplish their object.

If you are a doctor, no matter what your system of medicine may be, your confidence will cure your patients more than anything else, the confidence your patient has in you will enable you to put the thought of recovery into his mind; if you are cheerful and encourage him he will snatch himself from the very jaws of death. Some have the power to do this by their own moral force, some require to be persuaded, require all the persuasion that can be used by the physician on the patient and the psychic influence he is able to exercise.

This psychic power can also be used for the purpose of conversion. I have seen General Booth in Exeter Hall convert seventy-five people at a single meeting; convert them to what? Convert them into hypnotic subjects. I have seen Newton the great healer, do the same thing. I tell you that any good strong mesmerizer can do the same thing and cause people to heal themselves in this way.

Here is the rule. Go into the study of the subject of Spiritualism. How much I could tell you about that, but the time is growing late and I must stop. I have gone into the thing root and branch and done everything to eliminate any chance of fraud. Crookes and Wallace have written to me that I have fulfilled all the requirements of scientific research. I have invented most of the tests employed, such as the use of threads, fastening the medium in a bag and putting him in a wire cage. I invented that in my course of experiments in Vermont. Under those circumstances I saw 500 figures of so-called dead people appear, seventeen in one night. As these people said, I exhausted all the requirements of scientific research I was careful in the matter not to come to a premature conclusion. Wallace wrote me he thought I had done wrong in not giving my convictions as to the truth of the phenomena, because, he said, "You have proved your case over and over again." I said that was exactly what I meant to do; I didn't mean to give my opinion; my opinion was not worth stating. Here are the facts, there are my tests that I used. If you can find any flaws in them do so; if not, then you must say, here is a working hypothesis to go on.

Spiritualistic phenomena have given us the most important additions to our knowledge of matter and force and the possibility of its extension. It makes us know that people in the body can do all the things ascribed to those out of the body, but that does not prove some things are not done by people out of the body that cannot be done by people in the body. In every case where you get communications you must eliminate the possibility of fraud. If you get an intelligent communication, find out whether it is possible to trace the intelligence to living brains in the room, or people connected with anyone in the room, because until you can do this you cannot say that any given communication is from a dead person. There are circumstances where communications apparently could not come from any other person than the dead. That is the solid basis on which the Spiritualistic movement stands. That is why all the attempts to overthrow it, all the exposures of mediums that have taken place, have no effect on the great movement built fifty years ago. It takes us beyond the grave, makes it possible for people on the other side to communicate with us. That knocks the corner-stone out of the theory of materialism, for if only one person has returned there is no reason why ten million may not. It did not require a bushel of apples to fall on Newton's head to show him the law of gravitation; a single one was quite enough.

ANCIENT WISDOM.

Another thing is this: It leads us onto the threshold of the ancient esoteric science, ancient wisdom; for mark my words, we are going step by step toward the threshold where the genius of ancient science stands waiting for her sister to come forward and join hands with her. The discovery of the Beckerl ray, the latest thing, shows us we are approaching this point; this ray, radiant in darkness, shining like the lighting up of the palaces of the genii in the fables of the Arabian Nights is the joining of modern science with the ancient wisdom. My society claims to have discovered nothing whatever, it has not enumerated a single new proposition, we originate nothing but stand for the wisdom of our ancestors.

I thank you for the very kind appreciation you have shown me. I shall always take an interest in the development of your city. I find great pleasure in the immense amount of information given by your Sunday papers. There are many interesting cures related in them. Here is one of locomotor ataxia. Here is a case where memory was restored by hypnotism—the case of a young man named Joseph Kelly, related in the Buffalo Courier of May 28.

I thank you all very kindly, and although I live on the other side of the world, I take great interest in America and in her advancement.

TO THE ADMIRERS OF MRS. CORA L. V. RICHMOND.

We believe there are many who are hungry for Mrs. Richmond's teachings. We shall publish monthly her discourses if we can get enough subscribers at $1 a year, to cover expenses. If you will be one to help carry forward the work send address to Waldo Dennis, vice-president of the Church of the Soul, 11 St. James Place, Chicago, Ill.

LIFE BEYOND DEATH

Being a Review of

The World's Beliefs on the Subject, a Consideration of Present Conditions of Thought and Feeling,

Leading to the Question as o Whether It Can Be Demonstrated as a Fact.—To Which Is Added an Appendix Containing Some Hints as to Personal Experiences and Opinions.

BY MINOT J. SAVAGE, D. D.

8vo, Cloth, 342 Pages.

After a review of the beliefs held in the past concerning life beyond death, Dr. Savage takes up the present conditions of belief and considers the agnostic reaction from the extreme "other-worldliness" which it replaced, which was in turn followed by the Spiritualistic reaction against agnosticism. He points out the doubts concerning the doctrine of immortality held by the churches and the weakness of the traditional creeds and the loosening of their hold upon the people. He then considers the probabilities of a future life, probabilities which, as he admits, fall short of demonstration. The volume includes a consideration of the work of the Society for Psychical Research and also an appendix giving some of the author's own personal experiences in this line. Dr. Savage holds, as a provisional hypothesis, that continued existence is demonstrated, and that there have been at least some well authenticated communications from persons in the other life. The chief contents of the volume are as follows:

Primitive Ideas—Ethnic Beliefs—The Old Testament and Immortality—Paul's Doctrine of Death and the Other Life—Jesus and Immortality—The Other World and the Middle Ages—Protestant Belief Concerning Death and the Life Beyond—The Agnostic Reaction—The Spiritualistic Reaction—The World's Condition and Needs as to Belief in Immortality—Probabilities Which Fall Short of Demonstration—The Society for Psychical Research and the Immortal Life—Possible Conditions of Another Life—Some Hints as to Personal Experiences and Opinions.

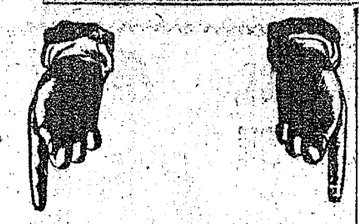
THE BEAUTIFUL SOUVENIR VOLUME,

By A. LEAH UNDERHILL,

(Of the Fox Family.)

The Missing Link in Modern Spiritualism.



Thirty-three chapters, 477 pages, superbly printed, and bound in colors and gold, 15 illustrations, 5 steel engraved portraits of the celebrated Fox Family, a full page engraving of the old house at Hydesville, which to this day, by the act of its wealthy and respected owner, Artemas Hyde, Esq., bears the inscription, "Here Spiritualism Originated in 1848."

A complete history of the initiation of the movement known as Modern Spiritualism, from the epochal period which dates from March 31, 1848. Since that day, starting from a small country village in western New York, Spiritualism has made its way against tremendous obstacles around the civilized globe.

Only a limited number of copies of this rare book, now out of print, are to be had, and these can be obtained only at this office. Those who remit at once will receive a copy, post paid, at the GREATLY REDUCED PRICE OF $1.

Note.—By failure in 1885 to complete contract with the author, a large portion of the edition was left unbound, and so remained for a number of years, when they were rescued and bound at additional cost, hence this valuable contribution to the cause of Spiritualism was not properly presented to the Spiritualistic public, and a host of investigators have not had the opportunity of securing a copy until the present time. Do not fail to send for a copy at once. J. R. FRANCIS,

DR. G. E. WATKINS,

The Noted Chronist,

Will on October 15, open his new Boston office, at 1087 Boylston street, where he will be pleased to meet all who may call between the hours of 10 a. m. and 2 p. m. The wonderful work in healing the sick that Dr. Watkins is accomplishing is indeed most astounding; his patients live to testify to his wonderful powers as a healer. For the last year his work has been most wonderful. He says himself that his cures this year have been more than ever before in numbers, as he confined himself to only 30 new patients a month. Dr. Watkins attends personally to each case, and therefore he can do better work than if he had a great many assistants; no staff of visible helpers are in his office to annoy and suggest this and that. He knows what is the trouble with each patient, and knows the right specific to give. He prepares and puts up all of his medicine, and has no help in his medical treatments that is visible help. Write him to-day, and by return mail you will receive the diagnose. No charge made for diagnosing your case. Send age, sex and leading sympton, C. E. BATH, M'gr.

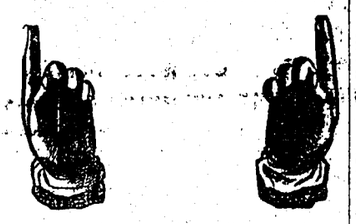
? ARE YOU SICK ?

—IF SO—

Does Your Doctor Understand Your Case?

Are You Getting Better?

If you are not getting better write today to Dr. C. E. WATKINS, Boston, Mass., and write him just your condition financially, and he will make his price for treatment within your reach. He is treating a great many cases free; others he charges a light fee.



He makes no charge whatever for Diagnosis.

If You Are Sick

Why not write him today, and no matter who has failed to help you, to consult him COSTS NOTHING.

Try DR. WATKINS.

Let him diagnose your case, and then it will help you to decide who knows best what is the matter with you. Send all letters to 1087 Boylston St., Boston, Mass.

CHRISTIAN SOCIALISM.

A Palpable Inconsistency Plainly Indicased.

Spiritualists have an abundance of sound philosophy, science and religion, all their own, so they need not borrow anything from Christianity. Socialists should "do so likewise," for they have plenty of sound ethics of their own, peculiar to their party, and can get along fairly well without alliance with Christianism. They say hard things of professed Christians and their religion. (And they tell the truth.) Then what advantage is it to claim alliance with that religion?

We can scarcely read a Socialist paper any time of year without finding in it a thrust or attack on popular religion, its principles or individual votaries. From a Socialist paper I have gathered at random the following extracts pertaining to Christianity, which show their true estimates of it:

"God of the wealthy, the pulpits breathe forth libel in thy name."

"This is that strange thing, Religion,
Write it, read it, con it well;
Whoso takes another's product
Thereby makes his bed in hell."

"Since the days of Constantine Christianity has been imprisoned in the iron-bound environment of feudalism and capitalism, both of which are necessarily prohibitive of the concrete application of the teachings. Socialism promises more than the teachings of Christianity when lived up to, because it postulates a more highly organized economic environment than the gospel calls for. The aim of Christianity is spiritual salvation only."

Socialism is a science, not a religious creed." (Then why call it Christian Socialism?)

"Christians do not practice or even preach the ethics of Christianity. If ministers had spent as much of their ability in showing the people how to arrange their earthly affairs so that harmony could prevail, as they have in picking out the points of dispute in the creeds, the millennium would long ago have been realized. Men cannot be brothers while they have conflicting personal interests, while they are competing with each other in business, in religion and politics."

"The competitive system will unmake true Christians faster than all the churches can make them. You can not teach the gospel of love from the text-book of strife. The Socialists are doing more for the kingdom of heaven on earth than all the churches put together."

We have no faults to find with the above quoted statements. They are true and meet our approval; but it does seem inconsistent for Socialists to profess alliance with Christianity and then express such sentiments. The profession is a fraud, deception, hypocrisy. How many Christians will they catch by saying "Socialism is Christianity applied?" and calling it "Christian Socialism?" Do they suppose Christians are so obtuse and stupid that they cannot see how roughly and severely they are being handled? And they justly deserve it.

Do Socialists understand what they are doing in saying "Socialism is Christianity applied," and calling it "Christian Socialism?" The fundamental doctrines of Christianity are (1) Worship of God (Jehovah). (2) Belief in Jesus, his only son, savior of sinners. (3) Salvation by faith, baptism, and church membership. (4) Vicarious blood atonement. (5) An angry God and Devil, and everlasting damnation in hell for all who do not believe and accept this gospel. Can Christian Socialism ignore these fundamental doctrines?

Spiritualist do not accept them, but deny them in toto; therefore they cannot and will not support Christian Socialism. Socialists must drop the Christian prefix or else we must drop Socialism. All we ask is that they have nothing to do with Christianity as other parties do not. Let it take care of itself; then we can give them our earnest aid and wish them victory.

We are simply trying to persuade them to correct an error—a serious mistake—for their own welfare. They may not catch many Christians, but can catch a host of Spiritualists, provided they drop Christianism.

Christian Republicanism or Christian Democracy would be no more ridiculous than Christian Socialism. Would either party consider themselves complimented or improved by such appellation? They would spurn it with indignation. They can truly say, "politics has nothing to do with religion." Is it true that "Socialism has nothing to do with a man's religion?" No; if a Socialist has any religion at all, it must be the Christian type, under the present attitude of the party.

What is called the ethics of Christianity were well known and practiced long before the Christian era; yet, standing thus associated they become "dead letters," void and of bad repute, as is shown by our extracts from the Socialist paper. All the ethical principles of the gospel are much better expressed, improved and enlarged in the ethics of Spiritualism.

ALTRUISM.

Hon. James B. Townsend's Address at Washington, D. C.

The address we published, delivered by Mr. Townsend, at the N. S. A. Convention at Washington, D. C., has attracted such wide spread attention and interest that he has concluded to run the address through a third edition, and will send free of charge for the use of societies, the number they would care to have for distribution. He writes to us as follows:

To the Editor:—The countless number of letters I am receiving in reference to my Washington address have overcome my modesty, and I therefore send you a few copies with the request that you reprint them and say for me to the officers of all Spiritualist societies that I have concluded to run the address through a third edition, and will send for the use of societies the number they would care to have for distribution.

If you will let this stand in print for two or three weeks, it will probably enable me to hear from all so desiring before I make the order for the third edition. Very truly yours,

JAMES B. TOWNSEND.

Lima, Ohio.

Mr. Townsend—Dear Sir:—I have read your admirable address before the N. S. A., at Washington, and would like several copies to distribute among my friends. When you say you have been waiting, hoping that some one would be moved to speak plainly of the necessities of the hour, you define my position exactly, but your address is so clear, so logical, so comprehensive, that it has fully covered the ground. To me it comes as a bugle call and I feel anxious to have it brought to the attention of all thinking men and women who are laboring for humanity.

W. P. CONWAY.

21 W. Baltimore St., Lynn, Mass.

Dear Sir and Brother:—I have just received the two copies of the address you delivered at Washington, D. C., before the National Association of Spiritualists, and like it very much. I think every Spiritualist and Socialist, as well as other progressive people ought to have a copy. I expected to receive quite a lot, as you say you will send any number. Please send at least twenty-five more and I will take great pleasure in distributing them where they will do good. Please send them at once. I feel that I can use fifty or one hundred. Yours, for the great cause you espouse,

J. W. RUMINER, D. M., M. D.

920 East Illinois St., Evansville, Ind.

Dear Mr. Townsend:—I may be rather tardy in writing to thank you for the magnificent address you delivered at the annual convention of the N. S. A., held recently in Washington, but I beg to assure you it was not through lack of appreciation as much as stress of public and private business that I have been silent.

I have read and re-read the address with increased satisfaction and would deem it a favor if you would send me as many copies as you can spare for circulation among the ladies and gentlemen who attend my seances. Thanking you in advance, I remain, yours very sincerely,

M. E. WILLIAMS.

204 West End Ave., New York City.

Dear Sir:—When I read your Washington speech, I said "There is a man who is on the right track." I have no interest in Spiritualism as a religion, but as a movement for the betterment of government, home and society, I am with you. I can very well place fifty copies of your pamphlet, and will see that they go to the right ones.

ALPHEUS J. WILLIAMSON.

Box 801, Spokane, Wash.

Dear Sir and Brother:—I live in a country where the light is just breaking and I think I could do a splendid work by placing a number of these copies where they would be read and thereby giving a knowledge of what we teach to those who are in the dark concerning both the phenomena and philosophy of Spiritualism. So please send me as many copies of the address as you can, and I assure you they shall be used to the best advantage. I am fraternally, N. B. YOUNG, Judge.

Gainesboro, Tenn.

Dear Brother Townsend:—Yesterday I distributed at the Auditorium, fifty copies of your address. There was more than one hundred others who asked for copies. My guides say you are to do a great work for humanity, and that, your address will make many Spiritualists, who are not, so to-day. May the highest good of all life be your blessing.

FRANK T. RIPLEY.

828 S. Burdick St., Kalamazoo, Mich.

Dear Brother:—Received the copies of the address. Have read it again with pleasure and profit. Spiritualists need it more than any one else. The message is for us and through it we are truly shown ourselves. I hope you will go on with your grand work. "Many are called, but few are chosen," applies to you. You are chosen to help lead us from our self-satisfied indifference to a fuller realization of life's duties and needs. The address is also a grand missionary document.

MARY J. STEPHENS.

402 A Street, S. E., Washington, D. C.

Dear Brother:—I read your address before the National Spiritualists' Association, and I thought then, and still think you struck the key-note, and if you will send me some to Neodesha, my next lecturing-place, I will handle them as judiciously as I know how. Most truly your brother,

Beloit, Kans. D. W. HULL.

Good News for the Afflicted.

CONSULTATION AND ADVICE ABSOLUTELY FREE.

The Renowned Dr. Peebles with His Able Staff of Assistants Has Originated a System of Psychic, Hygienic, and Medical Treatments That is Curing Thousands That Were Called Incurable.

DR. J. M. PEEBLES.

DR. PEEBLES, the Grand Old Man of Battle Creek, Michigan, so well known throughout the world as an authority on Psychic Phenomena and the application of the Psychic Science in Curing Diseases, has, with a corps of able assistants, so perfected a system of curing chronic and so-called "incurable" cases that almost every disease known to man yields promptly and permanently when placed in their hands. Do not despair if other physicians and other methods have failed in your case, for they have on file thousands of letters from patients telling of their wonderful recovery under their care after years of unsuccessful treatment from the best physicians of the world. Geo. H. Weeks, of Cleveland, O., sends heartfelt thanks for restoration to health after suffering from nervous prostration and insomnia for years; he says he now enjoys excellent health and restful sleep every night. Mrs. J. A. Rust, of Itasca, Minn., cured of uric acid poisoning in two months' treatment, writes: "I am better than in years, and each day brings new health and strength. I will refer all ailing ones to you." Mary A. Earl, Crawford, Mich., suffering from pronounced female difficulties and kidney disease, says: "I took your treatment three months and it has been a success in my case. I am indeed grateful to you for my recovery." C. E. Davis, Woodman, N. H., who suffered all the miseries of a dyspeptic, writes that as the result of Dr. Peebles' treatment, he had not missed a meal since last March. D. W. Bridgman, of Del Norte, Colo., writing Sept. 30, after a three months' course: "When I began treatment with Dr. Peebles' Institute of Health I was a cripple, unable to walk but little with a cane. Now I am able to walk with ease. Some days ten or fifteen miles. I can hardly find words to express my gratitude as I had tried everything I could hear of and got no relief."

If you are in poor health, no matter how long you have suffered or what your complaint is just write the Doctors a plain truthful letter about your condition and then will confidentially consider the same and send you FREE OF CHARGE a full diagnosis of your case, together with valuable literature, explaining fully this grand science and their wonderful methods of treatment which gives hope to all the afflicted. Special advice in your case which in itself would be worth more to you than countless sums of money, for health is above all price. DISTANCE NO BARRIER. It matters not how far you may live from them their methods will restore you, for it is an ideal home treatment that can be successfully taken in your own home without detention from your daily duties or the knowledge of anyone. The founder of this Institute spent over fifty years in study and investigation in perfecting this method, and it is, without doubt, the most wonderful and effective form of treatment ever discovered by man. IT IS A COMBINING OF THE MENTAL WITH THE PHYSICAL, THE PSYCHIC WITH THE MEDICAL AND HYGIENIC, A SYSTEM OFTEN ATTEMPTED IN THE PAST BUT NEVER BEFORE PERFECTED, ABSOLUTELY THE BEST THAT SCIENCE CAN PRODUCE is brought into your own home and at a cost within the reach of all, for the Doctors charge nothing whatever for advice and counsel and only a moderate charge to cover actual cost of remedies used in preparation of the medical part of the treatment. It is a greater pleasure to the Doctors to spread their GRAND METHOD and restore the sick and teach them how to stay cured than be possessed of great riches. If your health is poor, no matter whether you have suffered years or only a few weeks, write at once for their diagnosis of your case and literature disclosing the grandest system of treatment ever discovered. TESTIMONIALS:

Unsolicited testimonials that cost the patients only $2.00 per month for treatment are as follows:

Dr. J. S. Loucks—Dear Sir:—I have taken one month's treatment from you, and I have improved very much. I am so thankful to you for it. I can sleep now in bed, eat as much as a pig, and have gained six pounds. Before I began treatment I was a great sufferer for six years. I employed four different doctors and used all the other remedies I could. None of them did me any good. At last one of my friends advised me to try Dr. J. S. Loucks. I did so, and found great relief from those terrible fits or spasms. I am only ten years old.

Sincerely your friend, J. G. OWENS.

Dr. J. S. Loucks, Stoneham, Mass.—Dear Sir:—I will write you a few lines this evening to thank you and your Spirit band for what you have done for me. It will be four weeks to-morrow since I began to take your treatment, and I feel like a different person. When I began to use your medicines I could not raise myself off my chair after sitting down a little while. It seemed as if I had grown fast to the chair and it would pull my insides out to raise up. I would have to slide off the side of the chair or whatever I was sitting on, and it would hurt me so bad I could scarcely stand it. But now I can get up as easily as any one and it does not hurt me any more. Yours for truth. MRS. ALICE CHEESEBRO.

Woman Revealed

JUST OUT!

BY NANCY McKAY GORDON

A Message to the One Who Understands.

This is the latest revelation concerning Woman's relation to Man. The Message is as much for Man as for Woman, since it is impossible to write of Woman, the Mother of Man, without sending a message to Him. No higher word has ever been spoken on the sex problem. No greater message has ever been given to either.

You cannot afford to be without this Message.

"Woman Revealed" is a handsome volume of 152 pages. Clear print on fine laid paper, with very wide margins, beautiful initial letters. Price, $1.00. Address NANCY McKAY GORDON,

Esoteric Lessons.

An Argument Against Physical Causation.

The object of this book, considered a most excellent one by some, is to establish what is commonly regarded as purely physical health upon a purely psychical basis; to show that health is knowledge, wisdom, insight; that men suffer from so-called purely corporeal disease only because they form erroneous judgment; also, to show that the fundamental erroneous judgment is, that there is any such thing in the universe as physical causation, a belief in which leads both directly and indirectly to disease. Often directly in case of the individual, but more commonly indirectly as a race-belief held throughout the known history of mankind. This work is by Sarah Stanley Grimke. Price $1.50.

FROM INDIA TO THE PLANET MARS.

A MOST REMARKABLE WORK.

Fascinating, Interesting and Instructive.

By Th. Flournoy, Professor of Psychology in the University of Geneva.

"This is an account of the experiments with the 'Geneva Medium,' Helene Smith. In her trances she lives the dual existence of an Indian prince and of an inhabitant of the planet Mars. Professor Flournoy and his fellow scientists have for more than five years experimented with these astounding physical phenomena."

This is a work of thrilling interest. It has excited great attention in this country and in Europe. Price $1.50. For sale at this office.

INVISIBLE HELPERS

A Very Excellent and Comprehensive Work.

One from the Theosophical Standpoint.

This work, "Invisible Helpers," written by C. W. Leadbeater, the remarkable English psychic (whose lectures have graced the columns of The Progressive Thinker), is certainly very interesting and suggestive throughout. It treats of the "Universal Belief in the Invisible Helpers," the "Angel Story," "Work Among the Dead," "What Lies Beyond." The work is neatly bound in cloth, and the price is 55 cents.

THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER.

SPIRITUALISM—Progress, the Universal Law of Nature; Thought, the Solvent of Her Problems.—SPIRITUALISM

VOL. 25. CHICAGO, ILL., DEC. 28, 1901. NO. 631.

THE GOD QUESTION.

Drying Up the Colorado River.

A CRITICAL DEFENSE OF THEISTIC SPIRITUALISM—THE WONDERFUL SEER, PHILOSOPHER AND AUTHOR, ANDREW JACKSON DAVIS, DEFENDED.

Moses dried up the Jordan for a few hundred yards and a few hours; but J. S. Loveland dried up the Colorado River from end to end, and for all time, Moses was making way for the tribes of Israel; Loveland was making way for the tribes of Atheism. Brother Loveland has often posed as Moses' critic; naturally enough, therefore, he would be expected at the last to outdo Moses—and he did.

It was this way: Brother Loveland has all along given us to understand that he has no God, and needs none. This is his own affair. If he prefers a universe without governmental control, he has at least as good a right to his choice as other anarchists. But when he makes his peculiar views into a Procrustean bed for all Spiritualists, and will cut us shorter, or stretch us longer to make us fit, we have a right to object.

Brother Loveland has no respect for the authority of great names. If we quote them, he tells us, "I have a positive contempt for that style of argument." Teaching us to despise others, he still expects us to respect him. He poses as the expounder of Spiritualism, and declares that "Spiritualism affirms as a self-evident proposition that there can be no God Creator," and that it "sees nothing in the vast workings of Nature but automatic energy." Then he goes on to say, for himself perhaps, that "every prayer upon the platform is prima facie evidence that the offerer is an unbeliever in the fundamental basis of Spiritualism, or a hypocrite."

In reply, I bewilder him with a long quotation from Andrew Jackson Davis, the Prince of Spiritualists—a quotation as theistic, devout, and sublime, as ever was written. It was a part of that long, brilliant, burning chapter entitled, "God Revealed to Intellect," in Davis' book, Arabula. It showed its author "wandering in the gloom of skepticism, till finally converted one summer evening by a five-petaled flower, which he plucked while reclining on the banks of "the crystal Colorado of Texas."

Since "true Spiritualists," according to Brother Loveland, care nothing for authority, it obviously could make no difference to anybody what Davis says, or what Loveland thinks; and yet Brother Loveland, after worrying some weeks under the burden of a quotation so diametrically opposed to his own views, at last rushed into print with a view to being relieved of that burden. But, who would have thought it? He denied the authority for the quotation; said Davis never wrote it; said it was not his style; said that he was "not equal to such a mathematical argument;" said that he never could have had the soul experience which he claimed; said that he never was in Texas; said that he had been "intimate with Brother Davis for years;" that they had often talked togeher about God, and that Mr. Davis "had never never intimated the slightest criticism against Atheism."

Then I wrote again, quoting Mr. Davis, and giving, so to speak, chapter and verse, and his positive and direct statement in his own words that he was the author of the wonderful chapter, and that the argument was framed by himself, with no more than the usual indebtedness of one writer to others.

But whether Mr. Davis actually wrote the chapter is obviously of no concern so long as he fathers it and makes its sentiments his own. This he does, not only by printing it in his book without credit to any other, but by a distinct avowal that he wrote it, and that after the fullest consideration he believed the argument to be impregnable. Thus the weightiest name in Spiritualism is given with tremendous emphasis to Theism as against Atheism, and Brother Loveland knows it and feels it. Does the "true Spiritualist, then, of whom Brother Loveland prates so dogmatically, stand in this matter with Brother Davis or with Brother Loveland?—that was the question. I was a novice—was confused amid the jargon of tongues, and wanted to know "where I was at." Brother Loveland felt the necessity of annihilating the authority of Davis if he would preserve his own; and it has been shown just how he did it. He belittled the intellect of his friend; belittled the attainments of his friend; impeached the veracity of his friend as to matter of fact; denied his soul experience, as stated by himself; and presented him as an unblushing plagiarist, who could steal another man's thunder, and then cheekily declare that he didn't steal it. Finally, with his customary inconsistency, after giving Mr. Davis such a character, he proceeds to proclaim him the "greatest man of the nineteenth century."

And now comes Brother Loveland again in No. 626 og The Progressive Thinker, reiterates and even expands his former statements, maugre Davis and his book, and triumphantly proves that the chapter from which my quotation was taken was not written by Davis at all, no matter if Davis does say so, and print the chapter in his book; but by some unknown romancer, "undoubtedly some excitable scholar, whose nervousness got the better of his judgment," because—"he that hath ears to hear, let him"—because, forsooth, there is no Colorado River in Texas. Hear him:

"I will now say that I know, and Brother McFarland knows, and every American, not an ignoramus, knows, that A. J. Davis was never in Texas, lying on the bank of the beautiful Colorado, reading Plato, watching the Rockies, meditating on the God question, and suddenly converted by a Texas flower and Plato's "God geometrizes," for the simple reason that the Colorado River is not in Texas, but out here in California and Arizona mainly, though some of its affluents come from other states. But the story is a very pretty romance to preface the sterner mathematical work of the article, and would have more effect upon some minds than the article itself."

Thus speaks Brother Loveland—Brother Loveland, who hesitates not to call down every man of the past or the present, no matter what his intelligence or attainments, who has believed in a God, or in the Bible; and who has called down not only Moses, but Jesus Christ—and in speaking, he unconsciously gives an excellent example of just how much he knows about facts, and how he verifies them. Did he suppose that Davis, or anybody else, even if he were romancing, would be such a fool as to invent a Texas river, when nature has made plenty of them, and thus belie geography? We do not blame Brother Loveland for having forgotten his geography, as he has forgotten his God; but with a plain pointer about the "crystal Colorado of Texas," why did he not, before making himself ridiculous in print, and that for the express purpose of proving his friend false, consult a map, or ask the nearest schoolboy? It would have been the labor of but five minutes or less. He would have found that this country is broad enough for two Colorado rivers; one flowing into the Gulf of California; the other rising in central Texas and flowing southeast into the Gulf of Mexico, at Matagorda. But we presume he did not consult a map, because, being a "true Spiritualist," he is not bound by authority; and if he should yet treat the authority of the map as he has treated the authority of Mr. Davis, he would, for once at least, be consistent. He speaks freely of ignoramuses, and it is obvious that there are some. Let the readers of The Progressive Thinker mark them, and look for light only to those who ascertain their facts carefully, and then derive their conclusions logically. Beware of the man who goes forth with the lofty conceit that he alone has attained the truth which the mightiest intellects of the past or the present have been unable to find. Be pretty sure that the man who hears nothing but asses in all directions is simply deceived by his own incessant bray.

It is painful to write such things, but it ought to be done. The purpose is not to humiliate a brother, but to exalt the truth. It is right that readers should mark the mental habit that leads to Atheism, and proclaims it. The capital objection to Atheism is that it is unreasonable. Hence, speaking of the Atheist, one of our poets wrote:

"Hell's madhouses are full of such, too fierce Too furiously insane, to rage unbound,
'Mong evil spirits damned."

Among the writers of The Progressive Thinker, Brother Loveland is the lion of his tribe. He shows himself one of the best informed, one of the most careful as to his facts, one of the soundest as to his inferences. It was precisely for this reason that he ought to be selected for just and needed castigation. What we have seen of him in connection with Brother Davis, the Colorado River, etc., is a fair sample of his facts and his conclusions. And if such be the showing of the most careful of these skeptics and iconoclasts, what ought to be said of the worst?

The present writer does not know a great deal about God, but he believes there is one. He will not deny the existence of the ocean because he cannot put it into a pint cup. Brother Loveland says that this writer is an Atheist, as well as himself; in this he is probably as reliable as he is about Brother Davis or the Colorado River. The Cause that kindled the fires of central suns, swung planets on their orbits, populated worlds with the infinitely varied forms of animal and vegetable life, and evolved mentality in all its varied phases, from the instinct of the bee to the reason of a Leibnitz or a LaPlace, must be farther above me than I am above a beetle. And yet the beetle, which cannot understand me, will not deny my existence, nor refuse to mark where I am going, and keep out of my way if it can.

Brother Loveland is struck with the automatism of Nature, and thinks the bee a fine example. But who made the automaton? Did Brother Loveland ever see or hear of an artificial automaton, from the gilded beetle crawling on the sidewalk and sold by the street man, to Ajeed the chess-player, that was not the product of an independent intelligence that constructed it? Wonderful reasoner is Brother Loveland. Why doesn't he tell us that the gilded beetle made itself, or else always existed?

Brother Loveland says that Spiritualism affirms there can be no God Creator. Spiritualism affirms nothing of the sort. All the seances that were ever held have not shed a ray of light on the God question. Atheism is not born of Spiritualism; it is imported by designing men. What possible relation can spirit communion have to the being of a God?

I have not discussed the attributes of a God—involving personality and what not—with Brother Loveland, and will not. Davis was right when he would not discuss the matter with anybody "who is not acquainted with algebra, geometry, and the strict rules of logic." For a brief, but most admirable discussion of the subject, I cheerfully refer Brother Loveland to the sermon of the Rev. Minot J. Savage, in No. 624 of The Progressive Thinker. I have not yet appeared as the defender of the Bible, or its God, or of any God. If these are not able to take care of themselves, let them die. I simply protest against the miserable travesty of fact and reason that would array Spiritualism against either. When misconceptions of God, of the Bible, and of Spiritualism are all corrected, we may find them a loving trinity.

The Progressive Thinker does well in allowing all to speak. It is well that Spiritualism should know the diversity of children that call her mother. Men may be perfectly agreed as to spirit survival and return, and yet be wider asunder than the poles on matters of far greater moment than communication between the dead and the living. It is absurd to suppose that the heterogeneous elements which compose Spiritualism to-day will ever be all welded together to one really valuable end.

Brother Loveland reminds us that, anyhow, Davis is now a dethroned king. He says that "many years ago a large per cent of Spiritualists substantially excommunicated Brother Davis from the spiritual fold." Yes; Brother Davis has long been in retirement, as are thousands of others, the best and brightest men that have ever honored Spiritualism with their faith. Some of these are hardly more than a stone's throw from where I write; and why are they in retirement, pray? Who practically excommunicated them? The answer is, the Atheists and iconoclasts who have been in the saddle for fifty years. These are the cuckoos that have shouldered better birds out of the nest, until the best representatives of Spiritualism don't "know where they are at."

It is said that when the children of Israel came out of Egypt, there went up with them "a mixed multitude." These were merely malcontents—Egyptians, probably for the most part—with little concern either for Moses or his God, but ready for adventure in the hope of betterment. They were a constant element of disturbance. In dark days when food was wanting, or when enemies were in front of them, these sighed for the flesh-pots of Egypt, and murmured against God and against Moses. They wanted to return to the land from whence they came. They stirred up the people, and brought down upon them the wrath of heaven. What ultimately became of this miserable throng is not certainly known, but it has been maintained with much plausibility that they were the ancestors of the gypsies of to-day. Without principles, without God, without a leader, without organization, they have wandered for three thousand years, child-stealers, fortune-tellers, hen-roost robbers, the plague of all lands. The children of Israel on the other hand, had an organization however loose, they had a leader, they had a God. Slowly through the centuries they developed into a people that has marked the world with its presence and influence as no other people ever did; and none to-day have so few representatives in almshouses, jails or prisons. They counted in their line a Joshua, a David, a Solomon, an Isaiah, a Jesus of Nazareth.

Two years after they left Egypt the children of Israel were encamped on the borders of the Promised Land. For listening to the "mixed multitude" that was among them, they turned, and wandered in the wilderness forty years, till every faithless coward who came out of Egypt was dead, and a new generation stood up, with courage and confidence to cross over Jordan. Be the story a myth or a history, it illustrates.

From the time that Spiritualism began to ascend out of the modern moral Egypt, it has been cursed by the presence of a mixed multitude of fakirs, fortune-tellers, fortune-seekers, Bible-haters, Atheizers, and iconoclasts; and for giving place to them and their teaching, it has turned back from the triumph which early seemed just before it and has wandered in the wilderness fifty years; and even now it is debating whether it is nearer the Promised Land than it was forty years ago. Like Ishmael, whose hand was to be against every man, and every man's hand against him, it has gone about to assault and overturn and smash about everything that men have been ages in building, and which they esteem venerable and sacred. Brother Loveland has been identified with the movement almost from the beginning, and is a favorable representative of the influences that have been largely dominant; and what is the result? Spiritualism as it is to-day—no organization, except against his protest; no liberality, no schools, no temples, no power to protect mediums against unjust laws, no power to suppress frauds, no hospitals, no orphans' homes, no influence in legislation, great talkers, little doers. And why? Because we are not conscious of anything in particular to do for. If my neighbor thinks I am a fool for telling him that he may, if he likes, talk with his dead grandmother, how much money ought I to give, how much sacrifice ought I to make to convert him? If I saw him "hair-hung and breeze-shaken" over "the yawning gulf of hell," and did not bestir myself to save him, I would be unworthy the name of a man; but why should I incur obloquy, give money, build temples, or support teachers to show him that he may talk with his grandmother, and this, when I know he is going to be saved, whether he talks with her or not?

And what is the remedy for these things? It lies in organization, and in nothing else. Spiritualism must organize before it can do anything or control anything. But if it have an organization, it must have a creed; for no organization ever existed without a creed, or ever will. A fire company has a creed—a creed numbering several articles—that fire will burn; that it breaks out in undesired places; that water puts out fire; that men may put on water; that they can do it better in concert than singly; that a machine is needed—and so on. But when Spiritualism organizes, its creed must consist of more articles than the return of spirits—absolutely the only common bond of Spiritualists to-day.

The creed will have to embrace the existence of a God; otherwise, Spiritualism is not a religion. A religion without a God is a misnomer. There might be a cult without a God, but never a religion. It is pitiful to hear Spiritualists talking about their religion, and then telling us in the same breath that neither Jehovah nor any other God is the object of their regard or their worship. If any don't like the God of the Jews or of the Christians, why don't they make a better one? How much better off will the mass of men be if they have none at all?

The N. S. A. is moving slowly and with difficulty in the right direction. It recognizes an Infinite Intelligence; it opens its deliberations with prayer—let us support it. What a power Spiritualism combined with the teachings of Jesus of Nazareth may yet become! Surely the combination is possible. It would exalt Spiritualism; it would restore to Christianity the day of Pentecost.

What did Atheism ever do for men? What did it organize? What nation or what community was bettered by its presence? Anyhow, men will not have it; of that we may be well assured. Spiritualism without a God is doomed.

Mrs. Eddy was a Spiritualist, but she kept her God. She builds costly, sensible, beautiful temples—several of them in Chicago—and fills them with worshipers; while Spiritualism, in half dozens, is paying twenty-five cents a head to see a seance. The one has a God, however incomprehensible; the other doesn't know what it has nor "where it is at."

Yet Spiritualism will hardly die. It cannot while honest mediumship remains. And there are honest mediums, many of them, just as in Elijah's day there were seven thousand who had not bowed the knee to Baal. It is they that have been guarding and carrying the ark of the covenant these fifty years. Sadly handicapped as they have been, they have kept the door of the Holy of Holies, with its beaming Shekinah between the cherubim. Poorly paid, too often broken in health, evil spoken of, persecuted, hailed before judges, they have given up their lives by inches, that the loving and the loved might talk with those they deemed lost because held in the hard grip of the grave. And thousands have come and seen and felt. Their eyes have not down with tears, and their bodies have been shaken with emotion; angels have been heard singing with mortals, and spirits of loved ones, like phosphoric lamps, have hovered in the air. And from these quiet gatherings, mostly in the shadows of evening, men have gone forth, marked for life. They will carry forever the evidence of their senses, that the dead are yet alive, and talk with the living, as Jesus talked to his disciples in that upper chamber a week after his resurrection. In spite of conscienceless frauds, in spite of Atheism, in spite of fools who think that vinegar catches flies, these worn and weary women push on the work. The leaven slowly leavens the lump; and the signs increase of a day when Spiritualism will organize and appropriate Christianity, or organized Christianity will appropriate Spiritualism. So mote it be. Amen. J. YOUNG McFARLAND.

A VISION.

And Queries Concerning the Same.

While visiting a friend, Mrs. Dr. Walz, of Joplin, Mo., I received the following remarkable vision. A music-box was playing and the sweet strains seemed to have a hypnotic effect upon me, placing me in a deep sleep or trance. During this sleep the vision came and is given here as near as I can remember it.

The music sounded different from any I ever heard before. I seemed to be borne along on the current of sound. I ascended a square tower, conical-shaped at the top. I was met by a gentleman and lady. They extended their hands and assisted me into the tower, saying: "We welcome you to annals of this new life." The gentleman gave me a book, saying, "You must register." I hesitated, I tried to think, I had forgotten my name, my mortal mind seemed to have left me. He smiled and said, "Register as Dean the Second." I did so, wondering who Dean the Second might be. He then gave me a picture of Christ and the Virgin Mary, about 3 by 5 inches. The margin of the frame was ornamented with holly leaves and berries. This picture I was told to take with me on a journey which was before me.

The man who welcomed me was tall and dark, and wore a flowing robe, a cloth turban encircled his head. The lady was light, dressed in pure white robes. The two acted as my guides on the journey I took through space. The gentleman called for ethereal floats. Two appeared, one blue, about a yard square. I was ordered to step into this one. I did so. They stepped into the other one. This one was pure white, about six feet square. The two stepped to theirs and began forming it into a skiff; when formed to their satisfaction they stepped into it and we floated out into space. We met many like ourselves, navigating space, each with a float. Sometimes there were two or three in one float. The floats were shaped to suit the taste of the individuals who were in them. Some like skiffs, sleigh beds, diamonds, leaves and baskets. Mine remained square and I did not fancy it, and so expressed myself. The guides reached out and drew a cloud to me. I shaped the cloud into a large maple leaf. The leaf was shaded from white in the center to a deep yellow at the margin. I obeyed the guide and stepped into the leaf.

I now desired to know more of the infinite, and said to my guides, "Where is God?" He answered, "You are God." I said, "O no." Then he pointed to the sun, which seemed very near to us, but was covered by a white ethereal cloud, shaded from a purple to a light blue, so that it did not distress the eyes to look at it. He said, "That light and you are all the God there is, and this is as near as we ever get to the light, or God."

We floated back to the tower from which we started. As we stepped from our floats, the guide said to me, "Now, as you are registered, you will touch the picture and leave it with us until you come again. Then I will remove the covering from my head, and then you will know who I am."

I felt myself slipping back to earth, and with a sigh I awakened. The music-box was still playing, and my friend, Mrs. Malz, was anxiously watching by my side.

Can anyone give me the interpretation of the vision, or why I should register as Dean the Second? Who was Dean the First, and what was his mission?

A GOOD PROJECT.

Endowment Fund for the Veteran Spiritualists' Union.

Dear readers:—Below we reprint a proposition made in a former issue of the Banner of Light, and a statement from the hand of the president of the V. S. U., which appeared some months ago.

By carefully reading these articles you will comprehend the situation.

In a few days many of you will receive a coupon letter which is the working plan evolved to combine the offerings small and great for this crying need. If the Spiritualists of America will treat this opportunity with care and prompt responses as they are able, we believe the Union will soon be in working order. If anyone reading this feels willing to start a letter, kindly write Harrison D. Barrett, Lock Box 183, Back Bay P. O., Boston., volunteering this service instead of waiting for a letter to reach you through another. In this way you will speed the work.

The trustees of the fund are: Harrison D. Barrett, Boston; Dr. B. F. Austin, B. A., Toronto, Canada; Mrs. Minnie M. Soule, Somerville, Mass.; Geo. W. Kates, Philadelphia, Pa., and Irving F. Symonds, Boston.

THE V. S. U.

This is Number One of Vol. XC. It is fitting that the initial number of this volume should usher in a practical work.

We are impressed with the idea from the numerous letters that we are constantly receiving from all sections of the country that the immediate duty of the Spiritualists is to make possible the opening of the Home at Waverly. Elderly Spiritualists, with small means, are desirous of spending their remaining years with those of their own faith. Mediums and Spiritualists who are wholly without means, with no place that they can call home, are in need of a place of refuge. This can be found for all classes at Waverly, provided it is opened to the public. It will require but little to make this Home available, so far as each individual is concerned. It only requires a little thought put into practical application.

The Veterans' Union is an international institution and knows no state nor national lines in its treatment of the needy. The N. S. A. has a home of its own, and a small endowment fund. This is highly meritorious, and we hope that the increase will be abundant as the days pass by. The N. S. A. will look out for missionary work, the defense and protection of our cause from its enemies. But the V. S. U. is organized for the special work of caring for the sick and needy. It is occupying a field of its own, and its noble purpose should recommend itself to every charitable soul in the land. We, therefore, appeal to the Spiritualists of America to interest themselves in the unselfish efforts of the V. S. U. to care for our own people.

Letters are before us telling of poverty, sickness and suffering of our aged mediums and Spiritualists. Several of them are already in almshouses. This is a shame to Spiritualists and to Spiritualism that it is so. It behooves us to remove this disgrace from the fair escutcheon of our beloved cause. WE MUST CARE FOR OUR OWN! No longer should they be permitted to suffer privation and want for sympathy. We have people of means in our ranks who can help us. We ask them to open their hearts and purses at this critical juncture that the Home of the V. S. U. may be made available to the needy of our land at an early date. The Banner of Light henceforth will labor earnestly in behalf of this philanthropic work. We feel that personalities, jealousies and bickerings should and must be laid aside for the sake of our common humanity.

To that end we propose to establish a Banner of Light Endowment Fund for the V. S. U. and pledge ourselves to contribute thereto the sum of $500 as an index of our good faith. We say again our own people must be cared for. There is no time to lose in view of the suffering now known to us. We ask our friends throughout the world to join us in this work. Who will help us? Is not the time ripe for action? Shall the cries of the needy ones of our faith, now in the poor-houses of the land, pass unheeded by? Shall we escape condemnation if we refuse to aid our own?

We purpose making the fund named a trust fund; the income from which only shall be used and that income devoted solely to caring for the indigent worthy Spiritualists and liberalists throughout the world. By establishing this fund, the Home can be opened, the needy cared for, and the officers of the Union enabled to devote themselves exclusively to the work of raising the mortgage now on the Home. They may be able to find a location of greater value, and by so doing dispose of the Waverly Home to advantage. But that is of the future; the Home can be made immediately available if the Spiritualists will but act together. Now is the time to look out for our own! Who will join us in this work? Let us hear from our humanitarian friends in all sections of America. This fund should be raised at once. A few hundred dollars from one hundred persons will make it possible for the Union to do its work. Let us take hold of this task with a will. Let us hear from our noble-hearted philanthropists with generous pledges to our Endowment Fund. Whose name shall we place next to that of the Banner of Light as a donor to this splendid, practical charity? Speak up, ye lovers of humanity, and fill this fund at once.

TO THE SPIRITUALISTS OF THE WORLD.

Feeling it is due to the friends of the Veterm Spiritualists' Union and other loyal Spiritualists to acquaint them with the conditions of the organization existing to-day, I respectfully submit the following as an exact account, as I see it:

As is pretty generally known, the purpose of the Union is practical service on the lines of philanthropic effort in behalf of servants in the cause of Spiritualism. Excepting addresses by capable speakers and evidences through reliable mediums on anniversary occasions and special camp days; Sunday services at the Waverly Home, during the open season; distribution of carefully selected literature pertaining to vital issues in our religion, the energy of the Union is devoted to the relief of carefully investigated cases of need among our own. For some purposes of consultation the working board of directors is composed of people within reach of Boston, but the ministrations of the organization are by no means limited to New England even, as is evidenced by the assistance that has been rendered all over the United States and with our Canadian friends now joining us, the arbitrary line of state government will not be recognized in our errand of mercy.

Some years ago, the Union instructed its officers to purchase the Waverly property now owned by the Union. It consists of a house with modern equipments, as at present constituted, capable of entertaining about twenty-five persons, and upwards of two acres of land in grove and tillage, well situated for building purposes. It was hoped the Spiritualistic world, out of its gratitude for the service of Spiritualism in bringing us freedom, would so generously respond to the calls for funds that it would be possible to open here a home to care for workers disabled and needy from service in the cause, or for those temporarily in need of retirement for recuperation. There have never been sufficient funds furnished to make this possible. For the past few years the officers of the Union have devoted their energies to caring for interests vested in the property, and with no sinking fund by which the work of carrying on a home was possible, their efforts have resulted in little more than guarding the equity. There are two mortgages on the property, one to the amount of five thousand ($5,000) and another for about twenty-three hundred ($2,300) dollars, with no interest due. The property is probably worth from $15,000 to $18,000, in a bright real estate market. To-day there is no demand for it. While the expense of carrying the place is now a burden on the Union, if we had funds to use it as a home this expense would not be excessive rent for such purposes.

Whatever my successors may think about the advisability of having a place as available at a less cost elsewhere, the present conditions demand we carry the property until our equity can be released through sale at a proper price. As the property is available for uses of a home, the only practical solution of the problem that appears is to raise funds of sufficient strength to enable us to utilize the property for this purpose—transferring from this to a less expensive property as we are able, if this seems best. There has been pledged by a friend of th Union $2,500 for the cancellation of the $2,300 mortgage, when the home is in practical operation. It is for us, dear readers, to determine when I shall call on the gentleman for the money with which to cancel the mortgage.

Let it be clearly understood there is no salaried office in connection with the Union, and all handling the funds of the organization (in excess of one hundred dollars) provide suitable bonds. There are no debts against the Union other than the mortgages against the real estate as referred to above. I make this frank statement of the situation, dear friends, as I see it, feeling it is your due. Now go apart and sit face to face with your blessings under the ministration of Spiritualism and ask what you can give to the servants of this truth.

Since preparing this paper for the press, the Banner of Light Publishing Company has made what seems to me a most practical proposition, which I heartily endorse as president of the Union. There must be a sinking fund before any board of Directors can undertake the responsibility of permanent obligations. This fund must be kept intact, so its income can be depended upon by the trustees in making their estimates for the year. This, as I understand by the editorial proposition of the Banner (August 31, 1901), is what "The Banner of Light Fund" is. With this working fund before you, there would seem to be no excuse behind which you can hide your contributions—as only the income is to be used, and that for actual care of the needy. As an officer of the Union, I should not expect, under the terms of the trust, to use the income to defray the expenses of the Waverly property. Your contributions then to this fund will be devoted to the immediate purpose for which the Union was established—caring for the needy workers of worth, in the cause of Spiritualism, our indebtedness to whom no man can estimate.

IRVING F. SYMONDS,
President of the Veteran Spiritualists' Union, 204 Dartmouth St., Boston.

Considering how fiercely I have been attacked by the orthodox, it seems ludicrous that I once intended to be a clergyman. Nor was this intention and my father's wish ever formally given up, but died a natural death when, on leaving Cambridge, I joined the Beagle as naturalist. If the phrenologists are to be trusted, I was well fitted in one respect to be a clergyman. A few years ago the secretary of a German psychological society asked me earnestly by letter for a photograph of myself, and some time afterward I received the proceedings of one of the meetings, in which it seemed that the shape of my head had been the subject of a public discussion, and one of the speakers declared that I had the bump of reverence developed enough for ten priests.—Charles Darwin.

A PERTINENT INQUIRY.

A Letter Addressed to the University of Pennsylvania.

Fort Wayne, Ind., Sept. 20, 1901.

To the President and Officers of the University of Pennsylvania:

Gentlemen:—To the University of Pennsylvania was bequeathed by the late Henry Seybert, the sum of sixty thousand dollars for the purpose of investigating:

"All systems of morals, religion or philosophy which assume to represent the truth, and particularly of Modern Spiritualism."

You accordingly appointed a commission composed of the following gentlemen, well known to the medical profession: Dr. Wm. Pepper, Dr. Joseph Leidy, Dr. Geo. A. Koenig, Prof. R. E. Thompson, Prof. Geo. S. Fullerton and Dr. Howard Furness; later there were added to it the names of Mr. Coleman Sellers, Dr. J. W. White, Dr. Calvin B. Kerr and Dr. S. Weir Mitchell.

Your commission made a report, now about fourteen years ago, a copy of which I have before me. In it is written:

"The commission is composed of men whose days are already filled with duties which cannot be laid aside, and who are able, therefore, to devote but a small portion of their time to these investigations."

The general tenor of this report is emphatically in accord with this acknowledgement of insufficient time to make a proper investigation of Modern Spiritualism, being for the most part devoted to the ridicule thereof and to the positive or implied denial of the truth of its phenomena.

Since this report was given to the public the scientific investigation of Modern Spiritualism has been going on with results directly opposed to it. Professors Hodgson, Hyslop, James, Coues, Gibier, Flammarion, Crookes, Wallace and others have satisfied themselves of the truth of Modern Spiritualism. Even scientists opposed to Modern Spiritualism acknowledge the truth of its phenomena, as may be seen on page 206 of Prof. T. Jay Hudson's book on "The Law of Psychic Phenomena," recently published. Mr. Hudson writes as follows:

"But I do undertake to say, and will attempt to prove, that the phenomena of Spiritualism, so-called, do not constitute valid evidence of the ability of spirits of the dead to hold intercourse with the living. In doing so no attempt will be made to deny the phenomena of Spiritualism. On the contrary, I shall not only admit the possibility of every phenomenon alleged by any respectable number of reputable witnesses to have occurred, but I shall also assume the substantial accuracy of the general statements made by Spiritualists regarding the leading phenomena of Spiritualism. But I shall attempt to explain their origin on other grounds than the supposition that they are caused by the spirits of the dead. In other words, I admit the alleged phenomena, but deny the alleged cause.

"I will not waste time, however, by attempting to prove by experiments of my own, or of others, that such phenomena do occur. It is too late for that. The facts are too well known to the civilized world to require proofs at this time. The man who denies the phenomena of Spiritualism to-day is not entitled to be called a skeptic; he is simply ignorant; and it would be a hopeless task to enlighten him."

In view of the foregoing, then, and much similar matter which might be added, would it be asking too much of the University of Pennsylvania to appoint another commission for another and more careful investigation of the claims of Modern Spiritualism, or has the appropriation by Mr. Seybert of sixty thousand dollars been exhausted in the only investigation you have made, fourteen years ago, and which you tacitly admit, as already quoted, was not sufficiently thorough?

Hoping that you will be sufficiently interested in the scientific aspect of this question to give it your further attention, I remain

Yours for the truth of the subject,
H. V. SWERINGEN.

AN INVOCATION.

Fount of all life and being,
Light of revolving orbs,
Whose breath through space proceeding,
Each human soul absorbs—

God of the brook and ocean,
Lord of the star and lea,
In humble, meek devotion
This boon we ask of Thee:

Oh! let new light and wisdom
Fill all our hearts to-day,
That, seeking for Thy Kingdom,
We may work, as well as pray.

Let that divine compassion
Which deeds alone express,
Give to each thought and passion
A loving tenderness.

Help us to rise in feeling
Above earth's cumbrous clod,
Through faith in Thy revealings,
Oh, God! our father's God.

Help us to feel our weakness,
And Thy sustaining power,
That we, in loving service,
May praise Thee every hour.

We ask Thee not to alter
One fraction of Thy will,
But when our footsteps falter,
We crave Thy guidance still.

(Bereft of all earth's treasure,)
We kiss the crown or rod;
Work with us, Thy loving pleasure,
Oh, God! our father's God.

And oh! if there be any
Who with hate our steps pursue,
Father divine, forgive them,
"They know not what they do."

THE GREATEST DEBATE WITHIN A HALF CENTURY UPON MODERN SPIRITUALISM

DISPUTANTS:

REV. MOSES HULL,

President New York State Spiritualists' Association, Headquarters, Buffalo, N. Y.

—AND—

W. F. JAMIESON,

Secretary National Liberal League, Headquarters, Cincinnati, Ohio.

PROPOSITION:

Resolved, That the phenomena and philosophy of Modern Spiritualism prove that departed spirits can communicate with mankind.

MR. JAMIESON'S FOURTH SPEECH.

(Eighth Address of the Debate.)

This closes the first proposition for the present. To-morrow night I am to take the laboring oar, and my friend Hull will "sauce back." He is better at that than making "arguments."

I will leave my analysis of his speech until after I present some considerations on mediumship.

I take great pleasure in announcing to this audience that one of the most distinguished Spiritualists in the United States, indeed I may say the most famous in the world, a gentleman who has thrice circumnavigated the globe, honors us by his presence in this debate. He is over eighty years of age, looking as young as most men at sixty, as straight as an arrow, still vigorous, mind as clear as crystal, Dr. J. M. Peebles, of Battle Creek, Michigan, whom I thought, forty-five years ago, when I first knew him, was the handsomest man I ever saw—

Mr. Hull.—That was before you saw me! [Laughter.]

Mr. Jamieson.—Yes, sure enough, but the Doctor knows more. Doctor, please arise and let the people see you. [The Doctor arose and gracefully bowed his acknowledgments amid applause.]

Do the phenomena and philosophy of Spiritualism prove that man exists and communicates with mankind after death? Spiritualists do not hesitate to declare that the church failed to prove the existence of mankind beyond the grave. The Progressive Thinker, Chicago Ill., an able Spiritualist journal, says, "The church will secretly retire to the dark caverns in which they and its reputed founder had birth. A long good-bye to their rattling, flapping, worthless wings."—Feb. 16, 1901.

I retort, It is modern Spiritualism which "secretly retires to dark caverns" where it has not even rattling, worthless wings to flap! Take Spiritualism out of its dark circles and dark cabinets; expose it to the searching light of day, and you kill it.

Says E. J. Schellhous, Spring Hill, Kansas: "The fact of spirit phenomena is established beyond all doubt. Then why speculate and theorize, hold conventions and discuss these phenomena and arrive at different conclusions?" "We want no 'faith,' no 'cults,' no 'believes' in Spiritualism. If it is true, let us have the truth and abide by it. Belief, opinion, dogma will not do."

He wants a spiritual despotism.

Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond says, "there was no open communion considered possible" until the advent of Spiritualism fifty years ago, only a "general hope," she says, existed. But she admits that "great doubt" still exists "concerning that existence," the spiritual, not only among "partially agnostic and materialistic," but "even among church members."

This is the condition of the world after more than half a century of Spiritualism, which gives us no more light upon the existence of a spirit world, and its inhabitants, than the race has obtained in a thousand years.

Says Moses Hull: "Science is exact knowledge It professes to have no knowledge on the question on which we are seeking light. [Immortality.] Science takes hold of physical things—nothing else." "The result is that scientific men are either materialistic or agnostic."

That is a confession that Spiritualism is only a "faith," after all. Science, in its sweep of the heavens, he confesses, has made no discovery of a spirit, or of a spirit world.

I have no prejudice against Spiritualism. If it were a truth I would be glad to accept it—to accept any truth. Spiritualists have ransacked history to show that the early Christians maintained that "pious frauds" were proof of genuine Christianity. The Spiritualist of to-day, equally sophistical, asserts that lies prove the truth. I gave up mediumship because I found that what I supposed to be my "spirit controls" endorsed mediums for physical manifestations who were demonstrated to be frauds. There was no denying it. I was compelled to admit that they were frauds. They not only confessed it, but proved it. You say they were counterfeits, and do not prove that there are no genuine. I have hunted for thirty years to find one genuine spirit, and failed to get one. Mediumship, as a foundation for any movement, is a sandy foundation. Even my friend Hull has said that he would not give up Spiritualism if every medium were proved to be a rogue. This shows that Moses Hull himself feels that mediumship is a broken reed.

He builds his Spiritualism on higher, more solid ground than mediumship, as he admitted in our Clinton debate. Then why should he not abandon the defense of mediumship? In that debate he said: "If Spiritualism is a delusion, it is a charming delusion," and he hoped he never would "live long enough to find it out."

When spirits can come back and talk to us like intellectual beings, face to face, then it will become a world-wide philosophy worthy of the confidence of mankind. But at present it is associated in the public mind, as well as among scientists, as Mr. Hull said, with jugglery. I would like to have time to treat upon spiritual jugglers and unspiritual jugglers; Spiritualism and Mesmerism, and the explanation which Christian Science gives of Spiritualism; also the bubbles, delusions, mania which have swept millions of the race into a maelstrom of misery.

My opponent asks how I account for this and that phenomenon—and asks why I do not notice them. Some of them are said to have occurred far back in the past—said to have occurred; but who witnessed them? Were they critically tested by scientific men? Nothing of the kind. Such alleged phenomena were hardly worth a notice. And, then, I do not pretend to account for every phenomenon occurring in daily life. I cannot account for my heart's beating when I am sound asleep, but because I cannot account for it is no proof that spirits, or even my own spirit, causes the beating. Superstitious people get the habit of laying everything to spirits. Barbarians believe that their shadows are spirits, and Spiritualists can see ghosts when the clear-headed investigator sees nothing.

Though my opponent has talked about the return of departed spirits he has utterly failed to prove that they are spirits. Many of them when controlling act more like devils. Others act like Madame Blavatsky's elementaries; others still conduct themselves like fabled gnomes, sylphs, and satyrs sucking the vital forces of mediums—vampires.

Brother Hull has miserably failed to tell us what spirits are, what they are composed of, how they live, how they move, whether they progress or retrograde; and how could he, for they "exist and nothing more"—what a pitiable plight he has put himself in! I extend to him a brother's pity and sympathy and exhort him to leave these superstitions, old wives' fables and devote his life to some reformatory work making a heaven for people here and now with no reference to a dreamy futurity.

John McQueen, the famous Michigan medium, whose dark circle musical manifestations converted or confirmed, thousands in the belief that spirits rang sixteen bells simultaneously, keeping perfect time with a violin played by earthly musician outside of a large circle of men and women. We never paused to ask why the spirits did not themselves play the violin!

For five years Mr. McQueen successfully played the role of medium; sometimes suspected, and occasionally caught in trickery; fairly discovered at Kalamazoo, Michigan, in the very act of standing on a table holding a chair in his hands scraping it against a high ceiling, when it was assumed the medium was carried up bodily by powerful Indian spirits. Tin milk pans were often carried around the room, grotesquely inverted on the heads of sitters, to the great amusement of the entire company, when the light was called for. The dwellers of the spirit land were supposed to be the manipulators of the pans. It was not dignified employment, but strikingly convincing! The denizens of the higher life thus indicated their condescension in leaving their bright homes to visit a world such as this, and prove their presence in thick darkness.

I look back upon those times and am amazed that I ever accepted such demonstrations as proof that when a man dies he lives!

I was then as my friend Hull is now. When McQueen revealed his imposition Spiritualists refused to accept his confession, averring that if he lied in one instance he was not to be believed in another. True enough, but it misses the point. McQueen acknowledged that his word was worthless. He showed, item by item, how he had deceived the Spiritualists for years. When he rang two bells I bluntly told him it was a poor imitation. He then rang four bells. Of course, the imitation was rather better. When he placed the handles of three bells between his fingers, thus [illustrating], three bells in each hand and a large dinner bell between his teeth, the imitation was perfect. Those chiming, silvery bells, as he rolled his hands with the bells outward, and as he sprang from side to side, illustrating how he rang them over the heads of the circle sitters, could be easily imagined as "music from the spheres," despite dense darkness demanded by spiritual "conditions." Indeed, without the darkness such spirit manifestations would be impossible.

But I remarked, "Still your explanations are not satisfactory, for I have heard sixteen bells ring at one and the same time in your seance."

"You thought you did," he responded.

"Ah, but I have counted them, as they fell onto the table, after the spirits had been ringing them, counted sixteen bells and you are able to ring but seven. Who rang the other nine?"

That notorious deceiver sat down at the table thus: [Jamieson here placed himself at the table.]

"Now," said McQueen, "imagine that it is dark. The bells have been ringing all around the room over our heads. They are now coming in, count. The company count, one, two, three, up to sixteen. Could just as well count up to sixty. How is it done? This way: I take these two bells, which do duty for sixteen. As it is dark, I lift one up, jam it down; lift the other and throw it down; up and down sixteen times." [Applause.]

"For ways that are dark, and tricks that are vain," he was equal to any dark circle medium I ever saw.

Nevertheless, there are many Spiritualists who still argue for dark circles, and maintain that McQueen, in spite of his confession of fraud, was a genuine medium. I had unbounded confidence in him; was his business manager for six or seven months, and so sure that he was a true medium that I invited our patrons to place me where they chose in the seance, and have changed my location five or six times in a single evening to satisfy skeptics that Mr. McQueen was a genuine medium, and that I could not render him any assistance had I been so disposed. As I then believed, he needed none. The spirits were his helpers—so we all thought; few exceptions among Spiritualists, at least.

But I was cured of all belief that spirits required darkness as a condition necessary to prove that they exist and communicate. Since I gave up Spiritualism entirely thousands of Spiritualists have abandoned the dark seance.

Dr. Peebles is sensible enough to say "pitch-dark commercial spiritism" is not "real Spiritualism." The Doctor adds: "It is only the most valuable things that are counterfeited." That is what the churches say, my brother, that spiritism, or Spiritualism, is a counterfeit of the manifestations in the lives of Jesus Christ, Peter and Paul, and a very poor counterfeit at that. But Doctor Peebles, like many other Spiritualists, is disgusted with pitch-darkism, and he says he would rather be "an upright, conscientious, intelligent man" than a church bigot; rather than be a "pious semi-idiot—saint, saved," he says, he "would prefer to be damned." They will give you hell for that, Doctor. However much the church may have opposed the doctor, I believe it will now cease its opposition and let him burn! Doctor, come and go with us. Col. Ingersoll said the next best thing to eternal bliss is eternal sleep.

My good Brother Peebles says that Henry Ward Beecher admitted that "Spiritualism strengthens faith in future life;" but Beecher also said that, judging Spiritualism by its communications, it gives one "an awful setback to go to the spirit world."

I will now review my friend Hull's speech; and bear this in mind, that although we say many plain things, spare no error in each other's statements, we are friends, nevertheless. I will do for him what he says the spirits will not do for me: save him from delusions—if I can. I sometimes fear, however, that he is like the little girl with her catechism lesson—"beyond redemption!"

My friend says he is "truly thankful that means have been provided by which even the most faint gleams can be obtained" of future life.

Indeed! "Small favors thankfully received."

What a fall! My brother started out to "prove" that spirits exist and communicate. In his fourth speech he is "truly thankful" for "even the most faint gleams." Is this a specimen of the "driving" and "mauling" he is giving me! You Spiritualists have found fault with the Christian church for its failure to "prove;" for its "mere faith;" for its "faint gleams," which you were not "truly thankful for."

My brother says: "When Mr. Jamieson says Spiritualists encourage mediums to never confess he tells what he ought to know is not true."

I tell exactly what I know to be true. I know Spiritualists who did all they could to prevent the exposure of mediums, and advised against confession of fraud, "because it would hurt the cause."

I never said that all Spiritualists are guilty of this black deed. Again and again I except a large number who love the truth for its own sake, and are doing all they can to clean the augean stables of Spiritualism from their filthy frauds. Does my friend Hull take an active part in exposing these frauds? Is it not yet unpopular among Spiritualists to "expose?" Does he not say that "if Spiritualism is a delusion, it is a charming delusion?" and that he hopes he "will never live long enough to find it out?" Will any one in that frame of mind be diligent in seeking out impositions? He is after something "charming."

Many years ago, when I wanted to publish G. W. Cusser as an imposter, not one of the members of that Grand Rapids, Michigan, Spiritual Society (for which I was at the time the lecturer) would join me.

In Chicago when, a few years later, I detected a "medium" in the very act of playing spirit, a howl of indignation went up from "representative" Spiritualists, not against the medium for practicing fraud, but against me for exposing it. It was openly charged by Spiritualists that I "injured the cause" by my exposures of cheats. For fifteen years I did all I could to induce Spiritualists to weed out these abuses; but on every side of me the cry raised by Spiritualists was that I was a "persecutor of the poor mediums," and was advised to throw the mantle of "charity" over them.

Not long since, Mrs. Dr. Edwards, 768 West Madison street, Chicago, declared that she would no longer assist in the programmes of the Steinway Hall Spiritual Association, owing to the fact that she exposed the "tricky methods by which Mabel Aber Jackman's slate-writing is done, against the wishes of the president and others connected with the society."

There are your "representative Spiritualists."

Much of the literature of Spiritualism is saturated with apologies for trickery, and that even some of the best mediums resort to trickery sometimes, is fully admitted by Spiritualists. Said The Watchman, a spiritual paper published in Chicago, November, 1882, page 2:

"Our late exposures of materializations where it has been proven that the media had concealed paraphernalia on their persons;" "It is a proven fact (to us by long research and study) that in a greater part of the materializations given on exhibition before large and promiscuous audiences the form of the medium is used to represent the spirit."

There is a case of real "dodging." When the medium is caught with the toggery on him, this spiritual paper "explains" that "the spirits do this to assist in the financial interest of their mediums—inducing the mediums to take these things [false faces, flowing garments to represent celestial visitants, etc.] assuring them that it is necessary for the work."

These words are not from an enemy of Spiritualism, but its devoted friend and advocate.

That journal chides Spiritualists who "pound at media because the form of the medium was seized while the spirit was demonstrating."

Such is the Spiritualists' "explanation." They are bound to have it that if the medium is caught in the very act of making his manifestations the spirits made him cheat, inspired him to take the toggery with him to fool people for the sake of putting money in his purse. Considerate spirits! But, worse than all, there are Spiritualists, like F. F. Cook, who have come out openly and justify fraud. In an article of three columns he defends fraud. Here is a delectable paragraph:

"So long as the upper world deals with imperfect human nature, real or seeming 'fraud' will ever be a concomitant of spiritual phenomena. To my mind fraud has the deepest significance. In connection with Spiritualism—its present status—I regard it as essential." "Take fraud out of Spiritualism, and it would dash to pieces in a twelve-month."

There are Spiritualists, like my friend Hull, who deplore the fact that Spiritualism abounds in fraud, all intermixed with what they think is genuine; but when any man in his sober senses comes across ninety-nine counterfeit bills to one genuine he naturally doubts that the so-called genuine is what its friends claim. Because there are thousands of false miracles in the Romish church, must we conclude that they are counterfeits of a genuine miracle? This is begging the question. First prove that there is a genuine. The same vicious reasoning is indulged in behalf of religion: a thousand counterfeits, one genuine. Which is the genuine? Who can tell?

But I must reserve further discussion of mediumship for the next question, and we all should endeavor to discover just what is fraud and what is fact in both the philosophy and phenomena of Spiritualism. I will bring forward the explanations of the best writers on Spiritualism, such as Epes Sargent, A. E. Newton, A. J. Davis, Judge Edmonds, Dr. Peebles, Massey, Zollner, Loveland, Tuttle, and many others. If my friend's explanations are truer than those of other Spiritualists, or better than any I shall offer, take them. As a result of these debates those who want the plain truth and a clear explanation of Spiritualism will obtain them.

Brother Hull says if I have "real arguments against Spiritualism." I never use any other kind. Several times he has accused me of ad captandum; and, to apply his own style of logic, if I am thus afflicted, therefore, Spiritualism is true! I observe that he has a leaning toward the Baptists, who teach, "Once in grace, always in grace;" hence, one who leaves Spiritualism "never was a Spiritualist." I was acquainted with W. F. Von Vleck when he and I were boys. If he was not a Spiritualist, and Hagaman was not, where shall I look for real Spiritualists? But here is the point, which should not be overlooked: while they were "mediums" Spiritualists and mediums endorsed them as genuine.

When I said that Hull, too, associated with tricksters, like Hagaman and Von Vleck, it was in the sense in which he charged that they are my associates, because they are now on my side of the question. I never intimated that he slept with them!

I will have use for both of these shrewd gentlemen before we finish.

Strange logic. When they were practicing "mediumship" and posed as Spiritualists, no one was able to tell them from the genuine article! No "spirit," no medium, no Spiritualist made the discovery. On the contrary, they were highly praised for the "proofs" they furnished that the dead return!

Brother Hull says my "arguments against Spiritualism" "are already stale"—that is the reason spiritual societies do not employ me to go before them to debate! Are they more stale than his arguments in favor of Spiritualism? He goes back to Moses, the prophets, the early Christians, all through the dark ages, to bring forward moss-grown and moth-eaten arguments, hoary with age and trembling with palsy. Compared with his old arguments mine are fresh as the dews of heaven, or full-blown roses from the gardens of "Araby the Blest." Now, what will you think when I tell you that, with a few exceptions, Spiritualist societies have never heard my arguments? Clinton camp is one of these exceptions. Yes, I was paid, and on Sunday, when I lectured alone, I was told I had over one thousand listeners—that one lecture more than paid for my entire debate with Hull. And Clinton camp heard but four sessions.

But "when did a so-called Liberal Society," he asks, ever employ him to "debate against their convictions?" I am acquainted with Liberal Societies which would hail the opposition. The Ohio Liberal Society, of Cincinnati, is one. It has paid Spiritualist speakers, rabbis, orthodox Christians to say what they pleased. Boston has just such a broad platform. I believe in it; have no respect for a church pulpit, a Spiritualist platform, a synagogue, or a Liberal Society which does not steadily, continuously welcome, and even urge "debate against their convictions;" but you must not expect they will not exercise the right of reply, as was the case with one Jewish rabbi, in Cincinnati, who was very much offended because the Liberals tore his address to tatters!

But Mr. Hull argues that it is unreasonable to "pay Catholics and Presbyterians to come before them with their stale theologies."

Why not? If you Spiritualists have the eternal truth, or believe you have, this is exactly what you would do, instead of sustaining the sectarian system of supporting "their own preachers" to repeat the same "stale" sentiments from Sunday to Sunday; or, as Mr. Hull puts it, "employ those who can enlighten them." I have often heard mediums "enlighten." A noted one in Michigan, in her lecture under inspiration, said: "We can come to you, but you cannot come to we." The whole discourse was equally enlightening. I am a patient man; listened to five consecutive lectures "through" her organism, and I heard many of her enraptured hearers exclaim: "Isn't it beautiful?" It was one lecture delivered five times forward and backward, and twice down the middle.

I wish Spiritualists would more generally, nay, universally, invite opponents to their platforms for the purpose of speaking the truth as they see the truth, rather than waste their energies building another sect. I am helping you to find the truth in Spiritualism. Do you really appreciate it?

Brother Hull does not think a society should employ anyone to advocate what they do not believe. If all societies, which profess to be searching for truth, would do this, more truth would be told, more error destroyed. For thirty years I have advocated this plan in opposition to the present system of hiring men to echo the convictions of hearers; to preach what congregations already believe. This old plan, which Hull pleads for, does not encourage men to speak the honest truth; does not truly "enlighten."

My brother charges me with "denying and ridiculing certain phenomena." Mistaken once more. I deny your explanations and ridicule what I think are your absurdities. Ridicule is one of the handmaidens of Truth, and is death to errors.

I showed that Dowie, Wesley, Mrs. Eddy have a "following." Hull has no more following than I have. I have had thousands of hearers at a single meeting and taught them to be the followers of no man.

My friend then switches off to a "permanent audience." I want none. Such an audience tends to fetter thought and stereotype expression. Thinking men are absenting themselves from "permanent audiences;" independent thinkers prefer to commune with nature. They devote their lives to studying, questioning, thinking.

Brother Hull says the spirits are not here for "business." I thought so. He says "we are placed here for development." How does he know? It would be as true to say hundreds of millions have been placed here for starvation, and a very few to roll in luxury. If to help the starving, the sick and imprisoned would take from us "our best opportunities," and would unfit us to "live in this world" as he says, what are the spirits here for? To give "a test," says Mr. Hull. What a glorious object? And he admits that but a handful out of the millions get the "test." The spirits could help humanity, but will not because it would "take business out of our hands" and wreck "our best opportunities." What a calamity! When S. B. Brittan, partner of Mr. Partridge, told, through his gift of clairvoyance, what the price of flour would be on a certain day, the dealer made a profit of several thousand dollars. He gave Brittan $500. This is what the spirits did for those two gentlemen! What a test? How easy it would be to convert the whole world to Spiritualism! Who would not be glad to have the spirits "take business out of our hands" on the same terms? It might hinder our "development," but we would cheerfully submit!

We can get voluble communications from taciturn Indians. They can talk by the hour, according to the philosophy of Spiritualism (I will give you a couple of samples in next question), and Brother Hull thinks I ought to be satisfied with a telegram through the mediumship of the operator, such as he sent me before this debate. Let me get as good a "test" from the spirit world as Hull gave me by telegraph and I will surrender. Let me have ten unmistakable words—a spiritual telegram—from some one who has passed the portals of death, and I am yours. Not for love nor money can it be obtained.

We have heard from Charley Ross at last! The mediums say he is at the bottom of the sea! Well, well, what a find that was!

Hull himself has found a lost boy. "No definite" knowledge was given, but he was "led" to him.

I notice that I have over-run my time five or six minutes through my friend's courtesy. He will be accorded the same indulgence at any time.

To be continued.

SACKCLOTH AND JESTS.

The jester who grinned at the scanty fare they spread at the royal board,
And tittered a grace, more jest than prayer, and more to the guests than the Lord;
And wrinkled his face with a wry grimace, while the people looked aghast
At the sackcloth under the purple robes of their king as he went past—

The jester, whose merry gibes were heard in all that doleful while,
Should he wear sackcloth like the king, why Famine's self would smile;
He, light and empty of heart and thought as the jingling bells he wore,
He would laugh at the sackcloth and jest at the ache of the heart it covered o'er.

Well might the king wear sackcloth; his were a nation's woes,
And every sob from a million lips was one of his own heart's throes;
The tears of his people burned his cheeks; their hunger gnawed his breast;
The pain that ached in their hollow eyes drove peace from his sleepless rest.

But the jester, who laughed in the palace, who mocked at the shriveled lips
Of gaunt-eyed Famine and turned aside her moan with his nimble quips,
Who rippled a stave of reveler's song when the woman, with bitter cry,
Shrieked, "Help, O King, for God will not!" as the helpless king passed by.

The jester—Death laughed in his face one day and the smile on his lips was chilled;
So strange it seemed for him to die that all the court was filled
With ripples of laughter, hushed and low, just tinged with pity and shame;
But the smiles would come when they coupled Death with the frolicsome jester's name.

So with pitying smiles and hands they dressed the dead for the court of Death;
They stripped off his motley—the grotesque rags—and then, with startled breath,
They looked in amaze, for, chafing his breast with its irritant rankle and sting,
Under his motley the jester wore sackcloth—like the king.

OCCULT MYSTERIES.

BOSTON WOMAN'S TRIPLE PERSONALITY

A HARD PUZZLE FOR THE PSYCHOLOGISTS

CASE OF "MISS BEAUCHAMP" IS MORE REMARKABLE THAN JEKYLL AND HYDE.

There is a woman in Boston who has gone Robert Louis Stevenson one better.

Were that old truism about fact being stranger than fiction not so sadly overworked, one would be tempted to repeat it in her case. For, whereas, Stevenson merely exaggerated a well known psychological fact and made his Dr. Jekyl turn at times into a Mr. Hyde, "Miss Beauchamp," as she is called in the medical reports, has, quite unconsciously, and very much to her own disquiet, developed not only two but three separate and distinct selves, only one of which—and that one of the couple that might be called artificial—has a knowledge of either of the others.

That, in brief, is the tangle, and you must agree that it is a rather thorough one. To put it more scientifically. "The patient," in the words of one who has studied the case, is undoubtedly that psychological anomaly, a triple personality. When not under hypnotic influence of some sort or other she is a quiet person, clearly manifesting at times symptoms of hysteria, it is true, and showing the effects of some deep-rooted nervous trouble, but pre-eminently a lady, gentle and, though of a neurotic temperament, decidedly religiously inclined—sincerely so, in fact. Hypnotized, however, she will, under conditions, which it has not yet been possible to distinguish and so create as may be wished, become one of two other distinct persons."

One of these—the first observed—is in no wise remarkable.

The other, however, is the exact antithesis of the original, and delights in annoying that self. Its ingenuity is almost uncanny.

The other two selves have no knowledge of each other or of the third, but the last has a far more perfect, though perverted, knowledge of the original than the original has of itself.

THE CASE INCLUDES A ROMANCE

"The case," continues the student, "is in many respects more surprising than any noted by Jaffe in the 'Archiv fur Psychiatrie' or Azam in his 'Hypnotisme, Double Conscience et Alternations de la Personalitie.' There is no doubt but that it is perfectly bona fide."

Nor does the mystery end there.

A great deal of romance, not altogether explained, is woven into the story.

"Miss Beauchamp" is said to have been a very pretty woman before her troubles left their mark upon her. She followed the profession which, above all others logically open to women, calls for steadiness of hand and coolness of brain.

She was a trained nurse, sufficiently successful in that work to be considered a person the very farthest removed from the type of disorder to which she has now fallen a victim. And that disorder came about in the manner of the accepted melodrama.

In this incident lies, her doctor thinks, the key to the enigma of "Miss Beauchamp's" present condition.

It appears, from this story, that in 1893 she, as originally constituted, was nursing in a hospital.

During her turn at night duty she was late one evening sitting beside a patient. The patient was sleeping; the whole building was quiet.

By the drug-laden table "Miss Beauchamp" was sitting, trying to read. The dim rays of the night lamp left most of the room in deep shadow, but clearly illuminated the window.

Suddenly she heard a slight noise. Her professional instinct at first directed her attention to her patient, but the patient was quiet, and "Miss Beauchamp's" attention again wandered.

Then once more, the noise. Slight it was, but unmistakable. Some one or something had struck the window pane.

The girl looked up, and found herself gazing there into the face of a man she had not seen for a long time, a man who she had every reason to believe was in a far distant portion of the country.

This was the incident which, at first upset her fine nervous organization.

It was easily explained; the man was a friend who had known her since childhood and had for years been her counsellor and adviser. He had come into that place unexpectedly on his way to New York, had discovered her exact whereabouts, had determined on a joke and had climbed the fire escape.

At the time "Miss Beauchamp" calmly beckoned the man to go downstairs, and there she finally met him. But in the end the "joke" turned out as so many of its foolish sort have done before and after.

"The shock," says her physician, "caused the disintegration from the rest of certain components of her personality. Certain local areas of her brain simply went to sleep and the original self became modified."

Time went on and "Miss Beauchamp" eventually became a neurasthenic of a very severe type.

She had once been a student at a well-known New England college, quick-witted, but overdiligent, and thus compelled to give up her studies.

As a nurse she had overcome the effects of that, but the occurrence above narrated had brought back all the old symptoms, until, when she finally arrived in Boston for treatment, she was a physical wreck.

Her innate temperament has always been one of extreme idealism, but at first the case seemed in nowise remarkable, and she was subjected only to the commonplace treatment.

But no satisfactory results were obtained, and at last it was determined to try hypnotism.

While hypnotized she developed the usual sub-conscious self.

Then one day the physician found that she remembered nothing of what she had said and done while previously under hypnotic influence. It was at deception on the part of the hypnotized mind, but repeated tests failed to satisfy the requirements of the theory.

It became clear that sometimes when hypnotized "Miss Beauchamp" was one person and at other times another. In each of these she was a distinct person.

Here, then, are the three personalities contained in this troubled brain:

(1) "Miss Beauchamp," quiet, reserved, studious, very religious, a French scholar, a musician, an idealist.

(2) Another person altogether, a rather colorless person, without any taste at all for literature, music and kindred subjects, one who "has no emotional ability excepting bad temper," and who does not recognize her own doctor.

(3) "Sally," as she has been dubbed, who is the exact antithesis of the original "Miss Beauchamp" in every particular of temperament and ethics.

Her physician has written a report of the case for the Society for Psychological Research, to which organization the case is already more or less known.

The peculiar point to be insisted upon, however, is that the original self can recall none of the other personalities, both of which claim to possess alone the clear title to the mind and ego of the real "Miss Beauchamp."

"Sally," on the other hand, knows the original self only too well for that self's comfort.

She hates its propriety and its circumspection and she torments it to a degree "well-nigh incredible."

She knows its most secret thoughts, detests books, study and church, and delights in that poor style of wit to which, no doubt, she owes her existence—the practical joke.

She is most vindictive and pours the major portion of her spite upon that first self, often with fiendish ingenuity. She is cruel, too, whereas the first self is kind and gentle to a degree.

Again, she will write letters to the first ego, pointing out all its weak points, tearing its character to shreds, discovering her most private thoughts and narrating with glee acts performed by the writer which are calculated to shock the reader.

Waking in the morning as her proper self, "Miss Beauchamp" will find opprobrious letters pinned to her counterpane, verses narrating her shortcomings fastened to the wall—everything, in short, that may be done with a pen to make her life miserable.

"Miss Beauchamp" has now been under the care and observation of a noted specialist in nervous diseases for three years, yet the solution of the problem seems still, to the lay mind, as distant as ever.

All that can be added to the facts given above is that at this constant analysis she occasionally continued for a hundred hours or so at a time, and the last two selves appeared in a measure with less hypnotic states and that during these hours of the investigations the two have been coming and going apparently without the least consistency.

WHAT AUTHORITIES SAY ABOUT DUAL PERSONALITIES.

The ego is not a simple, single thing; "in descending the animal scale we always see the psychic individual formed of a more or less complete fusion of simpler individuals, as also 'a colonial consciousness' created by the co-operation of local consciousness."—Th. Ribot, "The Diseases of the Personality."

A patient "in the fullness of health and while possessed of exuberant vitality and strength experiences an ever-increasing sensation of weakness, such that he is in momentary fear of fainting and of death," the expressions, apparently, of a morbid secondary personality. — "Annales medico-psychologiques," Sept., 1878, 5e serie, Vol. xx., pp 191-193.

"A soldier believed himself dead since the battle of Austerlitz, at which he had been seriously wounded. When asked, he would reply: 'He is dead. What you see is but a poor machine they have made, an imitation of him; you ought to ask them to make another.'"—Michea, "Annales medico-psychologiques," 1846, p. 249.

Leuret, in his "Fragments psychologiques sur la folie," notes the case of a man convalescing from a fever who "believed he consisted of two individuals, of which one was in bed, while the other walked about. Although without appetite, he ate a great deal, having, as he said, two bodies to feed."

Gratiolet ("Anatomie comparee du systeme nervoux") tells how a man recovering from typhus developed two personalities. While the second of them was in control he did not suffer from any ill or weakness.

In twins the subliminal consciousness is especially keen as to the suffering of the other of the pair. In one case one wrote the other: "I have my ophthalmia, you must have yours," and Trousseau in his "Clinique Medicale" notes that the suggestion was correct.

In all forms of melancholia and in the states technically known as hypochondria, lypemania, etc., the alterations of the personality admit of all sorts of degrees. Thus one of Esquirol's patients complains: "Each of my senses is separated from me and can no longer give me sensations."

Among the case of "circular insanity" observed in extenso by Ritti, one sees that upon the primitive or original personality are builded two distinct other personalities.

"Our ego at different epochs is very different, according to age, the various duties and events of life, and the excitements of the moment."—Greisinger, "Traite des maladies mentales" (Fr. trans.)

Examples of the formation of a new ego will also be found noted by Dr. Azam (Felida), and the case of Dr. Dufay.

Dr. Camuset ("Annales medico-psy") tells of a man who is by turns a respectable citizen and a thief, taking up his one life at the very instant at which it was changed for the other.

Dr. North, professor of physiology in Westminster hospital, says: "After looking at a bright disk for a certain time I seemed to exist in duplicate. My inner self seemed to be thoroughly aware of all that was passing, but made up its mind not to interfere with the doings of the outer self."

Jaffe notes a case where the patient believed one self to occupy one half or side of his body and another self the other half. Langlois had a case in which the patient always spoke of himself in the third person, apparently because he believed that he did not inhabit his own body.

Descourtis observed a case of dual personality where the patient was at one time right-handed and, as another personality, left-handed.—Boston Herald.

SUBTILE POWER.

Illustrated in a Remarkable Way.

FOOD FOR THOUGHT IN OUR ECLECTIC MAGAZINE OF OCCULT MYSTERIES.

Dr. J. Duncan Quackenbos, emeritus professor of psychology in Columbia, astonished his associates of the Medico-Legal society at the Plavano Hotel, in West Thirty-fifth street, New York, on Wednesday night by telling them how a young actress bounded into fame in a single night under a hypnotic spell.

Not only has the doctor helped actresses to fame by his hypnotic suggestion, but he has inspired ministers of the gospel so that their sermons have brought them fame as pulpit orators.

Dr. Quackenbos says that, rightly used, the power can be of immense benefit in many ways, as in his own experience it has furthered the causes of art, science, and humanity.

In the case of the young actress he helped to a successful career on the stage the professor says there was nothing supernatural about it.

WOMAN TOLD OF HER POWER.
